The doctrine is also applied in Sickles v. Herold, 149 N. Y. 332, 43 N. E. 852, where a stockholder was allowed to offset, in an action against him to enforce his statutory liability, a claim he had against the corporation, together with interest thereon from the maturity of the claim.

In Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, supra, it was said that, as against an insolvent bank, a debt continues to bear interest, but that, as against the assets of such bank in the hands of a receiver, interest should be calculated only to the date of suspension and the vesting of title to the assets in the receiver. Where, however, the assets are more than sufficient to pay the principal of the debts, interest will be computed thereon in favor of the creditors before a dividend is paid to the stockholders.

The same doctrine was enunciated and applied in New York Secur. & T. Co. v. Lombard Invest. Co. 73 Fed. 537, wherein the rule fixed for the distribution of the assets of the estate was that interest on claims should be calculated up to the date of the appointment of the receiver; and it was said that interest did not run as against the estate after the assignment or declared insolvency, unless there were funds sufficient on hand to pay all of the demands and accrued interest.

In Ex parte Stockman, 70 S. C. 31, 106 Am. St. Rep. 741, 48 S. E. 736, depositors were held entitled to interest as against the bank from the date of suspension, the suspension being treated as a waiver of demand. It does not appear in this case whether or not the assets were sufficient to pay the creditors in full. The question arose on an appeal by the receiver from an order requiring him to pay interest on deposits from the date of suspension. A somewhat similar case, in which the same conclusion is reached, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County in a suit to enforce defendants' liability as stockholders for debts of the American Banking & Trust Company, which confirmed the report of the master sustaining such liability. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ruel W. Smith, for defendant Redman:

Where the delay is the act of the law, and not of the party himself, interest should not be charged.

Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. 340; Potter v. Gardner, 5 Pet. 718, 8 L. ed. 285; People v. American Loan & T. Co. 172 N. Y. 371, 65 N. E. 200; Bowman v. Wilson, 2 McCrary, 394, 12 Fed. 864; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met.

is Baker v. Williams Bkg. Co. 42 Or. 213, 70 Pac. 711. In this case the receiver had sufficient assets to pay the principal, leaving a balance to be applied on the interest.

The English cases shed but little light on this question, as the act relating to stockholders' or shareholders' liability for the debts of the corporation controls the question of interest. Re Welsh Flannel & Tweed Co. L. R. 20 Eq. 360; Re Overend, G. & Co. L. R. 3 Ch. 784.

In Warrant Finance Co's Case, L. R. 4 Ch. 643, it was said, however, that dividends ought to be paid on the debts as they stand at the date of the winding up; and, where the estate is solvent, as soon as it is ascertained that there is a surplus, the creditor whose debt carries interest is remitted to his rights under his contract. To the same effect is Re Joint Stock Discount Co. L. R. 5 Ch. 86.

It is well settled that the maximum limit of the stockholder's liability for the debts of a corporation cannot be increased by interest charges until, at least, he is in default in paying such liability. The weight of authority and reason, however, are to the effect that, where the amount of the liability of a stockholder is ascertained, and the persons to whom the same is payable are known, such a liability will from that date bear interest. This is especially true if the stockholder denies and contests the question of his liability. As applied to stockholders in national banks, whose liability is fixed by an order of the Comptroller of the Currency, it is held that, the amount to be paid being liquidated and due and payable when the Comptroller's order is made, the amount will bear interest from that date. National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437, 24 L. ed. 176; Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S. 673, 24 L. ed. 168; Davis v. Watkins, 56 Neb. 288, 76 N. W. 575.

When the claims against a corporation, existing at the time of its dissolution, are judicially ascertained, a stockholder is in a eral exceptions were taken by different defendants to his rulings of law, and the case is before the law court upon those exceptions only. The various exceptions have been exhaustively argued, with numerous citations of cases, by the several counsel for the defendants and by the counsel for the plaintiff. Of course, all the briefs and the cases cited, numerous as they are, have been studied, but to answer every argument and comment on every case cited would consume so much space, and make this opinion so very long, the parties and counsel must be content with our conclusions and briefly stated reasons therefor.

The exceptions to the rulings of the single justice.

1. Some of the defendants contend that there is not sufficient evidence that the amendment creating that liability of the shareholders was ever accepted by them. The fact that, after the enactment of the amendment, the shareholders allowed their corporation to continue in business and exercise the new powers provided in the amendment, and to make contracts, debts, and engagements therein authorized, is sufficient evidence of their acceptance of the liability imposed upon them. No shareholder appears to have objected at the time. It is too late to object now, after the contracts, etc., have been made. Stanley v. Stanley, 26 Me. 191.

2. The corporation stopped payment December 22, 1896. Its assets were sequestered by decree of the court December 31, 1896. This bill was not filed until September 17, 1904. The defendants contend that this suit is therefore barred by the general six-year statute of limitations.

Upon the question when the statute of limitations begins to run against a creditor seeking to enforce the statutory liability of shareholders for his debt against the corporation, there have been numerous, various, and even conflicting decisions in other jurisdictions; but our duty is to construe our own statute in harmony with our own decisions and with what we think the better reason, even though we come to conclusions different from those of other courts.

Of course, the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the creditor and in favor of the shareholder when the debt or other obligation is incurred by the corporation, but only when the shareholder becomes subject to a suit to enforce his liability. When does the shareholder become subject to such suit? is therefore the determining question. One view is that it is when the corporation fails to pay, or, at least, when its assets are sequestered so it cannot pay. The other view is that it is when the creditor's remedies against the corporation and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the assets of the corporation have been exhausted. Under the former view the creditor, immediately upon default of the corporation, can ignore the corporation and its assets, can pursue the shareholders alone, collect of them his debt against corporation, and leave them to bring their own suits against the corporation for recoupment, though it might in the end appear that the corporate assets were ample to pay all the corporate debts, and hence that the suits against the shareholders were unnecessary and vexatious. Individuals and corporations often default for want of ready cash to meet obligations when due, though they have ample assets to eventually pay all their obligations in full. Under the latter view, the creditor cannot ignore the corporation, his direct and principal debtor, upon its default, and cannot burden the shareholders with suits until the necessity therefor is shown by an exhaustion of the corporate assets. Evidently the liability of the shareholder is heavier and more severe under the former than under the latter view.

We think the latter view is the correct one to take of the statute imposing the liability in this case. The statute imposes a new liability before nonexistent, and hence, if susceptible of more than one construction, it should receive that imposing the lightest burden. The shareholder is not made liable "on" the contracts, debts, and engagements of the corporation, but only "for" them. He cannot be joined in any suit against the corporation on such contracts, etc., because he is not a party to them; nor can the corporation or its receivers sue him, since his liability is not to them or for them, but only "for" the creditors. It is no part of the corporate assets. It is a liability apart and distinct in origin and character from that of the corporation. The creditor's claim is primarily against the corporation, and only secondarily against the shareholder. The creditor's remedy against him, to use a military metaphor, is a reserve force, to be brought into action only when necessary, only when it becomes apparent that the remedy against the corporation has failed.

We hold, therefore, that, under the statute in this case, the shareholder is not to be vexed with suits, and hence the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the assets of the debtor corporation are fully exhausted, nor until it has been judicially ascertained in proceedings against the corporation that a resort to the statutory liability of the shareholders is necessary. In so holding we hold nothing new, but are following the reasoning in the cases in this state. Longley v. Little, 26 Me. 162; Hewett v. Adams, 50 Me. 271; Morris v. Porter,

87 Me. 510, 33 Atl. 15; Gillin v. Sawyer, 93 Me. 151, 44 Atl. 677; Childs v. Cleaves, 95 Me. 498, 50 Atl. 714; Pulsifer v. Greene, 96 Me. 438, 52 Atl. 921; Hale v. Cushman, 96 Me. 148, 51 Atl. 874; Abbott v. Goodall, 100 Me. 231, 60 Atl. 1030. The same view was incidentally expressed by the court in Maine Trust & Bkg. Co. v. Southern Loan & T. Co. 92 Me. 444, 452, 43 Atl. 24, where the court said: "So must the assets of the corporation be exhausted before this liability be incurred."

It is urged in argument that by such a holding the burdens of the shareholders are increased; that they are disabled from discharging themselves from liability; that the creditors can delay almost indefinitely their proceedings against the corporation, and thus prolong the liability of the shareholders against their will. The shareholders, however, are not helpless. They can so conduct the affairs of their corporation that there shall be no default in its obligations. They can themselves apply the corporate assets to the payment of the corporate debts. That their assets are sequestered and receivers appointed is rather the fault of the shareholders than of the creditors; but even then the shareholders can compel the receivers to proceed with reasonable vigor and speed to a full administration.

In the proceedings against the corporation in this case it was not judicially ascertained until May, 1904, at least, that the corporate assets were exhausted and that a resort to the shareholders was necessary. This bill was filed September 17, 1904, and hence is not barred by the six-year statute of limitations.

3. But some of the defendants contend that, if the right of action against them did not accrue until it was judicially ascertained that the corporate assets were exhausted, then this bill was prematurely filed. The final account of the receiver was filed May 7, 1904, and showed a full disbursement of all his receipts. On September 13, 1904, this final account was settled, and the court entered a decree that the account, being final and "showing a complete disposition of the assets of the corporation and no balance remaining in his hands, is hereby accepted, approved, and allowed." The report of the commissioners on claims had previously been filed and accepted, showing the amount of the debts of the corporation. The receiver's accounts allowed showed how much of the indebtedness had been paid and when. These two amounts had thus been judicially ascertained and declared. It had also been adjudicated that the assets had been fully administered and exhausted. The deficiency of assets, if any, and the amount of the deficiency, then appeared of record. There was no need of a further decree of the court to 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

establish a mere mathematical truth. We agree with the single justice that to require such a decree would be final in the extreme. This bill, not having been filed until after the decree of September 13, 1904, was not prematurely filed.

4. Upon the appointment of a receiver for the corporation, commissioners were also appointed by the court to determine the claims against the corporation, and were instructed to allow such interest as would accrue up to the date of the receivership, January 1, 1897. They executed their commission according to those instructions, and made their report, showing the amounts due at that date. Upon these claims, thus allowed, payments were made from time to time by the receiver as he realized from the assets; the last payment being made November 12, 1903. The sum of these various payments only equals the amount of the debts allowed to be due January 1, 1897. The interest accrued since that date remains unpaid.

The defendants now contend that the shareholder's liability does not extend to such interest. As supporting this contention many cases are cited, but nearly all of them are cases of proceedings against the corporation, and can be eliminated by conceding, arguendo, that, as between the creditor and the corporation and its sequestered assets in the hands of its receivers, interest beyond the date of the receivership cannot be recovered, unless there are surplus assets after paying the indebtedness of that date; that, when the corporate assets are exhausted, the remedy against the corporation is exhausted. Moreover, in all these cases it is held that, where there is a surplus of assets, it shall be applied to the payment of such interest before any distribution is made among shareholders. When, however, the corporate assets are exhausted, and the corporation by a court decree, in pursuance of the statute, is enjoined from transacting any further business, the corporation has become civili-ter mortuus. It has then no legal rights nor liabilities, except to formal dissolution. The liabilities of its receivers or other representatives are fully discharged when they have administered its assets. If nothing remains for the payment of subsequent accrued interest, creditors have no remedy against the corporation, its assets, or receivers for such interest.

But, though the corporation and its receivers may thus be freed from actions by creditors to recover claims for interest or other claims, it does not follow that the contracts, debts, and engagements of the corporation have been fulfilled. If the contract, debt, or engagement is such that interest accrues for delay in fulfilment, it is not fulfilled until that interest also is paid. Whoever is made liable by contract or by statute for those contracts, debts, and engagements is made liable for the interest accrued and accruing on them. The liability of the shareholders for them and for the interest on them is not discharged when the corporation is dissolved. It continues until they are fulfilled, interest as well as principal. It was imposed to insure that fulfilment in case the corporation should become defunct before itself fulfilled them. The creditor then acquired the same right against the shareholders to recover principal and interest (of course, not in excess of their maximum liability fixed by the statute) that he would have had against the corporation, had it continued solvent and possessed of its assets. Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 30 L. ed. 864, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788. The cases of Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met. 525, and Grew v. Breed, 10 Met. 569, were suits by bill holders against shareholders in banks of issue, and were decided upon the ground that the then Massachusetts statute did not provide for interest on bank bills.

The defendants cite, from the Maine statute relative to claims against insolvent banks, the last clause of § 66 of chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of 1883 (in force when the proceedings against the bank in this case were begun), as follows: "All claims allowed shall bear interest from the time that they are filed, provided that the assets in the hands of the receivers are more than sufficient to pay the principal of all the claims allowed and outstanding when the final dividend is declared." The original of this clause is found in Laws 1872, chap. 86, p. 54, § 3, which enacts that § 71 of chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of 1871 "shall not be construed to require the payment of interest on claims against the bank unless the assets," etc. The argument is that that statutory limitation upon the payment of interest is to be read into every contract and obligation of the bank, and hence that its shareholders are entitled to the benefit of that limitation. That statute, however, was designed for banks of issue, where the liability of the shareholders was different in many respects from that imposed by the statute in this case, and was enforceable only by the receivers. But even that statute does not declare the bank's contracts and obligations to be fulfilled by the failure of the bank and the appointment of the receivers. It simply limited the powers of the receivers of such banks, and thereby limited the liability of those shareholders. In this case the creditors, and they only, have the right to enforce the liability imposed by its charter upon the shareholders of this corporation. That liability is for all the contracts, etc., of the corporation. There is no exception nor condition, except that it shall not exceed the par value of their shares.

5. The defendants claim, however, that an action cannot be maintained for interest alone, and hence this proceeding cannot be maintained for interest. It is true that one action cannot be maintained for the principal of a debt and a separate action for the interest. It is also true that, when a creditor has accepted payment of the principal in full for his claim or debt, he cannot afterward maintain an action for the interest. The interest is incident to the principal debt, and not a separate debt, unless so stipulated in the contract. In this case, however, there has been no action to recover the principal, and there has been no acceptance, nor even offer of payment, of the principal in full for the debt. The proceedings against the corporation were for the sequestration and division of its assets. The sums received by the creditors from those assets were received as dividends, not as payments. They were, of course, applicable to the debts as they were received; but their reception and application entailed upon the creditors no forfeiture of the accruing and accumulating interest.

It is urged that to hold the shareholders responsible for interest accruing during the delays of administration is a hardship upon them. It would be an equal hardship upon the creditors to hold that they must lose the interest through no fault of theirs. The responsibility for the failure of the corporation, for the necessity for the sequestration and administration of its assets, and for the delay and expense entailed, is more upon the shareholders than upon the creditors. It is not, however, a question of hardship, but of legal right. The enforcement of even unquestioned legal rights sometimes inflicts great hardship, but the court cannot for that reason stay its hand.

6. Through the misconduct of the first receiver appointed, some $6,500 of the assets of the corporation were irretrievably lost. Who must bear the loss, the creditors or the shareholders? We think the loss fell upon the shareholders, and that there is must remain. Though the assets were in the custody of the court through a receiver by it appointed and controlled, they were still the property of the corporation and its shareholders until administered. The loss was their loss, even if from causes beyond their control. The risk of that loss they assumed when they so managed the affairs of the corporation that a receivership became necessary.

7. A demurrer to the bill was filed, but the bill, with the amendments allowed by the single justice, read in the light of the foregoing, will show sufficient grounds for its maintenance. The objections to the bill are practically disposed of by the propositions above laid down.

Exceptions to the report of the master.

The bill having been sustained, the case was referred to a master to ascertain the amount and nature of the claims of the creditors within the statutory liability of the shareholders; also the names of the shareholders, the number of shares owned by each, and the ratable amount of the liability of each share. Upon the coming in of the report of the master, various exceptions to it were filed, which were all overruled by the single justice, and the report accepted. Exceptions were taken from that ruling.

Some of the exceptions to the master's report are disposed of by propositions already laid down upon the questions above considered. We have, therefore, only to consider the other exceptions not thus disposed of.

1. Some of the claims were against the corporation as guarantor of certain notes and mortgages sold and assigned by it to purchasers. The guaranty was as follows: "For value received, the within-named American Banking & Trust Company hereby guarantees the payment of the within note and interest coupons thereto attached, when due and payable, without notice of any neglect on the part of the payors thereof. The mortgage securing their payment to be re-assigned in due form." The promisors having failed to pay at maturity, the holders of these guaranteed notes and mortgages presented their claims therefore to the commissioners, which claims were allowed. It is contended by the defendants that for want of a demand made upon the bank for payment of these notes and mortgages no interest runs against it. We think the vote of the directors to stop payment and the immediately following sequestration of its assets deprived the bank of all right to insist upon a demand. The evident inability and the declared resolution not to pay, if demanded, made a demand useless, and therefore unnecessary. All claims due upon demand, including those under the guaranty in question, then became due and payable, and, unless otherwise stipulated in the contract of guaranty, interest began to accrue against the guarantor.

2. It is also contended by some of the defendants that the holders of these guaranteed notes and mortgages should first have proceeded against the promisors. But there was no such stipulation. The guaranty was unconditional, dispensing even with notice of the default of the promisor. The holder could proceed at once against either. Cooper v. Page, 24 Me. 73, 41 Am. Dec. 371.

3. After the appointment of the receiver the holders of these guaranteed notes and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mortgages proved against the corporation their claims under its guaranties, and assigned the notes and mortgages to the receiver as they had stipulated to do to the corporation. The receiver collected more or less of them from the makers. Had he paid the proceeds over to the respective holders, they would have been paid in full and thus eliminated from the case. Instead of doing this, the receiver turned all the proceeds into the general fund, all of which was administered and distributed pro rata among all the creditors. The result was that the holders of the guaranteed notes and mortgages only received a partial payment pro rata with the general creditors. Can they be reckoned in this proceeding as creditors for the balance remaining unpaid? This question, so far as appears, is academic, rather than practical. If the proceeds had all been paid to the holders, the dividends to the other creditors would have been so much less, and the balance of indebtedness to them to be paid by the shareholders so much more. The burden upon the shareholders would have been nearly the same in either event. We do not think, however, the holders of the guaranteed notes and mortgages are to be excluded from consideration because of the action of the receiver. He was the bank's representative, performing its duties so far as its assets would permit. The money or other property received upon these notes and mortgages was passed to the general fund, as the bank would have done. The court ordered them paid out in dividends to all the creditors. The shareholders made no objection at the time, and it is too late now; the decree having been made, the money paid out, and those proceedings closed.

4. When the bank or corporation voted to stop payment and its assets were sequestered, all its deposits became immediately due and payable, without formal demand, except such as were on some specified time, which had not then elapsed. Whatever interest the bank had agreed to pay upon these deposits, it became liable for the legal rate of 6 per cent from and after its default, unless otherwise stipulated, which does not appear to have been done as to any deposit in this case. Eaton v. Boissonnault, 67 Me. 540, 24 Am. Rep. 52. It has been held in some cases that a demand for payment of bank-currency bills is necessary, even after failure of the bank, if the bill holder wishes to recover interest. We do not think those cases applicable to deposits under our statute.

5. In some cases the persons appearing on the stock ledger as owners of shares really only hold them as security for loans made to the real owners. This fact, however, did not appear upon the books of the bank, nor upon the share certificates. So far as there appeared, the persons named as owners were the actual owners. As to the corporation and its creditors, they were the owners, and as such were within the statutory liability of shareholders. Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met. 525.

6. Upon the stock ledger of the corporation the word "trustee" appeared after the name of one shareholder. That shareholder contends in his answer and argument that he invested the entire trust fund in those shares, and that, as there is nothing left of that fund, he should not be held personally liable. Even if such facts would exempt him from the liability, no evidence of them was reported to the law court. So far as appeared, he purchased the shares, became the legal owner, and entitled himself to the dividends on them, as well as to represent them in corporation meetings. He thereby assumed the statutory liability attached to them. The addition of the word "trustee" was only descriptio personæ. Even if the statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 47, § 84) applies to a case like this, it was not enacted till 1897, after the liability in this case had become fixed.

7. The shareholders purchased their shares at different times, some before and some after particular contracts, debts, and engagements upon which the corporation defaulted were entered into. This fact does not make any difference in their liability under the statute in question, whatever might be the effect under other statutes. No distinction is made by the statute, and none can be made by the court. Those who were shareholders at the time of the default have the entire liability cast upon them,—those who purchased at the eleventh hour, as well as earlier purchasers. The purchaser of shares took the risk of the financial condition of the corporation, good or bad, as it was at the time of his purchase, as well as the future risks. He took over the liabilities as well as the advantages attaching to the shares. Curtis v. Harlow, 12 Met. 3; Maine Trust & Bkg. Co. v. Southern Loan & T. Co. 92 Me. 444, 452, 43 Atl. 24.

Though numerous exceptions were taken by different defendants, it is not expedient to recite and discuss every one seriatim, since all the questions of law raised by any of them are decided in the foregoing opinion. The rulings of the master and the single justice were in accord with what we above hold to be the law, and hence the exceptions must be overruled, and the degrees of the single justice be affirmed, and with costs.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ELIZA A. MCCLERRY

WOODARD LEWIS.

Record—proof of deed.

1. The record of a deed is not admissible to prove its existence, on behalf of the grantee claiming under it.

Deed—delivery—record—possession.

2. The existence of the record of a deed for more than fifty years, together with the occupation of the land by the grantee for a time subsequently to the date of the record, without anything to show that he claimed under the deed, is not sufficient to raise a presumption of the existence of a duly executed and delivered original.

Case Note.—Admissibility of record, or copy of record, of deed, to prove deed under which party offering it claims.

This note is confined to the question of the admissibility in evidence of the record, or a copy of the record, of a deed to prove the existence, due execution, and delivery (but not the contents) of a deed under which a party to an action claims; and includes only cases where the record or copy thereof purports to be of a duly executed deed which is entitled to be entered of record, and does not include the question of admissibility of the record of a defectively executed deed.

In absence of statutory regulations.

Official copies of deeds from the records thereof are prima facie evidence of everything necessary to the validity of the instruments. Cole v. O'Neill, 3 Md. Ch. 174; Warner v. Hardy, 6 Md. 525.

And this is true although the original deed vested the title to land in the plaintiff in ejectment. Warner v. Hardy, supra.

In Frazee v. Nelson, 179 Mass. 456, 88 Am. St. Rep. 391, 61 N. E. 40, where the party to an action apparently claimed title under a sheriff's deed, a certified copy of the record thereof was held to be sufficient evidence of its execution.

One seeking the registration of a land title under the Massachusetts torrens registry act may use, in lieu of the original deed, a certified copy of an ancient official record, which will be good evidence of the execution of the deed as of the date it was recorded. Phillips v. Watuppa Reservoir Co. 184 Mass. 404, 68 N. E. 848.

It was said in Bentley v. McCall, 119 Ga. 530, 46 S. E. 645, to be the general rule that the execution and genuineness of a lost or destroyed deed may be proven by a certified copy of the record.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Franklin County made during the trial of an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

Plaintiff claimed title under a supposed deed dated October 27, 1855, and duly recorded in the Franklin county registry, purporting to convey to plaintiff's mother a life estate in the premises with remainder to plaintiff and others. The life tenant having died, this action was brought.

Rev. Stat. chap. 84, § 125, is as follows: "In all actions touching the realty, or in which the title to real estate is material to the issue, and where original deeds would be admissible, attested copies of such deeds from the registry may be used in evidence, without proof of their execution, when the party offering such copy is not a grantee in the deed, nor claims as heir, nor justifies as servant of the grantee or his heirs." Plaintiff, being unable to prove the existence of the deed, produced an attested copy of the record from the registry, which, after objection, was admitted in evidence.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Frank W. Butler, for defendant:

The office copy of the deed was not admissible.

But the effect of such copy as evidence is destroyed when the opposite party files an affidavit alleging that the original deed under which the person producing the copy claims, was a forgery; and this is true, notwithstanding that it appears from the certified copy that the original deed has been of record for more than thirty years. Ibid.

An enrolment of a deed of bargain and sale under which the defendant in ejectment claims is as competent evidence of his title as the original itself would have been, where, by law, such a deed is required to be enrolled. Hurn v. Soper, 6 Harr. & J. 276. To the same effect, see Dick v. Balch, 8 Pet. 30, 8 L. ed. 856.

So, in a proceeding by a slave to obtain his freedom, an office copy of a deed of manumission was admitted by the trial court without the production of the original, which was acknowledged and recorded according to law. Thomas v. Magruder, 4 Cranch, C. C. 446, Fed. Cas. No. 13,904.

As it is to be presumed that a grantee has possession of the deed under which he claims, at an early day it was declared in Maine, by rule of court, that office copies from the registry of deeds, when pertaining to an issue pending in any court, might be read in evidence without proof of the execution where the party offering the copy was not a party to the deed, or did not claim thereunder as heir, nor justify as servant of the grantee or his heirs. Knox v. Silloway, 10 Me. 216; Woodman v. Colbroth, 7 Me. 181.

So, an heir claiming under his ancestor's deed cannot prove the genuineness of such deed by the production of an office copy, although the persons purporting by the copy to have been the parties to the deed, as well as the subscribing witnesses and the registrar, are dead. White v. Dwinel, 33 Me. 320.

But an office copy of a deed to the demandant in a writ of entry is admissible in evidence where it is shown by the official registrar that when the deed was recorded he must have had the original before him, and that the subscribing witness thereto had removed from the state; and other witnesses were produced, who had examined the deed shortly after its date, and were familiar with the grantor's handwriting, who had no doubt as to the genuineness of his signature; and demandant made affidavit that diligent search had failed to discover the original, which he believed to have been lost, as he had never seen it since it was left with the registrar for recordation. Hewes v. Wiswell, 8 Me. 94.

This rule does not apply to trustees under a will so as to prevent them, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, from giving in evidence an office copy of the deed to their testator to prove their title, as they do not fall within the class barred by such rule. Baring v. Harmon, 13 Me. 361.

The rule recognized in New Hampshire is that a certified copy of the record of a deed is not admissible, where the party to an action claims under it, without first establishing the proof of its execution and delivery. Forsaith v. Clark, 21 N. H. 421.

So, one claiming under a deed cannot use a certified copy of the record thereof as proof of its existence, execution, and delivery, merely by proving that search for the original has been unavailing, as it is necessary that the original be proven by the subscribing witness, if to be found, or by the grantor or grantee, and, if the latter cannot be found, by the officer who recorded it, or any person who has seen the original and can testify as to the handwriting of the witness and grantor. Wells v. Jackson, Iron Mfg. Co. 48 N. H. 401. The court said it did not mean to decide that a showing such as made would not warrant the admission of the certified copy if it appeared that no other evidence existed and was in reach of the party by making a reasonable search and inquiry therefor.

But one claiming as devisee, after proving his title as such, may give in evidence an office copy of his testator's deed, without accounting for the absence of the original, which will be regarded as prima facie evidence of the execution and acknowledgment of the original. Fellows v. Fellows, 37 N. H. 75.

So, one claiming title to land as devisee or heir may give in evidence a copy of the record of his testator's or ancestor's deed upon showing the loss of the original or

Mr. Joseph C. Holman, for plaintiff: Possession of premises, accompanied with the record of the deed made fifty-two years ago, makes the copy admissible.

Emery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a real action. The plaintiff claimed, and sought to prove, title only under a deed of conveyance, which she claimed was executed and delivered to her mother his inability to produce it, as such copy furnishes evidence of the execution and existence of the original as a genuine instrument. Kelsey v. Hanmer, 18 Conn. 311; Hathaway v. Spooner, 9 Pick. 23; Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick. 185.

And such copy is prima facie evidence of the authenticity of the original deed. Ward v. Fuller, supra.

But it was held in Cunningham v. Tracy, 1 Conn. 252, that heirs claiming under their ancestor's deed must produce the original and prove its execution, which cannot be done by a certified copy of the record thereof without accounting for the absence of the original, as the heirs are presumed to have possession of their ancestor's deed. The court said that, where this presumption did not apply, upon accounting for the absence of the original deed the production of a certified copy dispensed with proof of the execution of the original.

It was said in Bowser v. Warren, 4 Blackf. 527, that one who relies upon a deed which, from its character, is presumed to be in his possession, cannot resort to a certified copy to prove it, as the original, if not lost or destroyed, must be produced and its execution proven.

In an action by church trustees to recover a penalty for cutting trees upon church property, a certified transcript of the deed conveying the property to the trustees is admissible in evidence where the original deed is more than twenty years old and is of record in the proper office as of the day of its date, as, from the lapse of time, it will be presumed that the original deed was lawfully proved or acknowledged, and properly certified, and that the subscribing witnesses are dead. Allison v. Little, 85 Ala. 512, 5 So. 221.

And, where the original trustees named in such deed are dead, there is no presumption that their successors have possession of the original; and therefore they need not account for its nonproduction. Ibid.

A certified copy of the record of a deed under which a party to an action claims is admissible in evidence, without proof of the execution of the original, where the absence of the latter is satisfactorily accounted for.

in 1855, and conveying a life estate to her mother, with remainder to herself. The mother was deceased.

The essential proposition of fact to be proved by the plaintiff was that such a deed had been, in fact, executed and delivered. She was not able to produce any witness that ever saw such a deed, or ever heard such an one read. She did, however, produce an office copy of what purported to be the record of such a deed in the proper registry of deeds, and offered it as admissible evidence that an original deed corresponding to the record had been executed and delivered prior to the date of the record.

We are constrained to hold that, by the settled law of this state, neither the copy

Stone v. Fitts, 38 S. C. 393, 17 S. E. 136. To same effect, see Smith v. Wilson, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 40; Park v. Cochran, 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 410; Anderson v. Walker, Mart. & Y. 200.

So, an assignee for creditors cannot prove the title of the assignor to real estate by a copy of the record of the latter's deed, without showing the loss or destruction of the original, or that it is out of his power to produce it, as the assignee stands in his grantor's shoes, and, to make title in himself, must produce the original deed. Talcott v. Goodwin, 3 Day, 264.

Where a lost deed, under which a party in ejectment claims, conveying lands in two counties, is of record in one county only, a copy from the record thereof is not admissible in evidence in the other county without proof of the execution of the original. Kennedy v. Harden, 92 Ga. 230, 18 S. E. 542, S. C. on subsequent appeal 94 Ga. 651, 20 S. E. 105. Contra, see McKen v. Delancy, infra.

When regulated by statute.

Chief Justice Marshall held in M'Keen v. Delancy, 5 Cranch, 22, 3 L. ed. 25, that, in an action of ejectment, a certified copy of the record of the deed of the defendant's lessor is competent evidence as proof of the execution thereof, even though it conveys lands in two counties and is recorded in the county other than that in which it is offered, where the statute provides that copies of records of deeds shall be allowed in all courts where produced, and they are declared to be as good evidence, and as valid and effectual in law, as the original deeds.

Under a statute providing that a certified copy of the record of a deed is sufficient evidence of the execution of the original, a copy of a deed to an ancestor of a defendant in ejectment, under which he claims, is prima facie evidence of its execution, notwithstanding it is disputed. Love v. Harbin, 87 N. C. 252.

The record of a deed under which a party to an action claims is competent to show the execution, if not delivery, thereof, under a statute providing that a copy or record may be received in evidence, as the delivery of the record, nor the record itself, is admissible evidence to prove the existence of an original; the plaintiff being a grantee in the supposed deed. The statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 84, § 125) authorizing the use of records, and copies of records, of deeds as evidence of the existence, execution, and delivery of originals only applies to deeds prior to that in which the party is the grantee or heir of a grantee. It does not include the deed produced by the plaintiff. Elwell v. Cunningham, 74 Me. 127; Webber v. Stratton, 89 Me. 379, 36 Atl. 614.

The plaintiff urges that the age of the record, an age of more than half a century, together with the fact that her mother occupied the land for a time after the date of the record, creates a presumption that there was, in fact, an original of the record duly executed and delivered. It is true that, when a document, apparently an original deed, and shown to be thirty years old or more, is produced, it may be received in evidence without other proof of execution. But this presumption of due execution applies only to originals, not to copies. Further, the mere fact that the mother occupied the land, there being no evidence that her occupation was under any claim of title, creates no legal presumption that her occupation was under any particular deed. If neither the copy, nor the occupation, creates any presumption, both together cannot. Zero plus zero is still zero. In Elwell v.

of a deed may be inferred from its execution and acknowledgment. Series v. Series, 35 Or. 289, 59 Pac. 634.

So, such a copy is admissible as proof of the genuineness of the grantor's signature, under a statute providing that such copy shall be received to all intents and purposes as the original, and which shall be prima facie evidence of the deed, and the genuineness thereof. Chrast v. O'Connor, 41 Wash. 360, 83 Pac. 238.

One resting his title upon a deed may use an exemplified copy thereof, as showing the execution and acknowledgment of the original, even when such facts are in dispute, where, by statute, such copy may be read in evidence as presumptive evidence of the fact of the conveyance of the title. Sudlow v. Warshing, 108 N. Y. 520, 15 N. E. 532.

A certified copy of the record of a deed under which a party to an action claims is admissible in evidence under a statutory provision that such copy shall be received as prima facie evidence of the existence of the original. Burnet v. Brush, 6 Ohio, 32.

So, after notice to the plaintiff to produce his ancestor's deed, the opposite party may give in evidence a certified copy of the record thereof as proof of the execution of the original, as, under the Ohio statute, such copy is prima facie evidence, subject to be rebutted only as to the fact of the delivery of the original. Buckley v. Carlton, 6 McLean, 125, Fed. Cas. No. 2,093.

So, a certified copy of the record of a commissioner's deed is admissible in evidence, without proof of the judgment authorizing it, where the copy shows that the original was examined and approved by the court, under a statute providing that certified copies of instruments regularly recorded shall be prima facie evidence in all courts and tribunals. Helton v. Belcher, 114 Ky. 172, 70 S. W. 295.

In Michigan, by statute, a transcript of the record of a deed is sufficient proof of its execution and delivery. See Webb v. Holt, 113 Mich. 338, 71 N. W. 637; Mee v. Benedict, 98 Mich. 260, 22 L.R.A. 641, 39 Am. St. Rep. 543, 57 N. W. 175.

A certified copy of the record of a deed under which one claims is not admissible in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

evidence without accounting for the absence of the original, under a statute providing that such copy shall be deemed good evidence of a title at law where the original has been lost by accident, until better evidence appears. Purvis v. Robinson, 1 Bay, 495.

One claiming under a sheriff's deed may introduce in evidence a certified copy of the record thereof without accounting for the absence of the original, where, by statute, such copy is made primary evidence without further proof of execution. Hammond v. Johnston, 93 Mo. 198, 6 S. W. 83; Hammond v. Gordon, 93 Mo. 223, 6 S. W. 93.

So, a record of a deed to a party to an action is admissible in evidence under a statute declaring it to be full and sufficient evidence of such deed, even though he is entitled to the possession of the original, and does not account for its absence. Ratliff v. Ratliff, 131 N. C. 425, 63 L.R.A. 963, 42 S. E. 887.

But the effect thereof is destroyed where the opposite party files an affidavit alleging that the original deed is a forgery. Ibid.

In Maine, as shown in McCLERRY v. LEWIS by statute, in order to lay a foundation for the introduction of an office copy of a deed under which an heir of the grantee claims, the execution and genuineness of the lost deed must be shown, as well as the fact that all means of producing the original have been exhausted. Elwell v. Cunningham, 74 Me. 129; Egan v. Horrigan, 96 Me. 46, 51 Atl. 246.

Nor is such a copy admissible as secondary evidence without proof that all apparent means of producing the original have been exhausted. Egan v. Horrigan, supra.

By a provision of the Florida Constitution, a certified copy of the record of a deed, recorded according to law, is prima facie evidence of its due execution with like effect as the original duly proved, if it is made to appear that the original is not within the custody or control of the party relying upon the copy (Bell v. Kendrick, 25 Fla. 778, 6 So. 868); although a prior statute permitted a copy to be received in evidence in the same manner and with like force and effect as the original only upon Cunningham, supra, the record was nearly seventy-five years old, yet the court held it was not evidence of the execution and delivery of an original.

The plaintiff's counsel cites several cases, to the effect that an office copy of a deed is admissible in evidence upon proof that the original is destroyed or lost, or is in the possession of the opposite party, who will not produce it. In those cases there was evidence aliunde that an original had been executed and delivered. In this case there is no such evidence. This circumstance shows the inapplicability of the cases cited.

As the law is to-day in this state, grantees in deeds, and their heirs, cannot depend upon the record of deeds direct to them. If unable to produce the original deed, they must produce evidence aliunde the record that there was in fact such a deed executed and delivered. The pro forma ruling admitting the copy in this case must be reversed.

proof of the execution and acknowledgment thereof (Skinner v. Pinney, 19 Fla. 42, 45 Am. Rep. 1).

A certified copy of the registry of a deed to a party to an action will be competent evidence of the execution and delivery of the original, under a statute providing that such a copy may be read in evidence with like effect as the original, upon showing that the latter is not in the possession, or under the control, of the party producing or claiming under it. American Mortg. Co. v. Mouse River Live Stock Co. 10 N. D. 290, 86 N. W. 965.

And a certified copy of the record of a deed under which a party claims is competent evidence under a statute providing that such copies shall be prima facie evidence in all cases on accounting for the absence of the original. McKinstry v. Clark, 4 Mont. 370, 1 Pac. 759; Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153. However this rule was modified in Manhattan Malting Co. v. Sweteland, 14 Mont. 269, 36 Pac. 84, to the extent of requiring that there shall be preliminary proof that the original is lost or not in the possession or control of the person desiring to use the same.

In an action to recover possession of lands, the record of a deed to the plaintiff is, by statute, admissible, where it is proved that the original is not in his possession or under his control. Grant v. Oliver, 91 Cal. 158, 27 Pac. 596, 861.

Upon showing the identity of the grantor in a deed, without calling the subscribing witnesses thereto, one claiming under the deed may give in evidence a certified copy of the record thereof, upon showing that the original is not in his possession and cannot be found by diligent search, and he believes it to have been destroyed, under a statute providing that, under such circumstances, the copy shall be received in evidence upon like proof as is required in case of the original, and which shall have the same effect as the production of the original. Moss v. Anderson, 7 Mo. 337.

The Texas statute permits the use in evidence of a certified copy of the record of a deed as proof of the execution, where a copy thereof is filed three days before trial, and is accompanied by an affidavit showing that the original is lost or cannot be produced, together with notice to the opposite party of the intention to use such copy in evidence.

So, under such statute, a certified copy of the record of the deed of a party's ancestor is admissible, even where the party claims thereunder, without proof of the execution of the deed, upon showing the loss thereof. Logan v. Logan, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 72 S. W. 416.

So, a certified copy of the record of a deed upon which a party's title depends is sufficient proof of the original without accounting for the absence thereof, or giving such notice, where the opposite party fails to object to its admission in evidence for that reason. Moody v. Ogden, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 395, 72 S. W. 253.

So, upon proof of the loss of his ancestor's deed, under which one claims, a certified copy of the record thereof, which is over thirty years of age, is admissible. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Stealey, 66 Tex. 468, 1 S. W. 186. The court said that the original was attested by two witnesses and proved before a notary, and "this authentication and the registry of the instrument in 1853 are almost conclusive evidence of the antiquity of the paper; and the same circumstances have a bearing upon the issue as to its genuineness."

But, where the plaintiff in an action to try title to land gives notice, under such statute, that he will offer in evidence a certified copy of the deed under which he claims, in which the defendant appears to be the grantor, and the latter files an affidavit that his signature thereto is a forgery, the plaintiff must prove the due execution of the deed by the defendant according to the rules of the common law. Thompson v. Johnson, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 58 S. W. 1030.

Where a certified copy of the record of a deed to a party to an action is not solely relied upon as evidence of the execution of the original, which cannot be produced, it is admissible as a fact or circumstance tending to show that such a deed has been executed. Burleson v. Collins (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 688.

A certified copy of a deed under which one claims is not admissible upon a showing that the original is in his possession, and that he is absent from the state, and has the deed with him, although, by statute, such copy is competent evidence when it appears that the original is lost, or does not belong to such party, or is not within his control. West v. Cameron, 39 Kan. 736, 18 Pac. 894.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

v.

MELVIN C. RANNEY, Plff. in Err.

(153 Mich. 293, 116 N. W. 999.)

Confession — corroboration — false pretenses.

1. The confession of one charged with obtaining money by false pretenses by means of a worthless check, that the check was, and was known by him to be, worthless, upon which a conviction cannot be had without corroboration, is sufficiently corroborated by evidence that the check was forwarded through the regular channels for collection, and was returned unpaid.

Evidence — corroboration — confession.

Evidence corroborating facts stated in a confession, which is necessary to uphold a conviction on the confession, is that Case Note. — Corpus delicti in false pretenses.

As to what constitutes the corpus delicti, and how it may be proven, are questions which have been the subject of much discussion, even as connected with homicide, arson, and larceny, crimes which are generally cited as clearly showing that the corpus delicti is separate and distinct from the question as to who committed the offense. Where, however, the crime is of such a nature that the body of the offense is intimately connected with the question as to whether or not the accused was guilty, as in forgery and false pretenses, the difficulties are multiplied manifold, and it is probably due to this reason that, so far as a diligent search discloses at least, very few courts have attempted in unequivocal terms to define just what is meant by the phrase corpus delicti, or how far it must be proved in order to render admissible a confession, as connected with the prosecution of one accused of false pretenses; the majority of cases found being simply content with holding that in the particular case the corpus delicti was either corroborated, or, because of the lack of some element, not corroborated, thus rendering the confession of the accused admissible or not admissible, whatever the case may be.

In Johnson v. State, 142 Ala. 1, 37 So. 937, it was held that, in a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, proof of the falsity of the representations is necessary to the establishing of the corpus delicti; and, in the absence of independent evidence of such falsity, the defendant's confession is inadmissible.

In People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440, it was held that, where one is accused of obtaining property under false pretenses, the falsity of the reprewhich not merely tends to produce confidence in the truth of the confession, but which refers to facts which concern the corpus delicti.

Appeal — argument to jury — inaccurate statements.

3. A conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses will not be reversed because the prosecuting attorney, in his argument to the jury, stated that the defendant was committing adultery every day, where he was living with a woman not his wife, and the gist of the argument was not that his relations were such as the word used defines, but that they were immoral and affected the credibility of the accused.

ERROR to the Superior Court of Grand Rapids to review a judgment convicting defendant of obtaining money by false pretenses. Affirmed.

sentations made as to the ownership of land is a material and essential element and portion of the corpus delicti, and his admissions alone cannot be relied upon to establish as sufficient a fact which is a necessary ingredient to form the body of the crime; and therefore where, laying aside the evidence of the defendant's admissions, there is nothing whatever in the record even pointing toward the commission of the crime, thus furnishing a sure and conclusive test that the falsity of the representations is a necessary element of the corpus delicti, the evidence is insufficient to support a conviction.

A similar case, but seemingly carrying the doctrine of proof of the corpus delicti a little farther, is People v. Ward, 145 Cal. 736, 79 Pac. 448, where the court said: "The charge was obtaining money by false pretenses. The elements of this crime necessary to the establishment of the corpus delicti are false statements adapted to the fraudulent purpose, and money parted with upon the faith of such statements. As in other cases, the corpus delicti must be proved by evidence independent of the extrajudicial confessions or admissions of the defendant." For the above statement in regard to the proof of the corpus delicti, the court cited as authority People v. Simonsen, supra. This, it would seem, was somewhat unwarranted on the part of the court, for the Simonsen Case does not hold that the corpus delicti must be proved "independent" of the confession, but merely holds that it cannot be established by the confession alone.

For cases dealing with the question of corpus delicti in arson, see case note to Spears v. State, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 285.

The general question of corpus delicti as connected with all criminal cases is discussed in a subject note to Bines v. State, 68 L.R.A. 33.

Mr. William B. Brown for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John E. Bird, Attorney General, and John W. Powers for the People.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent is charged, in the information, with obtaining money by false pretenses. The pretenses alleged are that he was owner of a certain check and order for the payment of money, that the check was of the value of $50, and that there was, on deposit at the place of payment designated in the check $50 with which to pay it when presented, and that said sum would be paid to the complainant, or bearer, upon presentation of the check, and that there was, at the place of payment, a book No. 583, and would be when the check was presented, and that said book showed a balance on deposit of $478. A copy of the check is set out, as follows:

New York, April 4, 1907.

Union Dime Savings Institution, Broadway, 32d St. & 6th Ave.: Pay on Book No. 583 fifty dollars, to myself or bearer, and this shall be your receipt.

[Signature] L. J. Cameron.

Individually or as trustee, as the book reads. Present address: Grand Rapids, Mich. Previous balance: $478.00.

Indorsed on back: "M. C. Ranney, J. E. Rice."

The record discloses that respondent procured the check to be cashed at a hotel where he was stopping, paid his bill out of the proceeds, and retained the balance. The hotel keeper indorsed the check, and negotiated it with a merchant, who deposited it in a local bank for collection. It was sent by the local bank to New York city, and returned unpaid. There is no other testimony tending to prove that the check was ever presented at the designated place of payment. Beyond the fact that the check was so forwarded and so returned unpaid, there is nothing tending to prove the check was worthless, except an alleged confession of respondent, testified to by officers who had him in charge.

It is contended, and it is the principal question presented, that there was no sufficient proof of the commission of the offense. The proposition advanced is that the commission of a felony cannot be proved by the extrajudicial confession of the accused. Applied to this case, this means that guilt of the respondent may not be determined by his confession that the check was, and was by him known to be, worthless; that the people were bound to show presentation of the check to the Union Dime Savings Institution in New York, if such an institution existed; that it was not drawn against funds; that payment was refused. It is the general rule that the corpus delicti may not be proved by the naked extrajudicial confession of the accused. 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 483; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 582; Wharton, Crim. Ev. 8th ed. §§ 632, 633; People v. Lane, 49 Mich. 340, 13 N. W. 622. The question presented leads to the inquiry: What is the corpus delicti in a case like this one? In 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2072, it is said that an analysis of every crime, with reference to this element of it, reveals three component parts: First, the occurrence of the specific kind of injury or loss (as, in homicide, a person deceased; in arson, a house burnt; in larceny, property missing); secondly, somebody's criminality as the source of the loss,—these two together involving the commission of a crime by somebody;—and, thirdly, the accused's identity as the doer of this crime; that the term corpus delicti seems, in its orthodox and its logical sense, to signify merely the first of these elements, namely, the fact of the specific loss or injury sustained, although some judges (Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, and Chief Justice Church in People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. 137, among others) have held that it also includes the second element. I do not find any general rule laid down by the decisions of this court. Language is employed in People v. Hall, 48 Mich. 482, 485, 42 Am. Rep. 477, 12 N. W. 665, which indicates that in cases of homicide the corpus delicti involves the death and, also, its character, whether probably caused by some one other than the deceased. See also People v. Aikin, 66 Mich. 460, 472-474, 11 Am. St. Rep. 512, 33 N. W. 821; People v. Parmelee, 112 Mich. 291, 74, 295, 70 N. W. 577. The rule that the corpus delicti must be proved by some evidence other than the confession of the accused—that the confession must be corroborated—is recognized in People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 366, 72 Am. Dec. 49; People v. Isham, 109 Mich. 72, 67 N. W. 819; People v. Hawksley, 82 Mich. 71, 73, 74, 45 N. W. 1123, People v. Kemp, 76 Mich. 410, 416, 43 N. W. 439, and People v. Heas, 85 Mich. 128, 132, 48 N. W. 181, but without determining in either case, except perhaps inferentially, what constituted the corpus delicti. In some cases the idea has been expressed that the nature of the offense charged was such that no proof of the corpus delicti could be made as of a separate element of the offense. Such are the cases of People v. Swetland, 77 Mich. 53, 63, 43 N. W. 779, and People v. McGarry, 136 Mich. 316, 324, 99 N. W. 147. In People v. Swetland it was said: "There are some cases where the corpus delicti—generally in homicide—is clearly separated and distinct from the question as to who committed the offense, if any is found to have been committed. In such cases the evidence to establish the corpus delicti must first be given, before acts or admissions of the accused can be put in evidence. But the present case is one where the body of the offense—the uttering of a forged instrument, knowing it to be false—is so intimately connected with the question whether or not the respondent is guilty of the crime that there can be no such separation. The corpus delicti in this case depends entirely for its existence upon the acts and intent of the respondent, so that her acts and admissions, if admissible at all, were admissible at any stage of the proceedings upon the trial."

For the purposes of the present case, it may be conceded that it was necessary that the confession of respondent should be corroborated as to the corpus delicti. Whether we consider only the first or the first and second elements, as stated, as constituting the corpus delicti, there is, in this case, evidence corroborating the facts stated by respondent in his confession. I use the term "corroborate" as meaning, not merely tending, to produce confidence in the truth of the confession, but as referring to facts which concern the corpus delicti. This is the legally correct meaning. 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 2071. There is evidence undisputed—indeed corroborated by respondent—that he applied to Mr. Rice, the keeper of the hotel, to cash the check, that the check was cashed, and respondent received the money. The check was forwarded, in the usual course of business, to New York, and was returned unpaid. It has not been paid, and Mr. Rice has never received his money. Before the check was cashed, and as an inducement, respondent, who was at the hotel with a woman not his wife, and owed the proprietor for entertainment, stated that they were going to Muskegon for three or four days, and would then return to the hotel, and that meantime Mr. Rice could find out whether or not the check was good; that he would leave a big trunk and a typewriter in it. He left the trunk, but no typewriter. He did not return to the hotel, but was arrested in May, at Wheaton, Illinois, where he was known as H. H. Straub. He told Mr. Rice that he had been with a certain firm or institution in New York for ten years, had worked from a window washer up, and that the house always sent such checks to their traveling men. He said that Cameron, the drawer of the check, was a member of the firm. A portion of his confession, according to the testimony, was that a man named Cameron drew the check, respondent was to get it cashed, and they were to "split" the money, and did divide it; that Cameron was more to blame than he (respondent) was; that Cameron "told me that he knew a way to get a little easy money;" that he used an assumed name at Wheaton because afraid he might be arrested, and intended to straighten up this matter when he got to work. There was more to the confession than is here stated, some of it favorable to respondent. But it cannot be said that such portions of it as relate to the corpus delicti are not corroborated by other evidence.

During the trial the prosecuting attorney, over objection, obtained leave of the court to indorse upon the information the name of a witness, who was thereupon called, sworn, and examined. The testimony of this witness, or that of some other person connected with the bank which forwarded the check for collection, was necessary if the fact was to be proved. On a motion, made previous to the trial, to discharge the respondent, the subject was adverted to in such a manner that it is apparent the prosecuting attorney must have known he would probably need the witness at the trial. Counsel for respondent, before learning the nature of the testimony, to be elicited from the new witness, stated that he would need time to send to New York to find out in regard to the check. Upon learning that it was proposed to prove only that the check went through the bank, was sent on for collection, and returned unpaid, he said his position was that the testimony would be incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. It is stated in the brief for respondent that a continuance of the case was asked for and was denied. The record, which is referred to, does not support this statement. The right to further time was asserted, as has been stated, but no motion for time was made, and the necessary inference from the record is that the trial judge did not suppose that a continuance was desired.

Error is assigned upon a statement made in argument by the prosecuting attorney, to the effect that respondent was committing adultery every day. The remark was excepted to. The point made seems to be that there was no proof that either the respondent or the woman he was traveling with was married. But they were registered as man and wife, and respondent testified they were not married. The gist of the argument was, not that the relations were such as the word used defines, but that they were immoral, affecting the credibility of respondent. We should not reverse the conviction upon this ground.

A number of errors are assigned upon the charge as given, and upon refusal to charge as requested. They have been examined, and the charge as given has been carefully read, without our being able to say that any reversible error was committed.

Judgment is affirmed.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

MARIE NEARY et al., Appts.,

v.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Resp'ts.

Negligence — freight conductor — walking on track.

1. An experienced freight conductor is negligent in walking along a track in a yard on which is momentarily expected a passenger train, to check the cars of his train, which he can do as conveniently after the passenger train arrives, with his back to the expected train, and without paying any attention to its approach, at a time when switch engines are at work, the noise of which will obscure, more or less, the signals and noise of the passenger train.

Same — last clear chance — question for jury.

2. Whether or not the negligence of a railroad conductor, who, in his work, negligently placed himself in the way of an expected passenger train, will preclude his holding the railroad company liable for injuries received from the train, is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that the train was running at an extraordinary and illegal rate of speed, not under full control as required by the company's rule, and might have been stopped before striking him after the engineer discovered that he was so absorbed in his work that he was not conscious of his peril; since these facts, if found to exist, would justify an inference of reckless and wanton negligence, justifying a recovery notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff.

Evidence — materiality — custom.

3. Exclusion, in an action for death of a freight conductor by being run over by train while walking along a track to check his train, of evidence that his act was according to custom in railroad yards generally, is not error where he was negligent in becoming so absorbed in his duties as to fail to observe his surroundings.

Servant — negligence — master's acquiescence.

4. A freight conductor cannot justify or excuse his negligence in walking along a track on which a train is momentarily ex-

Note. — This case illustrates the narrowness, from a practical point of view, of the distinction between the doctrine of last clear chance and the rule that contributory negligence will not bar a recovery for a wanton or wilful injury. It will be noticed that in one part of the opinion the court suggests that the evidence was sufficient to justify an inference of "reckless and wanton negligence," but the reversal apparently rests upon the ground that it was not within the province of the trial court to determine, as a matter of law, whether the defendant, by the exercise of "reasonable care," could have stopped the train and saved the decedent's life. If the holding of the court that the decedent was, as a matter of law, guilty of "contributory negligence" in walking on the track were to be construed literally and technically, it would preclude the doctrine of last clear chance. For, as pointed out in a note on this subject in 55 L.R.A. 418, and in case notes in this series, that doctrine does not, even when applicable, permit a recovery in spite of contributory negligence, but operates by stripping the plaintiff's or decedent's antecedent negligence of the character of contributory negligence which it would otherwise bear. (See further, on this point, case note to Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. 7 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

L.R.A. (N.S.) 132.) If, however, the conduct of the defendant transcends negligence, and amounts to a wanton or wilful injury, the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, conceding it to be such, does not prevent a recovery. Practically, however, even the courts which intend to apply the doctrine of last clear chance frequently state it as though it operated to permit a recovery in spite of contributory negligence. As the evidence in the foregoing case clearly warranted a finding that the engineer saw the decedent and realized his peril, and could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have prevented the accident, the fact that the decedent's negligence apparently continued up to the very moment of the accident would not, perhaps, have prevented a recovery under the "humanitarian" doctrine, so-called, even if the defendant's conduct had been regarded as nothing more than negligence. According to the better view, however, it would have been fatal to the application of the doctrine of last clear chance if the negligence on the part of the engineer had consisted of the mere failure to discover the decedent's peril, even assuming that there was a duty on his part to discover it. (See Muse v. Seaboard A. L. R. Co. post, 453, and earlier notes in the present series on this aspect of the question.)

pected, to check his train, by showing that the company passively acquiesced in the use of tracks for that purpose.

Evidence — particular fact — general custom.

5. The fact that the space between a main and repair track of a railroad company is at times obstructed so that it cannot be used by conductors in checking their trains is not admissible to show that it was obstructed at the time a particular conductor was injured while attempting to use the main track for that purpose.

Unless it is clearly shown that the injury complained of was the direct, proximate result of the unlawful speed of the train, without any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it is foreign to the case, and gives him no right of recovery.

Brantly, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents for review a judgment upon a verdict directed for the defendants at the close of the evidence submitted by the plaintiff. The action was brought by the plaintiff Marie Neary in her own right as the widow and heir at law of James S. Neary, deceased, and as the guardian of her minor children, to recover damages for the death of the husband and father, which, it is charged, was caused by the negligence of the defendant railway company and its engineer.

The defendant company owns extensive yards at Billings, Montana. At this point the line of its railroad extends east and west, with a slightly downward grade toward the east. There are, including the main line, nine parallel tracks. To the left, going east on the main line, is track No. 1, about 14 inches lower than the main line. Measured from rail to rail, the distance between the main line and this track is variously stated by witnesses at from 5 to 8 feet. To the north of this are two other tracks, designated as the "scale lead" and the "house" tracks. Immediately to the right is a repair track, at a distance of 10 feet from the main track, so called because used to hold cars undergoing repairs. At the time of the accident there were cars on this track. The other tracks are further toward the south. The defendant company and the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railway Company make joint use of these yards and tracks, the trains of the latter leaving its line, which ends at Huntley, 12 miles to the east, and running upon the main line of the defendant company, thence into the yards. Under this arrangement, Billings becomes the western terminus of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy line. Its west-bound trains are either broken up at this point, or are transferred to the defendant company, and its east-bound trains, except the passenger trains, which are transferred to it at this point by the defendant company, are made up there. The employees of both companies frequently go upon all of these tracks in the performance of their duties. The deceased was in the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy company as a freight conductor, and had brought his train into Billings at least fifty times during the previous eight months. The yards extend through the central portion of the city, and for most of the distance—several thousand feet—lie within the city limits. On the morning of April 29, 1905, the train of the deceased, having been made up for an outgoing run to Sheridan, Wyoming, was standing on track No. 1, headed toward the east, awaiting the coming in of passenger train No. 6 from the west on the line of the defendant company. The engine was attached and steam was up. It was to follow train No.

6 to Huntley, where the latter also left the main line of the defendant company and became No. 42 on the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy road. Train No. 6 was due at 9:10 o'clock. While it was a few minutes late, its arrival was momentarily expected; in fact, it arrived nearly on time. The passenger depot is near the east end of the yards. The engine of the outgoing freight train stood at a point about 800 feet west from this depot. The train was about 1,300 feet in length, thus putting the caboose attached to its rear end about 2,100 feet from the depot. There is a street crossing about 300 feet west of the depot. Witness Gintz, who was a brakeman on the train of the deceased, testified that about 9:10 o'clock he came to the caboose to change his shoes and to get the train ready to leave; that, as he went in, he met the deceased going out to check the train,—that is, to take the numbers, lettering, etc., on the cars constituting it, and write them into his designation book,—that this was one of his duties; that he did not again see him alive; that it was customary for one checking trains to walk along on the right-hand side toward the engine parallel to the train, about 6 feet distant, in order to obtain an easy view of the numbers and lettering; that when in the yards, as in this instance, the conductor in checking his train walks between the rails of the track immediately to the right, because the numbers are on the right, if the track is clear; that this was the customary way of checking trains in the Billings yards; that a distance of 6 feet from the train as it stood that morning would put the deceased between the rails of the main track; that the main track to the west for $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles is straight and the view unobstructed; that a few minutes after entering the caboose he heard the noise of train No. 6, about half a mile away, and saw it through the rear door; that it passed the caboose, being then within the city limits, at the rate of 25 to 30 miles per hour; and that, as it did so, the whistle was blown, giving a rolling sound. From statements of a witness who was at the passenger depot waiting for the incoming train, and another who was standing in the yards between the main line and track No. 1, about 200 yards away, and witnessed the accident from that point, it appeared that the deceased was at that time engaged in checking his train, walking eastward between the rails of the main line. The latter of these states that he heard a whistle, and, upon turning to look, saw the train within "a rail and a half" of the deceased, and that immediately afterwards it struck him, throwing him in the air half as high as a box car and to the right. The deceased seemed to be writing, standing with his back toward the incoming train. When the train was stopped, immediately after the collision, the body of the deceased was found lying opposite one of the Pullman cars attached to train No. 6, close to the repair track, and about 600 feet from the caboose. It was picked up, and taken on the train to the depot. The other witness stated that he was standing at the passenger depot observing the train as it came in; that he did not hear the whistle; that he saw no emission of steam; and that he did not hear the bell ring. This train consisted of 9 cars, and was about 600 feet in length. By the application of the air brake, such a train could be stopped within 250 or 300 feet when going at the rate of 20 or 30 miles per hour. If going at the rate of 6 miles per hour, it could be stopped within a distance of 6 feet. Application of the air brake in emergencies—that is, with full braking power—would cause passengers in the Pullman to experience a jar. None was felt by the stopping of the train at this time. Several switch engines were at work in the yards, making more or less noise. Train No. 6 was due to leave at 9:30. The employees of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy company had time cards showing the hour of its departure from Billings, but none of the hour of arrival. The atmosphere was clear, and the sight and hearing of the deceased were good. There was an ordinance of the city of Billings in force at the time declaring it unlawful to move trains within the city limits at a rate of speed exceeding 6 miles per hour. A rule of the defendant company, introduced in evidence, is as follows: "(a) All trains must approach terminals, the ends of double tracks, junctions, railroad crossings at grade, and drawbridges prepared to stop, and must not proceed until switches or signals are seen to be right, or the track seen to be clear. Where required by law, all trains must stop. (e) All trains must approach and pass through yards under full control." The words "under full control," as used in this rule, are understood by railroad men to mean "ready to stop at any moment; there is danger ahead."

The complaint alleges that the deceased was upon the track in the performance of his duties; that his presence there was well known to the defendant Frost, who was driving the engine of the passenger train; that he, through gross and wanton negligence, failed to give any signal of the train's approach; that, through his gross and wanton negligence, he was running at an unlawful and dangerous rate of speed; that, because of these gross and wanton acts of negligence, he failed to stop the train, and thus prevent the accident; and hence that the death of the deceased was due to the gross and wanton negligence of the defendants. The defendants allege that the death of the deceased was due to his own negligence. The trial of the issues resulted as above stated. The principal questions presented for decision are two: (1) Was the deceased as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence? (2) Is contributory negligence a bar to recovery in this case?

1. The first of these questions must, we think, be answered in the affirmative. But one legitimate inference can be drawn from the facts stated. The deceased was a man of experience,—so much so that he had been put in charge of a train. He had been in and out of these yards many times during the preceding eight months, and must be presumed to have been acquainted not only with the hazardous character of his employment generally, but also with the special dangers to be encountered there, for, he had performed the same duties there at least fifty times during these months. Several switch engines were at work and the noise from them tended necessarily, as he knew, to obscure more or less the signals and noise of the east-bound train, which he momentarily expected to arrive. So far as the proof shows, he could have checked his train as well after the arrival of train 6. With this experience and knowledge, he left the caboose of his train at a time when there was no pressing necessity or emergency calling him, got upon the track upon which the train was expected, the most perilous position he could have assumed, and proceeded in the opposite direction to check his train, allowing himself to become so absorbed in his task as to be apparently entirely oblivious of his surroundings. The track was clear behind him for a long distance. He did not turn to look, nor did he notice the sound of the whistle as the train approached, a fact which emphasizes his inattention. He had ample time to step off the track no matter what the rate of speed was at which the train approached, or whether it was running in violation of the rule or the ordinance, or not. The slightest attention would have prevented the collision. Assuming that he would ordinarily have had a right to proceed between the rails as he did, instead of upon the vacant space between the tracks, this did not excuse him from the exercise of at least ordinary care and diligence to preserve his own safety. A railway track, known to be constantly in use, is itself a warning of danger. It is the duty of one attempting to cross it to look and listen. Failure to use this precaution is such contributory negligence as to preclude recovery for an injury inflicted by a passing train. Hunter v. Montana C. R. Co. 22 Mont. 525, 57 Pac. 140; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 542; Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 150 U. S. 245, 37 L. ed. 1068, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85. With greater reason does the principle apply to one who goes upon the track and travels laterally along it (Kenna v. Central P. R. Co. 101 Cal. 26, 35 Pac. 332), especially if he knows that a train is momentarily expected. While the rule stated by these cases may not be applied strictly to the employees of a railway company who, in the discharge of their duties, are expected or required to be upon or near the track, yet to say that it has no application would be equivalent to an unqualified statement of a rule that would in all cases absolve the employees from using ordinary care for their own safety. They have a right to rely to some extent upon the persons in charge of moving trains to give the proper signals and to take proper precautions to prevent accidents, but they have no right to rely wholly upon them, but must use due care to avoid danger. And that this rule is applied with more or less strictness, in view of the circumstances of the particular case, is shown by the decisions of the courts generally. Keefe v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 92 Iowa, 182, 54 Am. St. Rep. 542, 60 N. W. 503; Cahill v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 205 Mo. 393, 103 S. W. 532; St. Jean v. Boston & M. R. Co. 170 Mass. 213, 48 N. E. 1088; Wilber v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 86 Wis. 535, 57 N. W. 356; Collins v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 83 Iowa, 346, 49 N. W. 848; Carlson v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 120 Mich. 481, 79 N. W. 688; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Yost, 56 Neb. 439, 76 N. W. 901; Brady v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 20 R. I. 338, 39 Atl. 186; Harrison v. Texas & P. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 242; Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 758, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 835; Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 150 U. S. 245, 37 L. ed. 1068, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85; Dyer v. Union P. R. Co. 74 Kan. 528, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 132, 87 Pac. 680, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 207; Buckmaster v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 108 Wis. 353, 84 N. W. 845; Sours v. Great Northern R. Co. 84 Minn. 230, 87 N. W. 766; Sharp v. Missouri P. R. Co. 161 Mo. 214, 61 S. W. 829. The rule is a just one, and is necessary to the successful operation of railways. Otherwise the employee would be excused entirely from the use of his faculties, and the necessity cast upon the employer to provide for his safety would make him practically an insurer.

2. But it is not an invariable rule that, where one, through his own negligence, puts himself in a place of danger, he is for this reason alone, as a matter of law, denied recovery for injuries inflicted by another. The general rule that one's own negligence in such case precludes recovery is subject to the qualification that, where the defendant has discovered, or should have discovered, the peril of the plaintiff's or deceased's position, and it is apparent that he cannot escape therefrom or for any reason does not make an effort to do so, the duty becomes imperative for the defendant to use all reasonable care to avoid the injury; and, if this is not done, he becomes liable, notwithstanding the negligence of the injured party. And this is true, not only as to technical trespassers upon a railway track in the way of passing trains, but also as to employees who may become so absorbed in the performance of their duties that they do not observe signals. In no case may the railway company, after the peril becomes apparent to those in charge of a train, and especially so after it is obvious that the danger is not appreciated by the person in the perilous situation, omit any reasonable effort to stop the train and prevent injury. On this subject it is said by Mr. Thompson in his work on Negligence: "It must be kept in mind that this obligation of care and effort does not necessarily commence at the time when the men who are driving the train see the trespasser on the track, for he may be a mile away, and in no immediate danger. It arises at the moment when he is seen to be in a perilous situation. Then, but not until then, the effort to stop the train must commence. In fact, the language of most of the decisions which speak upon this question speak of the obligation of care and effort in favor of the trespasser as arising at the point of time when his perilous situation is discovered or is known. They must have become aware both of his presence and his peril. When this condition arises, their obligation of care and effort to avert injuring him is exactly the same as though he were lawfully upon the track. Where those who are driving the train fail in the discharge of this duty after discovering the perilous situation of the trespasser, his contributory negligence in getting himself into the dangerous situation is eliminated from the case. . . . This duty is stronger and clearer in regard to employees working upon the track; because they are rightfully there, and their presence is always to be anticipated by the engineer, and he is consequently bound, in the exercise of reasonable care, to give them signals of the approach of his train. Their position, on the other hand, is that of men absorbed in their work, entitled to presume that the signals will be given. Moreover, if, by reason of being absorbed in their work, they fail to heed the signals, the law will extend some indulgence to their negligence, and will not exonerate the company if the engineer, seeing that they did not heed the signals and attempt to leave the track, fails to make any effort to stop his train, if there is time to do so, so as to avoid injuring them." 2 Thomp. Neg. § 1735. And, as pointed out by this author, it is frequently a question of fact as to whether the railway company has observed all the required precautions.

There are many cases in the books where it has been held upon conditions very similar to those shown in this case that the negligence of the employee as a matter of law precludes a recovery; but we are of the opinion that the facts stated here made a case for the jury. The train was running at an extraordinary and illegal rate of speed, and does not appear to have been under full control as required by the rule. Even so, it could have been stopped within 300 feet. The deceased was apparently busy checking his train, and so completely absorbed in his task that he was unconscious of his peril. The engineer evidently saw him, for the evidence tends to show that he sounded the whistle. If this was done while the train was near the caboose, he had more than twice the distance necessary to stop the train. If it was not done until he was within a rail and a half of the deceased, and while going at the rate of 30 miles an hour, this precaution would seem to have been entirely ineffectual and useless, for the deceased was still so absorbed in his work that he did not notice it, and, if he had done so, had then less than three seconds to get out of the way; whereas, if the engineer had been obeying the ordinance and had his train under full control, it could have been brought to a standstill within 6 feet. Prima facie the facts give room for an inference of reckless and wanton negligence, justifying a recovery in the absence of countervailing evidence. Such is the variety of incident entering into each case that it is difficult to find any two alike, and each must be determined by its own facts and circumstances. The following, however, are more or less in point, to the effect that a trial court may not, under such circumstances, conclude, as a matter of law, that the defendant had discharged itself from liability by observing all the precautions which the emergency required: Riley v. Northern P. R. Co. 36 Mont. 545, 93 Pac. 948; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Morlay, 30 C. C. A. 6, 58 U. S. App. 526, 86 Fed. 240; Bouwmeester v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 63 Mich. 557, 30 N. W. 337; Kelley v. Chi- or 8 feet south of the siding, waiting for an engine backing down the siding to reach that point, for the purpose of talking to the engineer. The engine was backing to a train of freight cars down the siding. While he was standing in this position, some part of the train caught the end of a plank lying on the east side of a skid, at an angle of about 30 degrees, violently throwing it against plaintiff, inflicting serious injury. Plaintiff did not notice any lumber lying at the place liable to come in contact with the car. "Railroad street" was on defendant's right of way. The injury sustained, as described, constitutes plaintiff's first cause of action. After he was struck by the scantling, the train moved again, and, while he was down, he was again struck by a plank and injured, and this constitutes his second cause of action. The defendant denied that it was guilty of negligence, and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The usual issues raised by the pleadings were submitted to the jury, who found, upon the first cause of action, that defendant was guilty of negligence, and that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Upon the second cause of action they found for the plaintiff upon both issues, and assessed his damages at $3,800, for which judgment was signed. Plaintiff noted numerous exceptions to his Honor's ruling upon the issue of contributory negligence, and from a refusal to grant a new trial upon that issue appealed.

Plaintiff concedes that "the only exceptions which require notice cluster around the question of contributory negligence." While it is conceded that the strip of land upon which plaintiff was standing when he was injured has been used by the public for many years, it is a part of defendant's right of way, and by permitting the use of it, as described, it lost none of its rights to use it for "railroad purposes." A railroad company owns its right of way as a necessary means of discharging its duty, as a common carrier, to the public, and cannot dispose of it, or, by permissive user as a pass way, confer any rights upon the public inconsistent with the purpose for which it has been acquired, by any of the methods known to the law or named in the charter. The right of way is dedicated to a public use. It is for this reason protected against loss by adverse or permissive possession of its right of way. Revisal 1905, § 388. Carolina C. R. Co. v. McCaskill, 94 N. C. 746; Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Olive, 142 N. C. 257, 55 S. E. 263. The fact, therefore, that the defendant permitted the public to use a portion of the right of way, and that it was called "Railroad street," upon which plaintiff was standing when injured, does not affect the defendant's right to place the lumber on the right of way. The defendant had a right to place such structures or obstructions on it as were necessary or convenient for the conduct of its business as a common carrier. It also had a right to pile lumber or other material on it, either for its own or the use of its patrons, and the officers and agents are the sole judges of such necessity or convenience, subject, of course, to the police power of the town, as any other property owner. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Olive, supra. When, therefore, the plaintiff went upon the right of way, as described by him self, he was at best but a permissive licensee, and the duty of the defendant to avoid injuring him, and his own duty to avoid being injured, is measured by the well-settled rules of law in regard to persons occupying that relation. He was not on the right of way for the purpose of transacting any business with the defendant, or its employees within the scope of their employment. We have uniformly applied the principle fixing the relative rights and duties of the company and persons going upon its right of way to cases coming before us. The last case was Bailey v. North Carolina R. Co. (N. C.) 62 S. E. 912. As illustrative of its application in this case, our attention is called, in defendant's brief, to a number of decisions of other courts.

In West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. v. State, 96 Md. 652, 61 L.R.A. 574, 54 Atl. 669, the plaintiff's intestate, a boy, who, it was alleged, was standing in a yard adjoining the right of way of the defendant railway company, was killed as a result of a box car being negligently thrown from the railway track by reason of a collision between two trains. The court held that, if the boy was standing off the right of way, he might be entitled to recover, but that, if he was standing on the right of way, he was a trespasser, to whom the company owed no duty except not to wilfully or wantonly injure him, and he would not be entitled to recover.

In Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Manning v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co.) 36 W. Va. 329, 16 L.R.A. 271, 32 Am. St. Rep. 859, 15 S. E. 81, the plaintiff's intestate, without express invitation, visited the telegraph office of the defendant for the purpose of paying a friendly call to the operator; the office being located on the right of way. While in the office one of the defendant's trains was derailed, on account of the negligence of its servant in leaving a switch open, and ran into the telegraph office and killed the plaintiff's intestate. The court denied the right of the plaintiff to recover, on the ground that his intestate was a mere trespasser, and the defendant owed him no duty other than not to wilfully injure him.

In Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 645, 24 L.R.A. 215, 18 S. E. 782, plaintiff's intestate was standing on the defendant's right of way, within two steps of a public highway, and 15 feet of a mail crane, for the purpose of watching the postal clerk catch the mail bag that had been suspended from the crane, while the train was in motion. In some way, as the postal clerk undertook to make the catch, a sliver from the mail crane broke off, and was hurled against the plaintiff's intestate, killing him. In denying the right of the plaintiff to recover, the court held that his intestate was a mere trespasser, or, at most, a permissive licensee, and the defendant, therefore, owed him no duty other than not to wilfully or wantonly injure him, and was consequently not legally responsible for his death; the court saying: "He was there simply as a looker-on to see the mail train go by and a mail agent make the flying catch of the mail pouch. Therefore he was a mere trespasser, or, at best, a voluntary licensee. The company made no change to endanger him after he came. It owed him no duty that was violated. . . . It was a case in which the unexpected happened, and its liability to happen could not be foreseen, and is only proved by the actual happening."

In Holland v. Sparks, 92 Ga. 753, 18 S. E. 990, plaintiff's intestate was walking along near the defendant's track, upon its right of way, when a freight train was derailed as a result of being negligently run too rapidly, and one of the cars struck plaintiff's intestate and killed him. In holding the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, the court said: "In the present case it was insisted that the servants in charge of the defendant's freight train were running it at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and that this conduct on their part amounted to negligence. Most probably it was a violation of the duty which these servants owed to the company, and to those whose property was being transported by the train, and in this sense their conduct may have been negligent. But we do not think their failure to observe due care and diligence in running the train was negligence, as against one in no way connected therewith, and whose injury, by its rapid running and derailment, was a consequence so remote as to require almost the gift of prophecy to anticipate it."

So, in the leading case of Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, cited with approval in Quartz v. Southern R. Co. 137 N. C. 139, 49 S. E. 79, the court said: "So a licensee who enters on premises by permission only, without any enticement, allurement, or inducement being held out to him by the owner or occupant, cannot recover damages for injuries caused by obstructions or pitfalls. He goes there at his own risk, and enjoys the license subject to its concomitant perils. No duty is imposed by law on the owner or occupant to keep his premises in a suitable condition for those who come there solely for their own convenience or pleasure."

which was habitually used by pedestrians, was injured by being struck by a brake shoe, which was thrown from a train running in the opposite direction on a parallel track, on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant in permitting the defective shoe to be upon its train. In holding that the plaintiff in no view of the law was entitled to recover, the court said: "The plaintiff was on the defendant's right of way, enjoying the privilege merely of a licensee in walking thereon, and the company owed him no other or greater duty than not to negligently or wantonly injure him. The evidence in no way shows that the injury was the result of negligence on the part of the company. . . . 'If there is no evidence of a wilful, reckless, or wanton disregard to human life on the part of the operatives of the train, there is nothing for a jury to pass upon, and the court should sustain a demurrer to the evidence. . . .' The courts make a distinction between a person who comes upon railroad's premises at the invitation of the railroad company, or for some purpose connected with its business, and a person who goes upon such premises for his own convenience or pleasure. In the one case there is a duty to protect the person thus going upon the property of another from injury while on his premises, while as to the other there is no such duty." Peterson v. South & Western R. Co. 143 N. C. 265, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1240, 118 Am. St. Rep. 799, 55 S. E. 618. In Ray v. Aberdeen & R. F. R. Co. 141 N. C. 84, 53 S. E. 622, the plaintiff was a passenger, and was injured by a backing train. The question of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury.

Upon the second issue his Honor instructed the jury that, "if they found by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff, by the exercise of that care which an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under similar circumstances, could have discovered that the said piece of scantling was lying so dangerously near the defendant's side track as to make it probable that it would be struck by the passing train and injure the plaintiff in the way he was injured, in time to have avoided being so injured, then the court charges you that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence of the defendant in bringing about his injury, and you will answer the second issue 'Yes.'" While it is by no means clear that, in the light of the plaintiff's evidence, he may not have told the jury to answer the first issue in the negative, that question is not presented, and we do not decide it. Certainly, however, when his Honor placed upon the plaintiff the same standard to avoid being injured as he imposed upon the defendant to avoid injuring him, the plaintiff cannot complain. The defendant was using, in a lawful way, and for a lawful purpose, its right of way, while plaintiff, in the most favorable view for him, was a voluntary or permissive licensee. He had the same, if not better, opportunity of seeing the physical conditions by which he was surrounded as the defendant's employees. There was no concealed danger. The pile of lumber and the position of the plank or scantling were obvious. It is true that he did not see or observe that the plank was in a position to be struck by the backing train, and it is also true that defendant's employees did not see or observe it. Conceding that it was the duty of one to do so, why was it not equally the duty of the other? Why, as contended by plaintiff, was defendant guilty of negligence in not seeing the position of the plank, and he relieved of all obligation to see it, standing within 2 or 3 feet of the pile while defendant's employees were discharging their duty on the moving train? The jury found that both should have done so, and by the exercise of reasonable care could have prevented the accident. The negligence of both continued up to the last moment, leaving no element of the last clear chance in the case. In this condition of the record it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot recover. The jury having found, under his Honor's instructions, that the plaintiff, in the exercise of the care of an ordinarily prudent man, under similar circumstances, could have discovered that the piece of scantling was lying so dangerously near the track as to make it probable that it would be struck by a passing train, and injure him in the way he was injured, in time to have avoided being so injured, no other conclusion could be reached than that his failure to get out of the danger from the train, which he knew was backing, and for which he was waiting, was the proximate cause of the injury. Both parties are held to correlative duties, not necessarily or always the same, but regulated by the relation which they occupy in respect to the transaction or occurrence, by reason of which the injury is caused. The owner of premises in their lawful use owes to a trespasser or permissive licensee a duty, the standard of which is fixed by law. The trespasser or licensee owes to himself, while on the premises, a duty also fixed by law. If, by reason of the failure of both to act up to the standard, the trespasser or licensee is injured, and such failure is concurrent with and continues up to the moment of the impact, the law attributes the injury to his failure, and not to that of the defendant, and does not permit a recovery. This is the basis upon which the doctrine of contributory negligence, which bars a recovery, is founded. This was the sole question involved in this case upon the second issue. His Honor properly defined the plaintiff's duty, and the jury found that he failed to act up to the standard. Many of the numerous requests for instructions were calculated to confuse the real question and mislead the jury. We do not mean that they were so intended. In every case involving liability for alleged negligent conduct, either of commission or omission of duty, the decision may be simplified, and much confusing language eliminated, by keeping in mind the elemental truth that the real inquiry is whether there has, in the concrete case, been a breach of duty by either or both parties.

This being answered, the sole remaining inquiry is whether the proximate cause of the conditions produced by such breach of duty is located. Usually the questions combine both law and fact, and the latter must be decided by the jury. In some exceptional cases, upon well-settled principles, the question is one of law, to be decided by the court by instructions to the jury, or upon demurrer to the evidence. His Honor put the real question upon the second issue in its simplest form, and at the same time comprehended every essential element involved. Many of the exceptions have no relation to the question of contributory negligence, and were properly refused. It is well settled that, when the charge given presents every phase of the controversy, with correct instructions as to the law, a new trial will not be awarded for failure to give the instructions asked, although they may involve correct propositions of law. The instructions given bring the case within this rule. We do not find any merit in the exceptions to the admission and rejection of testimony. His Honor properly exercised his discretion in denying the motion to set aside the verdict on account of the alleged misconduct of the jury. The wisdom of the well-settled rule excluding evidence from the jurors tending to impeach their verdict is illustrated in this case. Upon the whole evidence the deplorable injury sustained by the plaintiff appears to have been one of those accidents which overtake men in life for which it is impossible to account, or to affix any moral or legal accountability. While the jury may well have found this to be so, they have reached the same result by fixing blame on both parties. This is one of the tendencies of the human mind, the other and more charitable being to attribute to unforeseen and uncontrollable causes many of the incidents of human life. The plaintiff recovered substantial damages on his second cause of action, and it would seem that the jury, within the latitude necessarily, and perhaps wisely, given them, have done substantial justice. At least there is no error entitling either party to further prolong the litigation.

The judgment must be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

NICHOLAS C. FRIES, Appt.,

v.

LEWIS F. OSBORN et al., Respts.

(190 N. Y. 35, 82 N. E. 716.)

Evidence — will — intent.

The mere fact that a will, making no reference to real estate, gives legacies in excess of testator's personalty, will not admit evidence that testator meant by the legacies to repay money loaned him for the purchase of the realty, and therefore intended them to be a charge upon it.

Case Note. — Admissibility of extrinsic evidence for the purpose of charging property with payment of legacies or debts where the will is silent on that point.

The scope of this note is limited strictly to cases where there is no language in the will susceptible of interpretation on the point, extrinsic evidence being relied upon to read into it a provision on the subject.

The doctrine of the case reported finds support in the very nearly parallel case of Heslop v. Gatton, 71 Ill. 528, where a testatrix died testate as to her personal property only, the will containing no devise of real estate whatever. The personal property not specifically disposed of was insufficient to pay the principal legacy, but no intention of the testatrix to charge her real estate with the payment of this legacy was expressly declared by the will, nor was there anything in the language of the will from which such intention could be fairly and satisfactorily inferred. It was argued that it was the intention of the testatrix that the legacy should be paid out of the proceeds of the real estate, and that she knew that unless it was so paid it must fail; and a bill filed for the construction of the will set out, as affording evidence of such intention, the state of the property of the testatrix, which consisted for the most part of real estate; that her income was derived from an interest in a life estate, determinable on her death, and was absorbed by her annual expenses; and that it was her intention to convert her real estate into money, and that she had given for that purpose a power of attorney to sell it. The court said: "Without adverting to the force of such circumstances as evidence to show the intention to charge the real estate with the payment of the legacy, in APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming an interlocutory judgment of a Special Term for Livingston County upon the report of a referee in defendants' favor in a proceeding to partition certain real estate in which defendants sought to charge legacies in the will of Michael J. Fries, deceased, upon the property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edwin A. Nash, with Mr. Newton B. Gorham, for appellant:

The real estate of a decedent cannot be charged with the payment of legacies, unless there is a devise either expressly charging the real estate, or from which it can be inferred that there was an intention on the part of the testator so to charge his real estate.

Lupton v. Lupton, 2 Johns. Ch. 623; McCorn, v. McCorn, 100 N. Y. 513, 3 N. E. 480; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 16 N. Y. 259.

case they were admissible for such purpose, we are clearly of opinion that such extrinsic evidence cannot be resorted to, to show what the testatrix intended, under the rules of evidence applicable to the construction of wills. Generally, a will is not to be construed by anything dehors, where there is no latent ambiguity, and parol evidence is not admissible to show the intention of the testator against the construction on the face of the will, and the state of his property cannot be resorted to, to explain the intention."

A similar decision was made in Wentworth v. Read, 166 Ill. 139, 46 N. E. 777, where a testator who, neither at the time of making the will nor at the time of his death, owned or possessed more than an inconsiderable amount of personal property, his estate consisting almost wholly of real property, gave legacies to a considerable amount, his will upon its face neither expressly nor impliedly making such legacies a lien or charge upon his real estate. The court said: "It is insisted that the will should be read in the light of extrinsic facts and circumstances which existed when it was made and when it took effect, and which were well known to the testator; and that, when so read and considered, the implication arises that the testator intended to charge these legacies upon his real estate. It is, however, well settled that the intention of the testator must be determined by the will itself, and not from evidence aliunde. There is no latent ambiguity in the will requiring parol evidence to explain, and, where the intention to make the legacies a charge upon the real estate is not expressed in the will, or cannot be implied from the language used, we know of no rule of law which would authorize us to go outside of the will to look for proof of such intention."

In McGough v. Hughes, 18 R. I. 768, 30 Atl. 851, it was held that parol evidence was not admissible to prove that the testator had no personal estate out of which legacies could be paid, for the purpose of creating an inference that, as the will was made only a few days before the testator's death, he must have known that the legacies could be paid only out of his real estate, and hence, that he must have intended to charge the payment of them thereon, where the will contained no express charge on the real estate, nor any language from which the charge could be implied, and made no mention of, or reference to, the real estate, nor even contained a gift of the residue of the estate under which real estate might pass.

The Pennsylvania courts also recognize the doctrine that there must be something on the face of a will from which an intention of the testator to create a charge on real estate can be inferred. Okeson's Appeal, 59 Pa. 99; Duval's Estate, 146 Pa. 176, 23 Atl. 231.

In Bishop v. Howarth, 59 Conn. 455, 22 Atl. 432, it was held that oral evidence was inadmissible to show the actual intention of the testator in regard to the payment of a mortgage debt on property devised.

In Golder v. Chandler, 87 Me. 63, 32 Atl. 784, where a will made no mention of life insurance, and no expression in it afforded any evidence that the testator intended to change the direction which the law gives to such insurance money; but it appeared that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts and bequests in the will,—it was held that parol evidence was not admissible, upon the ground of latent ambiguity in the will, to show an alleged intention on the part of the testator that such life insurance should be considered as part of his personal estate.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of partition. The appellant and various defendants are the relatives and heirs at law of one Michael J. Fries, who died leaving no descendants. The respondents are relatives of his deceased wife and legatees under his will. The dispute between them is summarized in the question submitted to us, whether certain legacies to the latter are a charge upon real estate of the testator which descended to the former. In the answer which we are about to give to this question we feel constrained to differ with the decisions of the learned courts below, which have held that such legacies were such a charge.

The will which presents the question, outside of clauses respectively directing the payment of debts and funeral expenses and appointing an executor, contains simply and solely the following provision: "Second. I give and bequeath to my brother-in-law, Lewis F. Osborn, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00), and to my sisters-in-law, namely, Ella Harding, Mary Kilbury, Jennie Southgate, the sum of three hundred dollars ($300.00) each, and my sister-in-law, Dora F. Osborn, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00), and my niece Gladis Kilbury and my nephew Lewis S. Osborn, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00) each." From evidence, much of which was received over sufficient objections and exceptions, the court has found, amongst other things, that the testator left sufficient personal property to pay only a small portion of the legacies after satisfaction of debts; that at the time of making the will he knew the value of his personal property and the amount of his debts; that the father of the decedent's wife had advanced $1,000 on the purchase price of a

The doctrine of the case reported is also supported by the statement of the rule in 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1351, that the intention of a testator to charge legacies upon his real property cannot be inferred from circumstances altogether extrinsic to the will, and that evidence aliunde is not admissible to show a testator's intention, unless there is a latent ambiguity in the will.

There seem, however, to be considerable differences of opinion as to when a will is susceptible of interpretation, and, while it is not purposed to go into the general question, some reference to certain decisions where the provisions of the will appeared to afford a very slender basis for admission of extrinsic evidence may properly be made in this connection.

In Leigh v. Savidge, 14 N. J. Eq. 124, it was said that, while the authorities are by no means agreed as to whether parol evidence is admissible as to the amount and nature of the testator's estate, or other extrinsic circumstances, in order to ascertain the testator's intention to charge the legacies upon real estate or to exonerate the personality; and although the decided weight of the English authorities would seem to be against it,—it is well settled in New Jersey that such evidence is admissible; and it was accordingly held, where a testator gave numerous pecuniary legacies and devised his house and lot to his widow for life, directing that on her death it should be sold and the money equally divided between certain persons, no disposition whatever being made of the balance of his real estate, concluding with the appointment of executors, "investing them with all power necessary to execute that ample trust," that evidence was admissible that, at the date of the will, the testator's personal property was entirely inadequate to satisfy the legacies given by the will, and so continued up to the testator's death, but that the amount of the legacies given by the testator, making a reasonable allowance for the costs and expenses of settling his estate, was equal to the combined value of his personal and real estate not specifically devised.

But even if the New Jersey doctrine be regarded as at variance with the foregoing cases, the substantial result is the same, as it is held that, although the insufficiency of the personal estate to pay legacies, when so made to appear, creates a strong impression in favor of an intention to charge them, yet, standing alone, it is not enough, as against heirs, to effect such a charge. Leigh v. Savidge, supra; Johnson v. Poulson, 32 N. J. Eq. 390; Turner v. Gibb, 48 N. J. Eq. 526, 22 Atl. 580.

In Stuart v. Robinson, 80 Miss. 200, 92 Am. St. Rep. 603, 31 So. 903, where a testatrix on her deathbed, knowing that she had neither money nor personalty sufficient to satisfy pecuniary bequests, made a will making various dispositions of her property, specifically devising her real estate, it was held that her situation and surroundings might be considered in determining whether the pecuniary legacies should be charged upon the lands.

In Theobald v. Fugman, 64 Ohio St. 473, 60 N. E. 606, it was held that legacies not specifically charged upon real estate will nevertheless be held to be charged upon such real estate, and be a lien thereon, where it appears that the testator, at the time the will was made and at his decease, had no moneys or personal estate of any kind out of which such legacies could be paid, unless a contrary intention is manifest from the whole will.

farm deceded to testator and owned by him at the time of his death; that the latter had intended that his wife's relatives should be repaid by will, or otherwise the sum so advanced with interest for many years; that the will was drawn by a person ignorant of the law relating to wills; and, finally, "that the said testator . . . intended to and did charge the real estate with the payment of the legacies mentioned in his will." Obviously the will under consideration does not expressly charge the legacies upon the testator's real estate. But the rule is invoked that extrinsic evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of showing an intention to so charge such legacies which will be binding in the construction of the will, although express provision to that effect is wanting.

It will therefore be well to place before us the rule upon this subject as it has been stated at various times and as unquestionably it now runs. In Lupton v. Lupton, 2 Johns. Ch. 614, 623, it is said: "The real estate is not, as of course, charged with the payment of legacies. It is never charged unless the testator intended it should be, and that intention must be either expressly declared, or fairly and satisfactorily inferred, from the language and disposition of the will." In Bevan v. Cooper, 72 N. Y. 317, 322, it is said: "There are some rules which are well settled as to the payment or charging of general legacies. One is that the primary fund for the payment of them is the personal estate. It is one which is to be observed, unless express direction otherwise is found in the will, or there be a clear intent to the contrary to be gathered from the provisions of the will, which may be assisted by the extraneous circumstances of the case." It is further written in this case: "It is said that the mere fact of giving legacies by the testator furnishes a strong probability that he intended that they should be paid if his estate, in any of its parts, was sufficient therefor. It is hardly to be supposed that a man of sense, engaged in the solemn and deliberate matter of making a final disposition of his worldly estate, would trifle with the subject, by making bequests which he did not expect or intend should be satisfied; and, if so, then at first view it seems plausible to say that he must have meant that they should be satisfied from any portion of his estate—from the real, if the personal does not suffice. But yet this idea only imputes to the testator a general purpose that legacies given shall be paid. It does not satisfactorily show that, when giving them, it entered into his mind and formed a part of his intent that they should be so charged upon his real estate as that it should be subject to them as to a lien." In McCorn v. McCorn, 100 N. Y. 511, 513, 3 N. E. 480, it is said: "Whether a legacy is charged upon the real estate of the decedent is always a question of the testator's intention. The language of the will is the basis of the inquiry; but extrinsic circumstances which aid in the interpretation of that language, and help to disclose the actual intention, may also be considered."

These decisions simply make application to a specific subject of the general rule that extrinsic evidence may be resorted to within certain limits and qualifications for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator, and thereby of making clearer and interpreting clauses in his will which otherwise are obscure and of uncertain meaning. But this general rule, wherever laid down, and the rule applicable to the solution of the particular question before us as stated in the citations which we have made, seem to make it sufficiently clear that extrinsic evidence may be utilized only for the purpose of interpreting something which is actually written in the will, that there must be some provision in the will which will serve as a subject for interpretation, and that, under the guise of interpretation, extrinsic evidence cannot be utilized for the purpose of adding to the will provisions which otherwise are not found there at all. Many cases have been cited by the learned counsel for the respondent, and many more might have been added, in which extrinsic evidence has been allowed to aid the court in interpreting provisions of wills which gave legacies and disposed of real estate, and whereby the conclusion was aided that the devise of the real estate was made subject to the payment of the legacies. But no case has been cited, or, as we believe, can be found, in which it has been decided that evidence extrinsic to the will may be made the basis of construing into the will provisions charging real estate with the payment of legacies where the will as actually written by the testator contained not one word even indirectly relating to this subject, and was absolutely silent upon the subject of the testator's real estate, not taking notice or disposing of it in any way whatever. It seems almost axiomatic that a will cannot create a charge or lien upon real estate when it contains no provision whatever which disposes of or deals with such real estate. The idea of charging real estate with the payment of money by will necessarily seems to imply that the instrument shall take jurisdiction of the former and contain some provision with reference to it, and that it shall not be absolutely silent and barren of any word relating to it.

Until some method is adopted of reforming wills after the death of the testator, we fail to see how parol extrinsic testimony can be made to control the testamentary disposition of property as to which the testator has died absolutely intestate.

As we read it, that is this case. The testator has died intestate as to his real estate. His will does not touch it at all. There are no clauses relating to it which may be made the basis of interpretation and construction. We do not see how we are any more entitled upon the record presented to say that the will requires that the legacies be charged upon the unmentioned real estate than we would be entitled to read into the will a provision giving it in whole or part to the legatees named. Perhaps it may be assumed from the evidence and findings that this conclusion defeats what was really the expectation and intention of the testator. If that is so, of course, it is to be regretted. But it will be only another illustration of the experience that no statute or rule, however wise and conducive to public welfare and safety in its general observance and application, can be so framed that it may not be made by ignorance and carelessness an occasional source of hardship in the individual case.

The question certified to us must be answered in the negative, and the judgment appealed from reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

MARY SMITH et al., Appts.,

v.

MICHAEL RYAN et al., Respts.

(191 N. Y. 452, 84 N. E. 402.)

Incompetent person — deed — avoidance — action at law.

A deed by an incompetent person may be avoided in an action at law to recover possession of the granted premises, since, being incapable of giving assent, no valid contract has been effected.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term, Part 8, for New York County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry B. Twombly and Louis H. Hall, for appellants:

The plaintiffs had the right to sue in ejectment, and, when the deed was set up to defeat their claim, to meet the defense by showing the incompetency of the grantor.

Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 584, 18 Am.

Case Note. — May deed of real property executed by an incompetent not judicially declared such be avoided in action at law.

The doctrine that a deed by an incompetent person may be avoided in an action at law to recover possession of the granted premises appears to be supported by a numerical preponderance of the decisions, although the weight of any argument based upon this circumstance is somewhat impaired by the fact referred to in the case reported, that in some of the jurisdictions adopting the doctrine the courts were for a long time without equity jurisdiction, so that resort for relief was necessarily had to the courts of law; as well as by the fact that equitable defenses are allowed in some states to be made in actions to recover possession of land.

It is nevertheless believed that the doctrine has a logical basis. The principal difficulty which has prevented its general acceptance has been the rule that the acts of an insane person who has not been judicially declared incompetent are not void, but merely voidable, from which it has been argued that, as the deed of such a person is efficient to pass the title, no cause of action or defense can be maintained which

Mr. Edward W. S. Johnston, with Messrs. Charles E. LeBarbier, and James A. Boylan, for respondents:

The deed of a person claiming to be a lunatic, where it is conceded that there is rests upon the assertion of the legal title in such grantor or one claiming through him.

From the dilemma thus created, the following way of escape is suggested, based upon the hypothesis that at common law there was originally no such thing as a voidable deed: Either a deed was void, or it was not; and, if the grantor had not been judicially declared incompetent, he was not permitted to stultify himself by alleging his own insanity. This situation gave rise to the practice of resorting to courts of equity for relief. These, in order to protect the rights of grantees who had dealt in good faith, were obliged to characterize the deed not as void, but as voidable, so as to permit the grantee to retain the title where he could not be placed in statu quo, or as a security that the consideration should be restored. The equity doctrine in this case, as in many other cases, finding its way into the common-law courts, undermined the rule that a man could not be allowed to stultify himself to avoid the consequences of his own acts, and thereby removed the obstacle to asserting in a court of law that a deed is in fact no deed because of the failure of the minds of the parties (the grantor's being wanting) to meet. Thus there is no difficulty in legal theory in holding that the deed of one in fact incompetent, but not judicially declared to be such, is inoperative to transfer title, while recognizing at the same time that the transaction may have given rise to equitable rights in the grantee, which, it may be, courts of law will protect, so far as possible, although possibly not so adequately as a court of equity, by requiring a tender of a return of the consideration received,—a point touched upon, but not decided, in the latter part of the opinion in SMITH v. RYAN.

In Alabama, the right to test the validity of a deed given by an alleged insane grantor, in an action of ejectment, seems to be recognized. See Dougherty v. Powe, 127 Ala. 577, 30 So. 524; Galloway v. Hendon, 131 Ala. 280, 31 So. 603.

no adjudication in lunacy, is merely voidable, and must be attacked in equity, and cannot be treated as a nullity.

made by one who had not been judicially declared incompetent, and who had become mentally incapacitated by a stroke of paralysis, it was held that it is competent to show the incapacity of the grantor of a deed, relied upon as a defense in an action of ejectment. In this case the grantee, being cognizant of the mental condition of the grantor at the time the deed was executed, was held not to be in a position to demand repayment of any valuable consideration which she may have given. From this conclusion, reached by two of the three justices constituting the court, Elliott, J., dissented upon the ground that it was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to show legal title in himself, to prove that the deed in question was absolutely void, which could not be done by showing the feeble-mindedness of the grantor, as, even assuming such to be her condition, her deed was not void, but merely voidable.

In Douglas v. Hartzell, 15 Ill. App. 251, it was held that a defendant in an action of forcible detainer may show that plaintiff's grantor was non compos mentis; the court saying: "If the grantor in the deed to appellee was insane or an imbecile at the time of the execution of the deed, and was incapable of understanding the transaction, then it was not her deed. This fact may as well be shown in a court of law as equity."

In Harbison v. Lemon, 3 Blackf. 51, 23 Am. Dec. 376, it was said, apropos of the abandonment of the doctrine that a man should not be permitted to stultify himself in order to be relieved from his obligation, that a deed may be avoided either at law or in equity if at the time of its execution the obligor was so destitute of understanding as not to know what he was doing; whether the incapacity were occasioned by idiocy, lunacy, or drunkenness.

In Brown v. Freed, 43 Ind. 253, a statutory suit to recover real property, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to introduce evidence to show that their ancestor, under whose deed the defendants claimed title, was insane when he executed the deed, upon the ground that, if the grantor was insane, the deed was void and no title passed. The court said: "Suppose that the appellants had attempted to defeat the title of the appellees by proof that the deed which purported to have been made by the said Jacob Nidiffer was a forgery, would anyone doubt that such proof was competent, and, if the fact was established, that the appellants were the owners in fee of such lands? If it would have been competent to have proved that the supposed deed had been forged and was therefore void, why was it not competent to prove that it was inoperative and void by reason of the want of mental capacity in the grantor to make any valid deed? We can see no difference, in principle, between the case supposed and the one involved in the case under consideration."

In Nichol v. Thomas, 53 Ind. 42, it was held that, although the deed of an insane man, before office found, is voidable merely, he may bring an action to recover the land without first restoring the consideration to the grantee.

In Wall v. Hill, 1 B. Mon. 290, 36 Am. Dec. 578, the right of an heir to test the validity of a deed, alleged to have been given by his ancestor while insane, in an action of ejectment, seems to be recognized, it being held that the right of entry by the heir is legal and perfect, without any restitution of the consideration paid to the ancestor; and that the equitable right to such restitution is not available in an action of ejectment.

In Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451, 89 Am. Dec. 705, the right of one claiming through the heir of an alleged insane grantor to maintain a writ of entry for the land, and thereby to avoid the deed by reason of such insanity, was, in the absence of any ratification or affirmance, sustained.

In Allis v. Billings, 6 Met. 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744, which was a writ of entry, it was held that the jury should have been instructed that the fact that a grantor was insane when he executed the deed, if established, rendered the deed voidable; and that it was competent for the demandant to avoid it on that ground.

held that, at the trial of a writ of entry, the demandant may show the insanity of a grantor under whom the occupant claims.

In Den ex dem. State Bank v. Moore, 5 N. J. L. 470, it was held that in ejectment, where plaintiff claims under a mortgage, defendant may show that he was insane and that the mortgage was fraudulently obtained; the court saying: "Whatever will avoid the bond and mortgage is a competent defense in such a case, and that which shows a fraudulent or illegal consideration will avoid them." And, after discussing the right to prove the illegality in the consideration, the court continues: "In considering this part of the case, it is important to remark that the defendant attempted to prove that, at the time of the execution of these writings, an afflicting dispensation of Providence had bereaved him of his understanding. His right to prove this was not questioned upon the argument; and the state of the case, the verdict of the jury, and the manner in which the allegation was met by the counsel, leave a full impression that this part of the defense was amply sustained upon the trial. It is under this full impression that the second point is considered; and I think it would be useless to spend much time upon it."

In Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. L. 108, 18 Am. Rep. 716, the right of the plaintiff in an action of ejectment to attack the deed under which the defendant claimed, on the ground that at the time it was executed it was a fraud upon the grantor, who was a paralytic and imbecile, seems to be assumed as matter of course, although it was held that the deed was voidable only, and not void.

In Van Deusen v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 378, it was held that the plaintiff in an action to recover possession of real property was entitled to show that the deed under which defendant claimed was executed by one non compos mentis, the court arguing that, if the fact of incompetency was satisfactorily established, the instrument never had any existence as a deed and was legally ineffectual and inoperative to pass a title to the premises, although the incompetency of the where a deed has been duly executed and delivered, a subsequent surrender or destruction of it will not divest the estate conveyed, but that a reconveyance should be tendered. In Feret v. Hill, 15 C. B. 207, the only proposition decided was that representation as to the intended use of premises leased from the defendant being merely promissory and collateral could not defeat the tenant's right to possession in an action at law. The author concedes that the law in Massachusetts is the reverse of that stated by him. Bassett v. Brown, 106 Mass. 355. In this state it has been held that a judgment creditor may, without resort to equity, sell on execution lands conveyed by his debtor in fraud of creditors, and that the purchaser at the sale may recover the lands in ejectment (Chautauque County Bank v. Risley, 19 N. Y. 369, 75 Am. Dec. 347); and it has never been the practice with us, when resort is had to equity, either in a case of a deed fraudulent as to creditors, or in one where the deed has been obtained by fraud on the grantor, to do more than to declare the deed fraudulent and void, not to require a reconveyance by the grantee.

Accepting, however, the distinction made by the learned text writer between the principle applicable in realty and that applicable to personalty, there nevertheless are unquestionably certain kinds of fraud for which a deed can be avoided at law. It is said in Story's Equity (§ 60): "Thus, for example, although fraud, accident, and trust are proper objects of courts of equity, it is by no means true that they are exclusively cognizable therein. On the contrary, fraud is in many cases cognizable in a court of law. Thus, for example, reading a deed falsely to an illiterate person, whether it be so read by the grantee or by a stranger, avoids it as to the other party at law,"—citing Thoroughgood's Case, 2 Coke, 9. The same is true as to a deed executed by a blind man. Shulter's Case, 12 Coke, 90. There are two kinds of fraud which differ essentially in their character. In the one the grantor is induced to convey his property by fraudulent representations as to the value, nature, or character of the consideration he receives for the conveyance. This is sometimes called fraud in the consideration. In the other case the grantor is deceived into the execution of an instrument of the contents of which he is ignorant. This is sometimes called fraud in the execution of the deed. The distinction between the two cases lies just here. It is elementary law that the assent of the parties is necessary to constitute a binding contract. In the first case the assent of the party, though obtained by fraud, is nevertheless obtained, not only to the execution of the instrument, but to the contract which it evidences. In the second case there is procured only the signature to and execution of, the written instrument, but not assent to the contract therein stated. In cases of this latter class the deed can be avoided at law. Wilcox v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 176 N. Y. 115, 98 Am. St. Rep. 650, 68 N. E. 153. It seems to me plain that a deed by an incompetent person falls within the second class. The ground on which such deeds are avoided in case of fraud is that the party has been misled by deception, and has never assented to the contract. The ground on which the deed of an incompetent is avoided is that by infirmity of intellect he is incapable of giving assent. The element that avoids the deed is the same in the two cases,—lack of assent,—and it is not material whether it exists through deceit or through imbecility. The earlier authorities in this state so considered it. In Jackson ex dem. Church v. Hills, 8 Cow. 290, where a defense of fraud was ruled out, it was said by the supreme court: "The defense was that the lease was obtained by fraud, not that the defendant was incompetent, by reason of age, infirmity, or mental imbecility, to make a valid contract or that she was ignorant when she executed the lease of its nature and effect, but that the lessor was guilty of a misrepresentation as to a part of the consideration, or inducement to the making of the lease." This case is cited with approval in Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill, 513, where again the distinction is pointed out between fraud in the consideration of a deed and fraud in its execution. In Phillips v. Gorham, 17 N. Y. 270, the action was to recover the possession of lands. The complaint stated title in the plaintiff as heir at law of a deceased ancestor; that the defendant was in possession claiming under a deed from said ancestor; that at the time of the making of such deed to the defendant said ancestor was of unsound mind and wholly incompetent to make the deed; and that the deed was obtained fraudulently by threats, false promises, and other improper influences. The trial court refused to charge the defendant's request that, before the deed could be avoided for fraud or undue influence, it was necessary to procure a judgment to that effect in an action brought for that special purpose. The action was tried at law before a jury. Recovery by the plaintiff was sustained; this court holding that, in an action to recover specific real property, the plaintiff might attack a deed under which the defendant claimed upon grounds which were formerly cognizable in equity as well as those cognizable at law. The only criticism that can be made on the application of that decision to the case at bar is that in the case cited the complaint alleged a cause of action in equity as well as at law, while in the one before us the complaint states only a cause of action at law. It is to be observed, however, that the defendants' request to charge presented no contention that, so far as relates to the ground of imbecility, resort must be first had to equity, but was confined to the allegation of fraud. The case is cited with approval in Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 N. Y. 528 (page 543), where it is said: "So if, in an action of ejectment, the defense rests upon a deed or will, the plaintiff can make proof that it was procured by fraud or other imposition." Finally, in Van Deusen v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 378, the commission of appeals squarely decided that the deed of an incompetent person could be avoided in an action of ejectment, and that it was not necessary to resort to equity. That case, unless it is to be overruled, is decisive of the question before us. There, as in this case, the action was in ejectment; the complaint simply stating that the plaintiff was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the real estate therein described, and that the defendant unlawfully withheld possession thereof.

The rule stated seems to generally prevail in this country. In Massachusetts the deed of an incompetent person is voidable, not void. Allis v. Billings, 6 Met. 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744. Nevertheless ejectment lies to avoid the deed. The rule obtains in Pennsylvania (Crawford v. Scovell, 94 Pa. 48, 39 Am. Rep. 766), in Maine (Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451, 89 Am. Dec. 705), in New Jersey (Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. L. 108, 18 Am. Rep. 716), in New Hampshire (Young v. Stevens, 48 N. H. 133, 2 Am. Rep. 202, 97 Am. Dec. 592), in Indiana (Brown v. Freed, 43 Ind. 253), and in North Carolina (Fitzgerald v. Shelton, 95 N. C. 519). It may be objected to the application of some of these authorities that the courts of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania being for a long time without equity jurisdiction resort for relief was necessarily had to the common-law courts, and that in Massachusetts it is not necessary to restore the consideration even where the contract with the incompetent person has been made in good faith and in ignorance of such incompetency. No state, however, has maintained more steadily the distinction between common-law and equity jurisdiction than New Jersey, and in that state, the same as in our own, a person dealing in good faith with an incompetent person, ignorant of his imbecility, is protected. Yet, as appears by the New Jersey case cited, in an action in ejectment a plaintiff may attack the deed of his ancestor for incompetency. The laws seems to be the same in England. Ball v. Mannin, 1 Dow & C. 380.

Let us now turn to analogy. Nearly all the text writers and judicial decisions treat lunacy or mental unsoundness and infancy as disability similar in character and in their effect on the contracts of the parties. In Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 119, 31 Am. Dec. 285, Judge Bronson said: "Deeds procured by duress, or executed by persons of unsound mind, stand on nearly the same footing as the deeds of infants." In Blinn v. Schwarz, 177 N. Y. 252, 101 Am. St. Rep. 806, 69 N. E. 542, Judge Vann quoted from Blackstone, Chancellor Kent, and the principal text writers on contracts to the effect that the contracts of lunatics and infants were of the same character, not void and mere nullities, but voidable only. It is clearly settled that an infant on arriving at age may avoid his deed in an action at law. Jackson ex dem. Wallace v. Carpenter, 11 Johns. 530; Clapp v. Byrnes, 155 N. Y. 535, 50 N. E. 277; Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 584, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569, 13 S. W. 906; Miles v. Lingerman, 24 Ind. 387; Cole v. Pennoyer, 14 Ill. 158. See Tyler, Infancy, p. 69. We see no reason why a different rule should apply in the case of persons of unsound mind. The learned judge who wrote for the majority of the court below relied on a previous opinion rendered by him in the case of Blinn v. Schwarz, 63 App. Div. 25, 71 N. Y. Supp. 343. The only case there cited as authority for the proposition that relief from the deed of a person of unsound mind must be had in equity alone is Jacobs v. Richards, 18 Beav. 300. But it could have decided no such proposition, for it was not an action at law, but a suit in equity. The action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage, and all that was there held was that the defense of lunacy must be set up by a cross bill. The only case that I can find supporting the position of the learned justice of the appellate division is the case of Moran v. Moran, 106 Mich. 8, 58 Am. St. Rep. 462, 63 N. W. 989; but, as conceded in the opinion there delivered, the decision is opposed to the current of authority elsewhere. It is doubtless true that an executed contract, made with a person of unsound mind in good faith, for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of such mental unsoundness, will not be set aside or avoided,—at least without a return of the consideration paid. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hunt, 79 N. Y. 541. It may also be true that a court of equity could, in such case, deal with the rights of the parties more adequately than a court of law. But this cannot deprive the plaintiffs of their right to try the issue before a jury in a court of law, if that has hitherto been the mode of trial of such an action. Nor is there so great embarrassment in such a trial as has been suggested. If in analogy to the case of fraud it is necessary for the plaintiffs to return the consideration paid before suit brought, and they have failed to tender such return (a question we do not decide), then the action will be dismissed, and it is the plaintiffs alone who will suffer by resorting to law instead of to equity. If, on the other hand, payment of a valuable consideration in good faith is in the nature of an equitable defense, still the Code of Civil Procedure (§ 500) in express terms authorizes the interposition and determination of such defenses in an action at law. New York Cent. Ins. Co. v. National Protection Ins. Co. 14 N. Y. 85. On this appeal we do not pass on those questions; for the record now before us does not show whether a valuable consideration was paid, or, if paid, whether it was paid in good faith, without knowledge of the infirmity of grantor.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

JENNIE F. HAWKINS, Resp't.,

v.

DANIEL A. HAWKINS, Appt.

(193 N. Y. 409, 86 N. E. 468.)

Husband and wife — suit for support — defense.

1. That a man had, without the knowledge of his wife, been guilty of adultery before abandoning her because of her adultery, for which cause his action for divorce failed, does not prevent his taking advantage of the statutory provision that in a statutory action for support because of abandonment defendant may set up in justification the misconduct of the plaintiff.

Judgment — divorce — statutory support — effect.

2. A decree refusing a divorce to a man because of his adultery does not prevent his setting up the adultery of the wife, on which the former action was based, in defense of a statutory action by her for support, in which the statute expressly authorizes such defense.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a special term for Kings County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel defendant to furnish her with support. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John McCormick, for appellant:

Adultery by the wife forfeits her rights arising from the marriage relation, and frees the husband from his duties to her.

Doe v. Roe, 23 Hun, 19; Constable v. Rosener, 32 App. Div. 155, 81 N. Y. Supp. 376, affirmed in 178 N. Y. 587, 70 N. E. 1097; Hunter v. Boucher, 3 Pick. 289; Cooper v. Lloyd, 6 C. B. N. S. 519; Atkins v. Pearce, 2 C. B. N. S. 763; Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 343, 73 Am. Dec. 73; McCutchen v. McGahay, 11 Johns. 281, 6 Am. Dec. 373; Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Consist. The fact that the husband, too, has been guilty of adultery does not estop him from denying support.

Case Note. — Effect of husband's own adultery to prevent him from relying on wife's adultery as a defense to an action for support.

Aside from HAWKINS v. HAWKINS and the cases therein cited, very few cases have been found which shed any light on the question here annotated, and none which have presented the question in a manner similar to that in the above-mentioned case.

In Phillips v. Wiseman, 131 N. C. 402, 42 S. E. 861, it was held that, under a statute so providing, a married woman who committed adultery and was not living with her husband at the time of his death was precluded from claiming dower, although it appeared that her husband, before her own misdeed, had abandoned her and thereafter lived in adultery with another woman. The court took occasion to say: "Applying the statute to the facts found, plaintiff is barred from recovering dower in her husband's lands, and his Honor erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff. She committed adultery during their marriage, and was not living with her husband at his death. It is not contended that there was any act of condonement. The fact that he did wrong can be no excuse for her to do likewise. His violation did not justify her in violating her marriage vow. So, the statute creating dower rights is framed for the benefit of the guiltless, not those in pari delicto."

Mr. Andrew J. Shipman, with Messrs. Blandy, Mooney, & Shipman, for respondent:

Where both parties are in the wrong, they stand towards each other as though they were living in separation by mutual consent; and the husband must support his wife.

1 Bishop. Marr. Div. & Sep. § 1231; Schiffer v. Pruden, 64 N. Y. 47; Van Cleef v. Burns, 118 N. Y. 549, 16 Am. St. Rep. 782, 23 N. E. 881.

A similar case is Brown v. Kerns, 6 Ohio N. P. 68, where it was held that the living in adultery of a woman while her husband is in the Army will preclude her from claiming dower, although after his return he marries another woman.

In Needham v. Bremner, L. R. 1 C. P. 583, an action was brought for necessities furnished the wife while living apart from her husband. The latter relied for a defense upon the adultery of his wife, to establish which he put in certain divorce proceedings, in which it was found by the jury that she had been guilty of adultery, but in which there was no decree because it was also found that he had been guilty of adultery. It was held, however, that the judgment of the divorce court had not altered the status of the parties, the woman still continuing to be the wife of the defendant, and, it being a mere verdict of the jury, although binding as between the parties to the suit, it was not as against other parties who came to litigate the same question.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is one brought by the respondent to procure a judgment of separation from her husband, the appellant, and to compel suitable provision for her support and maintenance. Its determination will be governed by the application to rather unusual facts of §§ 1762 and 1765 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Section 1762 provides that a wife may have judgment of separation and for support for either of the following causes:

" . . . (3) The abandonment of the plaintiff by the defendant. (4) . . . The neglect or refusal of the defendant to provide for her." The respondent alleged and has proved that at a certain date the appellant left her, and since then has refused either to live with her or support her, and on these facts she would be entitled to the judgment which was awarded to her in the court below. But § 1765 provides that in such an action as this "the defendant may set up, in justification, the misconduct of the plaintiff; and, if that defense is established to the satisfaction of the court, the defendant is entitled to judgment." Under this section, the appellant alleged, and has established beyond controversy, that his refusal to live with and support the respondent immediately followed and was the result of his discovery that she had been guilty of adultery. On these facts, added to the others above stated, appellant unquestionably would be entitled to judgment dismissing the action, for it is settled that the adultery of the wife relieved the husband from the obligation to support her, and such misconduct is a defense to an action of this character. Doe v. Roe, 23 Hun 19; Deisler v. Deisler, 59 App. Div. 207, 69 N. Y. Supp. 326; People ex rel. Keller v. Shradly, 40 App. Div. 460, 58 N. Y. Supp. 143. See also Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 429; Decker v. Decker, 193 Ill. 285, 294, 55 L.R.A. 697, 86 Am. St. Rep. 325, 61 N. E. 1108.

In Beaty v. Richardson, 56 S. C. 173, 46 L.R.A. 517, 34 S. E. 73, it was held that a forfeiture of the right of dower of a widow who had lived in adultery after her husband had abandoned her to live in illicit relations with another woman and her efforts to win him back had been ineffectual is not made by a statute which declares the forfeiture of a wife's right of dower if she "willingly leave her husband and go away and continue with her adventurer."

An interesting case is Pilnik v. Numizinski, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 16 C. S. 231. Here a wife sought a divorce from bed and board because of her husband's adultery and his refusal to furnish her the necessities of life, and the husband pleaded the wife's adultery as a defense. Owing to a peculiar statute, it was found that, although the husband was living with another woman, he was not guilty of adultery. It was also found that the husband failed to prove his charge; but it was held that, even if the wife had been guilty of adultery, she nevertheless could maintain her action, since, if the husband objected, he should have sued the wife for a separation, his failure to do so being in effect a pardoning of her conduct. And in any event, so long as she had not been judicially separated from him, she enjoyed all the rights which her marriage gave her, and, among others, that of compelling him to furnish her the necessities of life.

But still further facts are established which it is claimed materially qualify the force of those last recited. It appears that the appellant was guilty of adultery before the respondent, although not known to the latter at the time of her offense; and that in an action brought by the former for absolute divorce the latter made a counterclaim based upon the appellant's wrongdoing, and the court, on familiar principles, refused to grant relief to either party. Under these circumstances, the respondent argues in support of her judgment that the appellant's misconduct somehow prevents him from successfully urging hers under § 1765 as a defense to this action, and especially that, inasmuch as the court refused to dissolve the marriage obligation on account of the said mutual acts of adultery, said obligation continues in full force notwithstanding those acts, and, as an incident thereto, the appellant can be compelled to support his wife. I am unable to agree with these contentions. In the first place, and disregarding for the moment the judgment in the divorce action, it is to be kept in mind that the respondent is not basing her action on general principles of law under which the court might be urged somehow to set off and balance against each other the mutual misdeeds of the parties, and so leave the respondent with all her original marital rights and claims unimpaired. On the other hand, her right of action is based on and limited by the absolute statutory provisions which have been quoted. One of these in effect provides that, even though she establishes the usual elements of an action for separation and support, she will not be allowed such affirmative relief based on the marriage contract which she herself has disregarded. It does not favor an assertion of marital obligations which is accompanied or preceded by their violation. This being so, and it fully appearing that respondent had been guilty of misconduct which is made a bar under the statute to her recovery, I fail to see how it justifies or excuses her misconduct, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) or changes the nature of her act, or avoids the consequences thereof, or contributes an element of support to her cause of action, to prove that her husband also at some time has been guilty of a similar violation. And especially is this so where, as here, there is no claim that the latter violation, even as a matter of moral influence, conduced to or mitigated the evil of the former. It is also to be borne in mind that this is not a case where the husband has been continuing and living in profligacy while he cast his wife off for a single offense. Of course, if the appellant were seeking affirmative relief, his conduct would be important and subject to the strictest scrutiny, and no other rule should be applied to him than is being urged against the respondent. But he is not. The respondent alone is seeking legal relief, and, in my opinion, the only material question relates to her act. Neither do I perceive how the force of this reasoning and conclusion, if otherwise correct, is affected or impaired by the decree in the divorce action. On the other hand, the logic of that judgment which refused relief with respect to the marriage obligation to the husband who had been guilty of violating it, seems to aid the appellant rather than otherwise. Certainly, if the respondent is permitted to maintain this action notwithstanding her adultery, she will be enabled to secure part of the very relief which was denied to her in the former action because of such adultery.

There was nothing in that decree which technically bars the appellant from urging the respondent's adultery as a defense in the present action. It refused to give him affirmative relief on account thereof in the former action because of his own similar fault, but that is not inconsistent with his right to urge the same act under the express provisions of the statute as a defense to the wife's request for affirmative relief in this action.

But it is urged that, the court having refused to dissolve the marriage tie, all the obligations of that contract, including that of support of the wife by the husband, must remain in full force. And, as sustaining this view, reference is made to the expression in Wood v. Wood, 2 Paige, 108, that, "if both parties [to a divorce action] are guilty, neither has any claim to relief; and they are in that case suitable and proper companions for each other," and to the remark in Beeby v. Beeby, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 790: "It is not unfit if he . . . who has first violated his marriage vow should be barred of his remedy. The parties may live together and find sources of mutual forgiveness in the humiliation of mutual guilt." I do not attribute to these opinions and to the decree any such significance or effect as is claimed for them, but think that the only meaning legitimately to be deduced from them is that the court will not give affirmative relief to mutually guilty husband and wife by dissolving the marriage contract, but will leave them where it finds them subject to whatever burdens of that relation still remain; and the conclusion is not justified that such a decree amounts to an adjudication that all of the original obligations remain unimpaired. Independent of any statutory provision, it might be questioned whether a wife who has been guilty of adultery may successfully insist that her husband shall live with or support her, even though the court has refused to dissolve the marriage relation because of his similar fault. Certainly the decree denying dissolution does not preserve or confer such right in view of the express provisions of § 1765 that the misconduct of the wife shall be a bar to her right to support, for, of course, the legislature has the undoubted right to annex this consequence to her misconduct, and necessarily the provision making her misconduct a bar to an action for support must apply to a case where there has been no decree dissolving the marriage on account of adultery. If there had been a decree of divorce, there would be no occasion for the exemption of the husband from liability for support as a result of such misconduct.

Neither, in view of the statutory provision to which reference has been made, does it avail as an argument to say that the wife's right of dower and of administration on her husband's estate and possibly various other rights continue notwithstanding her adultery, so long as the marriage has been allowed to remain undissolved; and that it is not in harmony with the continuance of these rights that she should lose her right to support. This is a matter of statutory policy. It cannot be doubted that the legislature would have the power to cancel her right of dower and administration because of mere adultery without a decree of divorce founded thereon; and, if it had so enacted, I can hardly believe that she would have avoided the results of her misconduct by proving that at some time her husband had committed a similar sin. It has been expressly held otherwise in England. Bostock v. Smith, 34 Beav. 57.

Authorities are not wanting to sustain the proposition that, independent of any statutory provision such as we have, the destructive consequences to her conjugal rights of the wife's adultery are not prevented or compensated and avoided by similar fault of her husband. Govier v. Hancock, 6 T. R. 603, was an action to recover for necessaries furnished to a wife living apart from her husband. It appeared, however, that she had committed adultery after leaving him, and it was held that this exonerated him from liability for her support, although he had first committed a similar act and had otherwise treated her cruelly. In Bostock v. Smith, supra, it was held that the wife who left her husband and committed adultery came within the statute forfeiting her dower for such offense, even though she left her husband in consequence of his gross misconduct, "which was such as would justify, if anything could justify, her act. But nothing could justify it." In Stimpson v. Wood, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 485, it was, in effect, held that a wife living in adultery lost all right of support, although her husband was doing the same thing. In Culley v. Charman, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 89, it was said by Hawkins, J.: "I do not think there is any need to cite authorities to show that a husband is not bound at common law to maintain a wife who has been guilty of adultery and who is living apart from him." In Hope v. Hope, 1 Swabey & T. 94, it appeared that each party had sought divorce for the adultery of the other, and had been denied relief on account of their mutual misdeeds; that thereafter the wife applied for a decree of restitution of marital rights, which in its important aspects was like the present case, an action to compel support. It was urged "that cohabitation is a duty resulting from marriage, and that neither party can lawfully withdraw from cohabitation without the judgment of a court, which in this case the husband not only had not obtained, but, having asked the proper tribunal to release him from that duty, his prayer was rejected; and, secondly, that the guilt of each being the same, their mutual delinquencies were thereby compensated, and both were restored to their original position as innocent parties." The court overruled both contentions. And to the same effect are the cases of Drummond v. Drummond, 2 Swabey & T. 274, and Otway v. Otway, L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 141. It may be said that these later English decisions are based on the principles of the ecclesiastical law, which have not been adopted in this country, and therefore are not applicable. There may be controversy as to how far the ecclesiastical law has been adopted, and it may be conceded for argument that these decisions would not be useful in interpreting the meaning of our statutes. When, however, the words of a statute being plain, certain facts have been developed under it, we have a right to consider what effect another court exercising jurisdiction over the same general subject and governed by principles not unlike those embodied in our statute has given to similar facts.

As was said by Judge Folger in Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 185, 190, 10 Am. Rep. 460: "Though it has been held that the ecclesiastical law of England is not a part of the common law of that country, and is no part of the common law thereof adopted in this state, . . . yet, when, by our statutes, any part of the jurisdiction exercised by those courts was given to our courts, the settled principles and practice of those courts became a precedent and a guide for our courts." The case of People ex rel. Keller v. Shrady, 40 App. Div. 460, 58 N. Y. Supp. 143, has not been overlooked, wherein it is written by Judge Barrett that in criminal proceedings against the husband for abandoning his wife it would not be a defense to show that the wife had been guilty of adultery, it also appearing that the defendant had been first guilty of similar fault which would prevent him from procuring a dissolution of the marriage. It is, however, to be noted that what was thus said was not necessary to the decision of the case; and, secondly, that it was expressly directed to the proposition that, under such circumstances, the husband would be bound not to permit his wife to become a "public charge." Independent of the Code provision and as a matter of public policy, there very well might be a distinction between proceedings by the guilty party for her individual benefit and those instituted in behalf of the people to prevent the burden of a public charge.

The judgments of the courts below should be reversed and a new trial granted.

Gray, Haight, Edward T. Bartlett and Werner, JJ., concur.

Cullen, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent from the decision about to be made. The statutory provisions now found in article 3, chap. 15, Code Civ. Proc., do not bar plaintiff's right to relief. Both plaintiff and defendant have been guilty of adultery, as was determined in an action previously brought by the defendant against the plaintiff for an absolute divorce. After the rendition of a decree therein, the defendant refused to live with the plaintiff or in any manner provide for her support. By subdivision 4 of § 1762 of the Code, the wife is entitled to a decree of separation and maintenance where the husband neglects or refuses to provide for her. Her prima facie right to relief is therefore conceded. The sole question is as to the sufficiency of the husband's defense. By § 1765, "the defendant may set up, in justification, the misconduct of the plaintiff; and, if that defense is established to the satisfaction of the court, the defendant is entitled to judgment." What is the misconduct as intended by this section? Plainly only such misconduct as justifies the action or conduct of the husband in refusing to support her. It is urged that unquestionably the plaintiff's adultery was misconduct on her part. That is true, but the question is: Was it misconduct towards her husband, who himself had been guilty of a similar offense? Doubtless every dictate of honor, morality, and self-respect should keep a wife pure even when her husband has done wrong; but, if her only obligation to chastity rested on loyalty due to an adulterous husband, the plaintiff would not be subject to censure from the most strict of moralists. If the wife should commit an assault and battery on a third party, or larceny, and be sent to prison for either offense, it would undoubtedly be misconduct on her part; but would anyone pretend that by reason thereof the husband was forever afterwards relieved from the obligation of supporting her? In some states imprisonment under sentence for a felony is a ground for divorce; not so with us. Therefore, the simple question presented in this case is whether the defendant remains under any obligation to support the wife after the commission of adultery, he himself having been guilty of the same offense. It must be also borne in mind that there is here no claim that the plaintiff abandoned her husband's home and lived in open adultery, or that she is continuing adulterous intercourse. The evidence established a single act of adultery committed by the defendant in September, 1904, and one committed by the plaintiff in November of the same year. By reason of the mutual guilt a divorce was denied to either party.

In determining this question, we must not be misled by the false analogy of ordinary contracts, and the argument that where both parties have violated a contract neither can claim any right thereunder. Though based on contract, as distinguished from religious sacrament, marriage is not a contract in the accurate sense of that term. In Wade v. Kalbsfleisch, 58 N. Y. 282, 17 Am. Rep. 250, Chief Judge Church said: "It cannot be dissolved by the parties when consummated, nor released with or without consideration. The relation is always regulated by government. It is more than a contract. It requires certain acts of the parties to constitute marriage, independent of and beyond the contract. It partakes more of the character of an institution regulated and controlled by public authority, upon principles of public policy, for the benefit of the community." The learned judge quotes with approval the declaration in Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87: "In strictness, though formed by contract, it signifies the relation of husband and wife, deriving both its rights and duties from a source higher than any contract . . . which they can make." Nor are we to be controlled by the decisions in England (which will be referred to hereafter) where both the law and public opinion view in very different lights unchastity in the wife and the same offense in the husband, and where even now, under the divorce act of 1857, not only is distinction made between adultery by the wife and that by the husband, but a divorce may be granted to a party guilty of adultery. The question is to be determined in the light of the public policy of this state as declared in its statute law, which imposes the obligation of marital fidelity equally on the husband and wife, which for a violation of that obligation grants the innocent party, whether wife or husband, the same right to relief, and, where both parties have been guilty, requires them to remain husband and wife. The obligation resting on the husband to support the wife does not spring from contract, but arises from the marital relation, and is imposed by law. It is not even within the power of the parties to contract to the contrary. Such was the rule of the common law, and it is expressly enacted in this state by § 21 of the domestic relations law: "Husband and wife cannot contract to alter or dissolve the marriage, or to relieve the husband from his liability to support his wife." Laws 1896, chap. 272, p. 215. When, therefore, the law says that man and wife who have each been guilty of adultery shall remain man and wife, it enacts that the marriage obligation shall continue between them in its full integrity. It is conceded that in all other respects except that of support the rights and obligations of the parties remain unaffected. On the death of the defendant the plaintiff will be entitled to her dower right in his real estate, and, if he dies intestate, to a share of his personality. The defendant has a similar right of inheritance in case of the plaintiff's death intestate. If either one should be killed by the wrongful or negligent act of a third party, the survivor will be entitled to sue for damages for the death. In case of intestacy the survivor will be entitled to take out letters of administration. Neither can adopt a child without the consent of the other. It is unnecessary to extend this enumeration of the respective rights of either party in the person and estate of the other. It is urged, however, in answer to this argument that these are matters of statutory policy, and that the legislature could abrogate all these rights. This is undoubtedly true, but it is equally a matter of statutory policy that the adulterous husband must retain as his wife an adulterous woman, and as for the suggestion that the legislature could abrogate these rights, were it not for the provision in the state Constitution forbidding divorce except by judicial decree, the legislature might abrogate the marriage itself, for it is not a contract within the protection of the Federal Constitution. White v. White, 5 Barb. 480.

The English ecclesiastical cases, which take a contrary view of the obligation of the adulterous husband to support an adulterous wife, are of recent date, long subsequent to the Revolution, and therefore not evidence of the ecclesiastical law of that country as it existed at the time of our separation. People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 570, 19 Am. Rep. 211. The earliest of these is Hope v. Hope, 1 Swabey & T. 94, decided in 1858. There it was held that an adulterous wife cannot obtain a decree for the restoration of conjugal rights against an adulterous husband. The learned judge who decided the case states that the question had never been determined in the courts of that country, and admits that the canon law, which, though not adopted in its entirety, is concededly the foundation of the English ecclesiastical law, was directly contrary to the conclusion which he reached. He further admitted that there were dicta of that eminent ecclesiastical judge, Lord Stowell, evincing a different view. In Proctor v. Proctor, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 292, where a separation was refused by reason of mutual adultery, Lord Stowell said: "It [the court] therefore presumes, when it withholds its decree of separation, that the parties return to cohabitation. All matters return to their former course, but with increased vigor. The husband and wife live again on their former footing, and there is no anticipation of separate debts, or of the probability of a spurious offspring. That such is the doctrine of the canon law is most certain. The authorities are numerous and precise to that effect." The Hope Case proceeded on two decisions of the common-law courts. The first was that of Govier v. Hancock (1796) 6 T. R. 603. The action was for board and lodging furnished to defendant's wife. The report thus states the case: "The defendant, having committed adultery with a woman of the name of Bazely whom he had brought home, treated his wife with great cruelty, and finally turned her out of doors. Then the wife committed adultery, after which she offered to return home, but her husband would not receive her; and this action was brought for her board and lodging subsequent to that time." It was held that the husband was not liable. In R. v. Flintan, 1 Barn. & Ad. 227, the defendant was convicted as a disorderly person in failing to maintain his wife by reason of which she became a charge on the parish. Both husband and wife had committed adultery. The conviction was reversed, the court holding that, as the defendant was not civilly liable for the supply of necessaries to his wife, he could not be held a disorderly person for not supplying them. The Irish case of Seaver v. Seaver, 2 Swabey & T. 665, was decided prior to Hope v. Hope, but the decision is not noticed in the later case. The Seaver Case was decided both in the consistorial court of Dublin and on appeal exactly the reverse of the Hope Case to which it was entirely similar in its facts. The court there said: "The sentence is not merely that the parties shall live together, but its effect in substance is that they shall fulfil all their matrimonial duties, of which fidelity to the nuptial bed is not the least important. I know that, according to the modern code of morals and feelings, it is hard for the husband to comply with such a sentence. According to this code a husband incurs no disgrace and need feel no shame for his own adultery, while his honor is ruined totally by the adultery of his wife. The disgrace thus caused by another's guilt is capable of only one possible aggravation, viz., if he forgives her. This code cannot be recognized in a court Christian; nor will a man against whom adultery is charged and proved be permitted to allege any reluctance to associate with an adulteress because she happens to be his wife."

While the law in England as to judicial separations remains unchanged by the matrimonial causes act of 1857, which first authorized the courts to decree a dissolution of the marriage tie, the practice in suits for absolute divorce is so entirely foreign to the law and policy of this state as to render the decisions under that statute of no value here. There a husband may obtain a divorce from his wife for her adultery. A wife cannot obtain a divorce for the adultery of her husband unless it is accompanied by cruelty, abandonment, or the adultery is incestuous. The adultery of the plaintiff is not a bar to a divorce for the adultery of the other party. Under the statute the courts may, but are not bound, to deny relief for that reason. Alimony seems to be in the discretion of the courts and has been granted to a wife who has been divorced for adultery. A full collection of these cases can be found in the work of Gwynne Hall on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

of any statutory provision, it might be questioned whether a wife who has been guilty of adultery may successfully insist that her husband shall live with and support her even though the court has refused to dissolve the marriage relation because of his similar fault." From this intimation I dissent toto celo. Its effect would be to set up one standard of morality for the woman, another for the man, a distinction which, whatever may be the view taken of it by society, is expressly repudiated by the statute law of this state by which adultery on the part of husband or wife is equally made a crime. I can only repeat the forcible language of the court in the Seaver Case, supra: "Nor will a man against whom adultery is charged and proved be permitted to allege any reluctance to associate with an adulteress because she happens to be his wife." I do not say that the commission of a single act of adultery on the part of the husband gives the wife unlimited license to commit adultery at all times thereafter and still compel her husband to support her, but this is equally applicable to the wife; and a single act of adultery on her part, possibly committed at a time long past, and sincerely repented of, should not enable the husband to cast her off without support, though he may be living a life of continuous and gross profligacy. The circumstances under which an offense is committed, while they may not affect the penalty which the law imposes on its commission, may form a controlling factor in determining the moral delinquency attributable to the act. The effect of the decision about to be made is to put the law of this state on the same basis as that declared by the King's bench in the Govier Case, supra; that is to say, that the adultery of the wife bars her right to support no matter how flagrant the misconduct of the husband may have been in the same direction. In the case before us the parties seem to have equally sinned. The plaintiff's right to relief, unless barred by her misconduct, was conceded. The burden was therefore upon the defendant to show that his wife's misconduct was of such a nature, or so far exceeded his own in moral obliquity, as to justify him in turning her off. No proof of the kind appears in the record. No finding to that effect has been made or requested. We have here the bare facts that the plaintiff committed an act of adultery and that the defendant also committed an act of adultery. These acts standing alone, I say, do not justify the defendant's refusal to support his wife.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN HOLLER AND WIFE

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 83 S. E. 92.)

New trial — insufficient issues.

1. A new trial will be awarded if the issues submitted in a case are not sufficient to support the judgment rendered.

Telegram — failure to deliver — right to sue.

2. The mere fact that the wife of the addressee of a telegram was the sister of the one whose death the message announced is not sufficient to entitle her to recover damages for mental anguish for its nondelivery.

Same — findings — beneficiary.

3. To support a judgment in favor of the wife of an addressee of a telegram announcing the death of her sister, for mental anguish because of its nondelivery, where her interest in the message is denied by the company, there must be a finding that she was the legal beneficiary therein.

(Clark, Ch. J., dissents.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Iredell County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to deliver a telegram. Reversed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This action was brought by John Holler and wife to recover damages for delay in delivering a telegram. It is alleged in the complaint that Mrs. Hattie Hastings died on January 1, 1907, at 8 o'clock P. M., and J. D. Rogers, a relative, at 5 o'clock A. M., on January 2, 1907, requested the defendant's operator at Huntersville, North Carolina, to send a message to John Holler and wife, who lived at Morrisville, North Carolina, notifying them of Mrs. Hastings's death, and paid the charges therefor. The operator was told that Mrs. Hastings was a sister of Mrs. Holler. He wrote the message for Rogers, and agreed to transmit it, but it was delivered at Morrisville too late for Mrs. Holler to reach Huntersville or the place of burial before the funeral, by reason of which she suffered mental anguish, and is entitled to recover damages therefor. The message, as written by the operator, was as follows:

Huntersville, N. C., Jan. 2, 1907.

To John Holler, Care of Bob White,

Morrisville, N. C.

Hattie died at 8 o'clock last night. Bury this afternoon. J. D. Rogers.

The defendant admitted that it had received and transmitted the message as above set forth, but denied the other allegations of the complaint. There was evidence tending to sustain the plaintiff's allegations.

Issues were submitted to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows:

(1) Did the defendant negligently fail to transmit and deliver the telegram as alleged in the complaint?

Answer. Yes.

(2) Did the sender of the telegram, Rogers, make known to the defendant at Huntersville, at the time the telegram was filed for transmission, the relationship existing between deceased, Hattie Hastings, and Maggie Holler?

Answer. Yes.

(3) If the said telegram had been delivered without delay, could and would the said Maggie Holler have attended the funeral of Hattie Hastings?

Answer. Yes.

Case Note. — Right of person not mentioned in telegram, and whose interest is not communicated to the company, to recover for mental anguish.

The earlier cases upon this subject are collected and discussed in a case note to Helms v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249. And, upon the general question of the liability of a telegraph company to an undisclosed principal of sendee, see case note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Schriver, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 678.

Some cases decided since the preparation of the former notes may be cited.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weniski, 84 Ark. 457, 106 S. W. 486, in an action by the sister of the sendee of a telegram for mental anguish because of failure of telegraph company promptly to deliver a message, the court said: "A telegraph company owes a duty to the transmission and delivery of messages only to persons of whose beneficial interest in the telegram the company receives information from the face of the telegram itself, or from other sources; and it is liable for special damages only where notice of the facts which give rise thereto is received either from the face of the telegram or from other sources."

So, also, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Potts (Tenn.) post, 479, 113 S. W. 789, it was held that damages for mental anguish could not be recovered by the undisclosed principal for delay in the transmission of a telegram announcing a death, although both the sender and the sendee were his agents.

But in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Northcutt (Ala.) 48 So. 553, it was held that an undisclosed principal may sue on a contract to send a telegram made by his agent.

(4) What damage, if any, is plaintiff Maggie Holler entitled to recover?

Answer. $500.

Exceptions were taken to several of the court's rulings, but it is not necessary to state but one, which is the exception to the rendition of judgment for the plaintiff Maggie Holler upon the verdict. Defendant appealed.

Messrs. Armfield & Turner and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant:

The plaintiff had no interest in the telegram which would entitle him to recover.

Helms v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 386, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 118 Am. St. Rep. 811, 55 S. E. 831, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 643.

Messrs. H. P. Grier and A. L. Starr for appellees.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Issues must be so framed that, when answered, they will be sufficient to support the judgment. "We are not inadvertent to the long line of decisions laying down the rule that the refusal of the court to submit an issue tendered by either party cannot be reviewed by this court unless exception is taken in apt time; nor do we wish to be understood as reversing or modifying it. That rule, when reasonably construed, does not conflict with the one herein laid down. What we now say is that § 395 of the Code is mandatory, binding equally upon the court and upon counsel; that it is the duty of the judge, either of his own motion or at the suggestion of counsel, to submit such issues as are necessary to settle the material controversies arising in the pleadings, and that, in the absence of such issues, or admissions of record, equivalent thereto, sufficient to reasonably justify, directly or by clear implication, the judgment rendered therein, this court will remand the case for a new trial. Under this rule, there was error in the rendition of the judgment, and a new trial is therefore ordered." Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 118, 27 S. E. 45. That case has since been approved. Strauss v. Wilmington, 129 N. C. 99, 39 S. E. 772; Hatcher v. Dabbs, 133 N. C. 239, 45 S. E. 562; Kelly v. Durham Traction Co. 133 N. C. 418, 45 S. E. 826. In Falkner v. Pilcher, 137 N. C. 449, 49 S. E. 945, the rule was stated thus: "It may be conceded as a general proposition that a party cannot complain because a particular issue was not submitted to the jury unless he tendered it, but the rule is subject to this qualification, that the issues submitted must in themselves be sufficient to dispose of the controversy, and to enable the court to proceed to judgment, for in that respect the duty of the court to submit issues is mandatory."

It follows that, if the issues in this case were not sufficient to warrant the judgment which was rendered, there was error for which a new trial must be awarded. The judgment was rendered in favor of the feme plaintiff, Maggie Holler, alone, and the verdict, in our opinion, did not authorize it. There is no finding that Mrs. Holler had any beneficial interest in the message which the law recognizes as sufficient to sustain an action for damages, when there has been negligence, on the part of the telegraph company in its transmission, which has caused the plaintiff mental anguish and consequent damage. In Helms v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 386, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 118 Am. St. Rep. 811, 55 S. E. 831, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 643, Justice Brown, for the court, says: "The right of the sendee to recover of a telegraph company for error or negligence in the transmission or delivery of a telegram is altogether denied in Great Britain. Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706. In this country the English doctrine does not generally prevail. Here the weight of authority holds that the sendee may recover in his own name such damage as he may have sustained by reason of negligence when the message was intended for his benefit, and it was apparent on the face of the message, or the company otherwise had knowledge of it. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 543; Joyce, Electric Law, § 1008; Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 320, 78 Pac. 330, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396." But we think this case is, in principle, not unlike Cranford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 138 N. C. 162, 50 S. E. 585, in which we said: "There can be no recovery of damages for delay in transmission and delivery, when it does not in any way appear that the plaintiff was an intended beneficiary of the message. We could not well hold otherwise without subjecting the defendant to liability for damages alleged to have been sustained by those who are strangers to its contracts, and to whom it owed no duty whatever. The mental anguish suffered by the feme plaintiff cannot, under the facts and circumstances of this case, be traced to any wrong committed by the defendant. There is no causal connection between the breach of the duty owed by the defendant to N. P. Cranford and the anguish of his wife, which resulted from her failure to be present at the funeral of her grandchild, and for it, therefore, the law awards no compensation. It is not every one incidentally suffering a loss from the negligence of another who can maintain an action upon that ground. It has been said that there would be no bounds to litigation if the ill effects of the negligence of men may be followed down the chain of results to their final attenuated effect." An analogous doctrine is laid down in Williams v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 N. C. 82, 48 S. E. 559, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 359, in which it is said: "The principle uniformly sustained by the cases upon the subject, some of which we have cited, is that, unless the meaning or import of a message is either shown by its own terms, or is made known by information given to the agent receiving it in behalf of the company for transmission, no damages can be recovered, for failure to correctly transmit and deliver it, beyond the price paid for the service." We may well add what is so well stated in Squire v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 98 Mass. 237, 93 Am. Dec. 160, that "a rule of damages which should embrace within its scope all the consequences which might be shown to have resulted from a failure or omission to perform a stipulated duty or service would be a serious hindrance to the operations of commerce and to the transaction of the common business of life. The effect would often be to impose a liability wholly disproportionate to the nature of the act or service which a party has bound himself to perform, and to the compensation paid and received therefor." Let us apply these principles to the case in hand. The complaint alleges that the message was intended for John Holler and his wife, whereas the message, as sent, was addressed to John Holler alone; and, further, that the operator of the defendant was notified that Mrs. Hastings and Mrs. Holler were sisters. The defendant denies these allegations, except the allegation that the message was addressed to John Holler, and avers, in this connection, that the message so addressed was the only one received and transmitted by it. These allegations and denials raised issuable facts, and there is no finding that, in a legal sense, the message was sent to Mrs. Holler or for her benefit, or that she had any interest in the message which entitles her to recover damages for mental anguish, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The mere fact that she was related to the deceased, even though she was her sister, is not of itself sufficient to impose upon the company any legal duty or obligation to her. The nearness of the relation does not supply the missing link in the chain of causation, for the defendant cannot be said to have caused the alleged injury to her, unless, by its contract, it was, in law, obliged to prevent it, or omitted to perform some legal duty to her, which omission was the proximate cause of the injury. If any person who was related to the deceased can sue for damages, even if not mentioned in the message, and without any showing that he is, in a legal sense, a beneficiary of the message or one to whom the company owed a legal duty, a liability would be imposed "wholly disproportionate to the nature of the act or service" which the company has bound itself to perform, and the aggregate recovery might be almost unlimited. A principle which would lead to such a result cannot be sanctioned by law. Our case in this respect comes directly within the rule we approved in Cranford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra. In that case it appeared that Mrs. Cranford was related to the deceased child, being her grandmother. We held that the relation alone did not entitle Mrs. Cranford to sue for damages resulting from mental anguish, and we so hold in this case; that the verdict by which the jury find merely that the feme plaintiff was related to Mrs. Hastings, being her sister, without also finding that she was the legal beneficiary of the message, is defective, and no judgment for the plaintiff can be based thereon.

The plaintiffs allege in the complaint that the defendant undertook to transmit and deliver the message addressed to John Holler, having knowledge that it was intended for the benefit of Holler and his wife, and also that Mrs. Hastings and Mrs. Holler were sisters. It is also alleged that the message which was actually delivered too late (at about 1 o'clock P. M.) was the one addressed to John Holler. The allegation that the defendant undertook to transmit and deliver the message addressed to John Holler is admitted in the answer, and the other allegations are denied. The charge of the court upon the first issue was confined to the transmission and delivery of the message addressed to John Holler, as will appear from the following instruction: "So on the first issue, to repeat, if you are satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence that the message, which has been offered in evidence, was delivered to the defendant's agent at Huntersville at 6 o'clock, or about 6 o'clock, in the morning, and was not transmitted and delivered to the sendee, John Holler, until 12:34, or about 1 o'clock, as you may find from the evidence, in the afternoon of the same day, then the court charges you that the duration of the time which elapsed between the time when the message was delivered to John Holler, or to the person in whose care it was sent, would be unreasonable delay; and, in the absence of some explanation, it would be your duty to answer the issue 'Yes;' otherwise answer the issue 'No.'" The first issue, by its very terms, relates to the transmission and delivery of the message, and not to any error in wording it, and the pleadings and case on appeal show that it was so understood by the parties and the court and by the jury, if it be necessary to consider anything but the issues themselves and the answers thereto, in order to determine what the verdict is.

It follows that there was error. The verdict must be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

New trial.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

A telegraph company, unlike the postoffice, does not transmit a paper writing. There is no statute which requires a telegram to be written. No rule or custom of the company to require it is shown in this case, and, if there had been, the company waived it, for it accepted the oral message, without objection. If there had been such rule, it must be shown that the sender had notice of it. Hendricks v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 126 N. C. 311, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658, 35 S. E. 543; Carland v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 118 Mich. 369, 43 L.R.A. 280, 74 Am. St. Rep. 394, 76 N. W. 762. In fact a large proportion of telegrams have always been orally delivered to the company for transmission, and this proportion of oral messages has been greatly increased by the use of the telephone, by which a larger number of messages are now orally delivered to the company. Whether the message is written down by the sender or the company is immaterial, for such writing is merely evidence of what the message was which the company received for transmission. The transmission itself is not by a process decipherable by the eye, but by the ear only, and is therefore orally, as it were. 1 Joyce, Electric Law, § 10. The defendant did not transmit a written message. The message in this case announced the death of feme plaintiff's sister and the time the burial would occur. The telegram was received by the defendant at 5:30 A. M., and was not delivered a few miles away till 1 P. M. The evidence is that Mr. Rogers went to defendant's office and directed the agent to send the message to "John Holler and wife," and the operator said, "I will write it down and send it as soon as I can get the wires." The jury found on the issues submitted: (1) That the defendant negligently failed to deliver the telegram alleged in the complaint; (2) that the sender made known to the operator, at the time the telegram was given in to be sent, that the deceased and John Holler's wife were sisters; (3) that, if the telegram had been delivered without delay, the feme plaintiff, Maggie, would have attended her sister's funeral; (4) that the feme plaintiff was entitled to recover $500 damages.

The general rule is that messages of sickness or death need not disclose the relationship of the parties, the nature of the 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) message being notice to the company of the necessity for prompt delivery. 2 Joyce, Electric Law, § 804, and many cases cited, among them, Lyne v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 123 N. C. 129, 31 S. E. 350; Sherrill v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 109 N. C. 528, 14 S. E. 94; Landle v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 124 N. C. 528, 32 S. E. 886; Meadows v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 132 N. C. 40, 43 S. E. 512; Bright v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841; Hunter v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 135 N. C. 458, 47 S. E. 745. This court has held that, if the company desires to know the relationship, the duty is on it to inquire. 2 Joyce, Electric Law, § 805; Bennett v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 128 N. C. 103, 38 S. E. 294. But here the jury find as a fact that the defendant was informed of the relationship, and therefore knew who was the beneficiary of the message, even if the operator had not been told to send the message to "John Holler and wife." Having received the message orally without demur, and taken the sender's money for the service, the defendant was bound to execute the contract. It was told that feme plaintiff was one of sendees. For brevity, or by negligence, it failed to put her name in the telegram. It knew, independently, the relationship, and therefore that feme plaintiff was the beneficiary of the contract. It negligently delayed eight and one half hours to get a death message a distance of 16 miles, with no relay point between. The message could have been conveyed by an ox cart in less time. The evidence brings the case within Cranford v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 138 N. C. 162, 50 S. E. 585, for that holds that it is sufficient if there are facts and circumstances to give the defendant notice that the plaintiff was either (1) the sendee or (2) that the message was sent for her benefit. Here there is direct evidence and finding by the jury of both facts. The jury, having found that the company was notified that the feme plaintiff was sister to the deceased, knew that she was the beneficiary of the message (independently of the sender's direction to send to "John Holler and wife"), and hence Helms v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 143 N. C. 386, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 118 Am. St. Rep. 811, 55 S. E. 831, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 643, does not apply.

It is impossible to see how the sender could do more than to tell the operator to send the message to John Holler and wife giving notice that said wife was sister to the deceased; nor how the defendant could have been more negligent than here, for the operator, said "I will write it down and send it," and then was negligent, both by leaving out the words "and wife," and further in not starting the telegram for eight and one half hours, for, the distance being only 16 miles with no relay point, its actual transmission must have been instantaneous. The public are entitled to better treatment than the defendant gave this plaintiff, and the law ought to see that they get it.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, NY, Appt.,

v.

A. B. POTTS AND WIFE.

(— Tenn. —, 113 S. W. 789.)

Telegram — delay in message — mental suffering — undisclosed principal.

Damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered by the undisclosed principal for delay in transmitting and delivering a telegram announcing death, although both the sender and sendee are his agents.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. Fearons, Brown & Spurlock, Shields, Cates & Mountcastle, for appellant:

The undisclosed principal cannot recover damages for mental anguish occasioned by delay in transmitting and delivering the telegram announcing the death.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217, 18 Am. St. Rep. 37, 13 S. W. 70; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 75 Tex. 531, 6 L.R.A. 844, 16 Am. St. Rep. 920, 12 S. W. 857; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Feegles, 75 Tex. 537, 12 S. W. 860; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Moore, 76 Tex. 66, 18 Am. St. Rep. 25, 12 S. W. 949; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carter, 85 Tex. 580, 34 Am. St. Rep. 826, 22 S. Messrs. Murray & Murray for appellees.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages for failure to promptly deliver a telegram, recovery in the court below for $500, and an appeal in error by the company.

The facts are as follows:

The mother of Mrs. Clara Potts, of Chattanooga, Tennessee, was lying at the point of death near Springville, Alabama. Mrs. Potts requested her brother, W. D. Self, to telegraph news of her mother's death to Chattanooga, when it should occur, in time to enable her to be present at the funeral. The arrangement between them was that the message was to be sent to her husband, A. B. Potts, at his place of business, and he promised his wife that on receiving such a message he would promptly deliver it to Note. — Upon the question of the liability of a telegraph company to undisclosed principal of sendee, see case note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Schriver, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 678. Upon the question of right of person not mentioned in telegram, and whose interest is not communicated to the company, to recover for mental anguish, see case note to Helms v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249. And see Holler v. Western U. Teleg. Co., ante, —, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) her. Mr. Self complied with his promise by handing to plaintiff in error for transmission the following message:

Springville, Ala., 2/14, 1905.

A. B. Potts, c/o Master Mechanic, C. S. Shops, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mother died this morning, seven o'clock; come to Springville, train one, to-night.

W. D. Self.

The message reached Chattanooga at 2:48 P. M. on the same day, and could have been delivered in ample time to enable Mrs. Potts to leave for Springville on the 6:30 P. M. train. If she had received the message in time, she could and would have reached Springville in ample time for the funeral. The company, however, negligently failed to deliver the message until after the 6:30 train had left. In consequence of this negligence Mrs. Potts could not leave for Springville until the next morning. She left on the earliest train possible after the delivery of the message to her husband, but was able to reach her mother's home only after the interment had taken place.

Mrs. Potts and her husband brought suit to recover damages on this state of facts, with the result already stated.

The company had no further knowledge or notice of the relations of the parties, or the probable consequences of a negligent failure to deliver the message, than such as was furnished by the face of the message itself.

The company moved for peremptory instructions in the court below, which was refused, and it insists here that the court erred in denying the motion.

The plaintiff in error insists that the facts stated do not make out a case of liability against it, since, as it claims, Mrs. Potts was neither sender nor sendee of the message, and there was nothing on its face indicating that she had any interest in it. Hence, it is said the consequences of Mrs. Potts, in the way of mental suffering or otherwise, or a failure on the part of the company to deliver the message, could not have been within reasonable contemplation.

At a former term of the court the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, and a petition for rehearing was thereafter filed by the telegraph company, and was held under advisement.

It is not necessary to discuss the right to damages for mental anguish arising from delay in the delivery of a social telegram. That question has long been settled in this state. *Wadsworth v. If on the contract, the right of the sendee is based on the proposition that the contract must be treated as made between the sender and the company for the benefit of the sendee; if under the statute, the sendee sues as the "aggrieved party." *Manier v. of, or anticipate, the damages that may result or naturally flow from a failure to properly deliver the message, either from facts communicated to its agents dehors the message, or from the face of the message itself. *Pepper v. It is not necessary to a recovery that the suit should be brought either by the person whose name appears in the telegram as the sender, or by the one whose name appears as the sendee. It may be brought by one whose name appears upon the face of the message as the beneficiary thereof, though neither the sender nor the sendee. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mellon, supra; Whitehill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (C. C.) 136 Fed. 499, 500. Or it may be brought by the undisclosed principal of the sender. Milliken v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 110 N. Y. 403, 1 L.R.A. 281, 18 N. E. 251; Leonard v. New York, A. & B. Electro Magnetic Teleg. Co. 41 N. Y. 544, 1 Am. Rep. 446, 454; Harkness v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Iowa. 190, 5 Am. St. Rep. 672, 34 N. W. 811; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 654, 13 Am. St. Rep. 843, 10 S. W. 734.

It would seem to follow, from the principles above stated, that the undisclosed principal of the sendee might also bring the action; but the contrary has been held in two cases. Lee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 51 Mo. App. 375; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Schriver, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 678, 72 C. C. A. 596, 141 Fed. 538. And there seems to be a general disinclination to extend the right of recovery for mental anguish, as distinguished from physical injury, beyond the point already reached by the authorities. However, it seems to be recognized that, where the person interested in the telegram is the undisclosed principal of both the sender and the sendee, he may recover. Leonard v. New York, A. & B. Electro Magnetic Teleg. Co. and Milliken v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra.

This is the case we have before the court now for consideration. Both the sender and the sendee were the agents of the undisclosed principal, Mrs. Clara Potts.

The petition to rehear and the accompanying brief, so far as they need be noticed, make the point that the court, in the former opinion, erred in respect of the measure of damages. It is conceded that the undisclosed principal of the sender of a telegram could sue for breach of the contract; but it is said that he would have to adopt the contract as he found it, that he would be entitled to recover only such damages as the apparent sender could recover, and that this would necessarily exclude damages for the mental anguish of the undisclosed principal; that the telegraph company and the apparent sender, together with the language of the message, would be the persons and the matter for consideration; that the company would be presumed to have in contemplation the language, purport, and effect of the message, and the relation of the apparent sender thereto, and would be liable to the apparent sender, in case of a breach of duty in respect of the message, for all such damages as might be considered as arising naturally, in the ordinary course of things, from such breach of contract or violation of duty, but this could not be held to include a special injury to a third person, whose particular relation to the matter could not be held in contemplation, because not only unknown, but unsuggested by the language of the message or otherwise; that, where the subject of the message is some commercial matter, and a breach of duty occurs on the part of the telegraph company, the nature of the business, which is the subject of the telegram, places the parties thereto in possession of data from which they may contemplate the probable effect of a failure in correct and seasonable transmission and delivery on the part of the company, and that an undisclosed principal can obtain the benefit of this as fully as the agent, the apparent sender; but that the case is different in respect of social messages, since in these the personal element enters of the special relation of the parties thereto, and, unless the existence of such parties and the fact that they have an interest in the message be called to the attention of the company by something in the language of the message itself or by collateral information given to the company or its agent in the course of the transaction, it is impossible that there should have been had in contemplation the relationship and interest of such parties, and the probable result to them of a breach. It is said that it was on this principle that the recoveries were based in favor of the undisclosed principal in the two commercial cases referred to in the original opinion (Leonard v. New York, A. & B. Electro Magnetic Teleg. Co. and Harkness v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra), and on which relief for mental anguish was denied in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kerr, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 23 S. W. 564, and Pacific Exp. Co. v. Redman (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 677, and that the two mental-anguish cases relied upon in the original opinion (Cashion v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. C. 459, 45 L.R.A. 160, 32 S. E. 746, and Landie v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. C. 528, 32 S. E. 886) have, since the delivery of our former opinion, been discredited by the supreme court of North Carolina; the first-mentioned case having been in terms overruled, and the second in effect, by the case of Helms v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 386, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, 118 Am. St. Rep. 811, 55 S. E. 831, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 643, it having been held in the case last cited, and the two Texas cases (4 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 23 S. W. 564, and [Tex. Civ. App.] 60 S. W. 677), that the undisclosed principal in a social telegram could not recover for his mental anguish, but only such damages as the apparent sender could recover,—that is, the cost of the telegram.

This view of the matter was not suggested by counsel at the former hearing, nor did it occur to the court; but, after further examination of the authorities and careful reflection, we are of the opinion that this is the correct view. Of course, there never could have been any doubt of the general proposition that an undisclosed principal of the sender could have the benefit of a contract made for him by his agent in the name of the latter; but the conditions which he must submit to in availing himself of such contract were not sufficiently attended to in due correlation to the measure of damages in cases of the character before us.

In our own case of Foster v. Smith, 2 Coldw. 474, 478, 88 Am. Dec. 604, the court said: "It will make no difference in such cases . . . that the principal, at the time of entering into the contract, is unknown or unsuspected, nor that the third person has dealt with the agent, supposing him to be the sole principal. The only effect of the last consideration is that the principal will not be permitted, while insisting upon the contract, to intercept the right of such third person in regard to the agent; but he must take the contract, subject to all the rights of such third person, in the same way as if the agent was the sole principal, and, subject to these rights, the principal may generally sue upon such contract in the same manner as if he had personally made it. Neither can it make any difference that the contract be of that character that the agent may maintain a suit upon it in his own name. In cases where a third person deals with an agent supposing him to be the principal, and without any knowledge that the property involved in the transaction belongs to another, such third person may acquire rights which will be protected; and, to this end, it can make no difference whether the action be in the name of the principal or agent. The right to sue upon the contract entered into by the agent, within the scope of his power, and to the enjoyment of all its benefits and advantages by operation of law, flows to the principal, though he may be unknown; and the fact that the third person dealing with the agent, believing him to be the principal, cannot defeat the rights of the principal. Neither will the fact that the name of the principal was conceded, while such third person was induced to contract with the agent believing him to be the principal, be permitted to defeat the rights of such third person under or growing out of such contract, even though the action be brought in the name of the principal; and in all such cases it may be said the principal 'steps into the shoes of the agent.'"

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kerr, supra, it appeared that, the husband of Mrs. Kerr being ill, she asked one Henderson to send a message to Dr. J. C. Jones, at Gonzales, Texas. This message was sent, but was signed only by Henderson, and it was not known to the telegraph company, or to its agent, that Henderson was acting as agent for Mrs. Kerr. The message was not delivered promptly, the husband of Mrs. Kerr died, and the suit was brought to recover compensation for mental anguish and for suspense experienced by her, as the result of the failure of Dr. Jones to arrive as she expected. On this subject the court said: "The telegram, according to the petition, was sent by the agent of appellee, for her benefit. A breach of the contract thus made would give rise to a cause of action for damages legitimately resulting. That this is true, if Henderson acted as plaintiff's agent, appellant's counsel does not deny. The second question presented does not involve a denial of the right of an undisclosed principal to sue upon a broken contract made by his agent for his benefit, but a question as to the character of damages recoverable."

After adverting to the fact that the telegraph company had no notice that Henderson was acting as agent for Mrs. Kerr, the court continued: "There was nothing in the despatch, or the circumstances attending its delivery, to excite any inquiry as to the plaintiff's connection with it. How can it be said that a condition of her mind, to result from the failure to deliver it entered into the calculations of the parties when it was sent? It may be true that she can enforce the contract, if made by her agent for her benefit; but she must adopt it as it was and can recover nothing but what the agent could recover if he sued in his own name. All defenses and rights which the defendant could urge against the agent, if suing, it may urge against the plaintiff. Mechem Agency, § 773. Can it be contended that, in a suit on this telegram by Henderson, an element of damages would be mental anguish of Mrs. Kerr? . . . That the fact of the agency was not communicated may be immaterial to some questions, but very material to others. The principal may sue for breach of the contract made for his benefit, whether his existence and connection with it were disclosed or not; but he cannot, in our opinion, recover a class of damages affecting his person, which an ignorance of his existence put beyond the contemplation of the other contracting party."

The case of Pacific Exp. Co. v. Redman, supra, is in strict accord. In that case it appeared that Miss Redman, through her agent, N. B. Pruett, ordered certain medicine, by express, from a neighboring town. By reason of the negligence of the express company the medicine was not promptly delivered, and as result thereof Miss Redman averred that she suffered great physical and mental pain, and her recovery was seriously retarded. It was not known to the express company that Mr. Pruett was acting as her agent. He made the order in his own name, and it was held that Miss Redman could not recover any damages peculiar to herself, but only such as Pruett could have recovered if he had been suing.

In view of what has been said in this opinion, we think that the conclusion reached in the former opinion, as to the liability of the company, was erroneous, and that a peremptory instruction should have been given in favor of the company, to the extent, at least, of directing a verdict for nominal damages only,—that is, for the price of the message, 40 cents. A judgment will accordingly be entered now. The plaintiff in error will pay the costs of this court, and the defendant in error the costs of the court below.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA
v.

FRANK PALMER, Appt.

(222 Pa. 299, 71 Atl. 100.)

Homicide — self-defense — burden of proof.

Where an intentional killing by the use of a deadly weapon has been established, accused has the burden of showing that it was in self-defense, by a fair preponderance of facts.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the court of Oyer and Terminer for Berks County convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. N. Schaeffer and Robert Grey Bushong, for appellant:

If the evidence made it doubtful whether a killing was done in self-defense or not, it would raise a doubt as to malice, and an acquittal should follow.

Case Note. — Applicability of rule of reasonable doubt to self-defense in homicide.

It should be stated at the outset that it is intended, as indicated in the title, to confine this note to cases involving the question of the extent of proof of self-defense required in homicide; but, as the courts in many instances do not clearly distinguish between self-defense and matters of mitigation or excuse only, and in other instances cite cases of assault as authority for their decision in cases of homicide, some cases not involving self-defense in homicide strictly have been cited; but these cases have been used solely for the purpose of more fully showing the established rules upon the question indicated in the title. Cases have been excluded which merely determine what presumptions are raised from the use of dangerous weapons, or from what malice may be presumed. Cases have also been excluded which turn upon the substantive question as to the elements necessary to self-defense, or upon the question of evidence, whether such elements have been shown, without passing upon the question as to the burden of proof in this respect.

In the discussion of any question involving the subject of "burden of proof" the ambiguity of the phrase creates, probably, the chief difficulty. In many of the text-books the different meanings of this phrase are discussed and elaborately defined, but in others and in many decisions the distinction is ignored, or even denied. The phrase is used in at least two distinct senses, and frequently without any discrimination between the two. In what may be termed the primary meaning of the phrase the "bur-

The burden of proof never shifts, but is on the commonwealth throughout.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The victim of this homicide was a woman with whom the prisoner had lived in illicit den of proof" means the obligation resting on a party who alleges the existence of a fact or thing necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action, to establish it by proof to a legally required extent. In a secondary sense the phrase is used to designate the obligation resting upon a party to meet with evidence a prima facie case which has been created against him. The same ambiguity exists where the phrase is used in civil cases, and in some such cases the difference is more clearly defined than in cases of homicide.

Thus, the two meanings are clearly distinguished in Cody v. Market Street R. Co. 148 Cal. 90, 82 Pac. 666, where the court said: "The term 'burden' or 'burden of proof' is frequently used to signify simply the burden of meeting a prima facie case, rather than the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence."

So, in Buswell v. Fuller, 89 Me. 600, 36 Atl. 1059, the court said: "Generally, the burden of proof upon any affirmative proposition necessary to be established as the foundation of a suit does not shift from plaintiff to defendant, while the burden of evidence, or of the weight or preponderance of evidence, or the burden of explanation, may shift from one side to the other according to the testimony. There is a manifest distinction between the burden of proof and the burden of evidence."

This distinction is also very clearly brought out in State v. Wingo, 66 Mo. 181, 27 Am. Rep. 329 (which was a homicide case), where the court said: "That it devolves upon the state to establish by evidence the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt will not be controverted. The defendant, by his plea of not guilty, puts in issue every material allegation in the indictment. He is not required to plead specially any matter of justification or excuse. The case is not divided into two parts, one of guilt, asserted by the state, the other of innocence, asserted by the accused. He does not plead affirmatively 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that he is innocent, but negatively that he is not guilty; and on that issue, and that alone, the jury are to try the case throughout. There is no shifting of the burden of proof. It remains upon the state throughout the trial. The evidence may shift from one side to the other. The state may establish such facts as must result in a conviction, unless the presumption they raise be met by evidence, but still the burden of proof is on the state to establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt."

Numerous other decisions to the same effect might be cited to show that the phrase "burden of proof" is used in different senses. It should, however, be borne in mind that very many, if not the majority, of the cases ignore this distinction; and this fact renders impractical any classification of the cases upon the subject of homicide from the holding upon the question of the burden of proof.

Practically every case upon the subject of self-defense in homicide holds that the burden, in some sense at least, rests upon the defendant in regard to such a defense. If the prosecution has introduced evidence raising the question of self-defense, he may rest upon that; but even those cases holding most favorably for the defendant (with but few, if any, absolute exceptions) admit that, if the prosecution has established the guilt of the defendant beyond reasonable doubt, and has introduced no evidence tending to show self-defense, the defendant is called upon to answer the prima facie case of the prosecution. But, on the other hand, those cases which state unqualifiedly that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show self-defense if he relies upon it hold generally that the jury must determine the question of self-defense from the entire evidence,—the evidence of the prosecution as well as that of the defendant,—and in fact many of them hold that the burden of proof is not shifted to the defendant if the evidence of the prosecution raises the question of justification; but these cases are not agreed as relations. He admitted the killing, but attempted to justify it as an act of self-defense. His story on the trial was that they had quarreled a number of times; that, on the evening of the killing, they went to a lonely spot in the city of Reading, where they again quarreled; that she there drew a revolver upon him, which he took from her and threw away; that she then grabbed him, and struck him with some object; that, before he started with her to the place of the killing, he had put a razor in his pocket for his protection, thinking she would attempt to do him bodily harm, and that when she grabbed him a second time, believing his life was in danger, he threw his arm around her neck and, holding her head back, cut her throat; that, without releasing him, she sank down, and he then, sitting upon her stomach, cut her throat a second time.

to what degree the proof must extend. From a careful examination of the various cases, it would appear that, regardless of what the holding of the particular case may be as to the burden of proof, the essential question to be determined is what degree of proof of self-defense is necessary,—or better, perhaps, to what extent the self-defense must appear. Some cases go to the extent of holding that the defendant must show self-defense beyond a reasonable doubt, and some go to the other extreme of holding that the burden is upon the prosecution affirmatively to prove the absence of self-defense,—that is, that the state, to prove its case, must affirmatively and conclusively prove the absence of self-defense beyond a reasonable doubt as one of the essential elements of the crime. Between these two extreme views the cases apparently take every possible position.

As is always the case where a decision may turn upon the particular language of an instruction, many of the cases merely approve or disapprove the particular language used, so that it is frequently impossible to tell what the position of the court upon the general subject would be from its ruling in a particular case. For this reason, the cases following will, for the most part, be grouped by states, so that, by a comparison of the different decisions in the state, the established rule may be learned. In a number of states, also, earlier decisions have been overruled, and a consideration of such cases apart from the overruling cases would be misleading.

The great majority of the cases, although differing in some minor points, may be grouped into three classes: First, those holding that a reasonable doubt as to the self-defense entitles the defendant to an acquittal; second, those holding that the self-defense must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence; third, those holding that the self-defense must be proven to the satisfaction of the jury. The cases will be grouped accordingly. Some cases not lend-

The uncontradicted evidence was that there were five cuts upon her body.

On this appeal, two errors are alleged to have been committed by the court below, the first in the following instruction to the jury: "As to whether a reasonable doubt shall establish the existence of a plea of self-defense, I take the law to be this: If there be a reasonable doubt that any offense has been committed by the prisoner, it operates to acquit; but, if the evidence clearly establishes the killing by the prisoner purposely, with a deadly weapon, an illegal homicide of some kind is established, and the burden then falls upon the prisoner, and not on the commonwealth, to show that it was excusable as an act of self-defense. If, then, his evidence leaves his extenuation in doubt, he cannot be acquitted of all crime, but must be convicted of homicide in some ing themselves readily to this grouping are placed under "miscellaneous cases."

It should be noted that most of the cases (excepting the Alabama cases, which will be considered by themselves) which discuss the question of the burden of proof also couple with that discussion a statement as to the degree of proof necessary; and this seems to be the important practical question to determine, rather than the more theoretical question as to the burden of proof.

In some states there are statutes to the general effect that, upon the killing being proved or admitted, the burden of proof is upon the defendant to prove self-defense unless it appears from the evidence of the prosecution. In some states the statute is considered as merely declaratory of the common law, and in few, if any, does the existence of such a statute affect the question under discussion. Where the decision does apparently turn upon a statute of that character, the fact will be noted.

Rule that reasonable doubt of self-defense is sufficient.

The rule followed by the majority of the cases, and the one which seems best grounded in principle, is that the jury must acquit if they have a reasonable doubt, whether from the evidence of the prosecution or the defendant, that the latter acted in self-defense. Under this rule, many cases hold that the burden of proof, in the primary sense, does not shift, but remains upon the state throughout. Others hold that, when the homicide is proven or admitted, the burden is upon the defendant to prove self-defense, unless it is shown by the evidence which proved the killing. In the latter case the phrase "burden of proof" is evidently used in the secondary sense; the cases are not in reality opposed in principle to the other cases, and the practical result is the same.

A very clear exposition of this view is of its grades of manslaughter at least." These are the exact words of Agnew, J., in his charge to the jury when specially presiding in Com. v. Drum, 58 Pa. 9. That charge was accepted at the time by his associates in this court as a clear and correct exposition of the law of homicide, and as a precedent and guide in the trial of such cases. We have since frequently approved it, the present chief justice very recently saying of it: "Its substantial accuracy has never been challenged." Com. v. Paese, 220 Pa. 371, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 793, 123 Am. St. Rep. 699, 69 Atl. 891. When the commonwealth clearly establishes an intentional killing by the use of a deadly weapon, an illegal homicide is presumed. If the defense be insanity, the burden of sustaining it is upon those having charge of the defense, for the accused is presumed to be sane, and his insanity must be established by a fair preponderance of the testimony. Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420; Meyers v. Com. 83 Pa. 131; Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397; Com. v. Barner, 199 Pa. 335, 49 Atl. 60. And so of self-defense, for there is no presumption, in the face of clear evidence of intentional killing with a deadly weapon, that life was taken that life might be spared. The presumption is otherwise in the absence of anything developed to the contrary in the commonwealth's presentation of its case, and, when the attempt is made to rebut that presumption by the affirmative plea of self-defense, it must be made out by a fair pre-given in People v. Shanley, 49 App. Div. 56, 63 N. Y. Supp. 449, where the court said: "In criminal cases the burden of proof always remains the same, and rests upon the prosecution. After the prosecution has introduced its evidence, if it be sufficient in weight to make a prima facie case of guilt, it is to be submitted to the jury with instructions that, in order to convict, they must be satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged in the indictment, or some degree of the crime, the defendant under such circumstances being entitled to have considered as bearing thereon all of the circumstances surrounding the transaction, and the inferences arising therefrom. If the defendant introduces evidence in denial of the commission of the offense or in justification of the act, or of any other matter which tends to exculpate him from the charge of guilt, he is entitled to have such testimony considered, not alone upon the question as to whether the exculpating circumstances establish a defense by a preponderance of proof, but also upon the question of whether all of the evidence, both of the prosecution and of the defendant, raises a reasonable doubt of his guilt. If so, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal; and at all times, during the whole course of the trial, from the beginning to the end, the burden remains upon the prosecution to establish the crime charged, to the satisfaction of the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt. . . . When the people have made a case which establishes the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, it may always be said that the defendant is called upon to answer, and in a sense it may be said that he is required to establish his defense. In this sense he bears a burden; but he is not required to satisfy the jury of anything. If his proof fall short of establishing justification, it may yet be sufficient to establish a defense by creating a reasonable doubt of his guilt, and if it go to this extent he is entitled to an acquittal."

So, in Petty v. State, 76 Ark. 516, 89 S. W. 465, it was held that, under the statute in that state, when the killing is proved, if 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the state produces no evidence tending to mitigate or excuse the homicide, it devolves on the accused to do so; but, when any evidence is introduced, either on the part of the state or the defendant, which, taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, they should acquit. And to the same effect were the decisions in Cogburn v. State, 76 Ark. 110, 88 S. W. 822, and Tignor v. State, 76 Ark. 489, 89 S. W. 96.

And the rule was thus stated in Zipperian v. People, 33 Colo. 134, 79 Pac. 1018; "It is not incumbent upon the defendant in a criminal case, either by his own evidence or that of the people, or both combined, to prove anything to the satisfaction of the jury. It is sufficient to sustain the plea of self-defense if the defendant, by any evidence in the case, succeeds in raising a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury of the truth of any essential element of the charge made against him." And to the same effect were the following Colorado decisions: Hill v. People, 1 Colo. 436; Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 515, 22 Pac. 817; Boykin v. People, 22 Colo. 496, 45 Pac. 419.

So, in Kent v. People, 8 Colo. 563, 9 Pac. 852, the court said: "The proposition of defendant's counsel that the burden of proof never shifts on the defendant at any stage of the proceedings is not strictly correct. It is true the state must prove the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt. The statute then casts the burden of proof as to matters of mitigation or excuse upon the defendant. . . . He is not required by the statute, however, to prove such circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt, or to the extent of satisfactorily establishing his defense. He is only required to prove the same as any other facts are required to be proved; and, if the matters relied on be supported by such proof as would produce a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the guilt of the prisoner, when the whole evidence concerning the transaction comes to be considered by the jury, the rule of law is that there must be an acquittal."

ponderance of evidence. The guilt of the accused must be established in the first instance beyond a reasonable doubt; and, when so established, he is not to be acquitted because the jury, after hearing him or his witnesses, may be in doubt whether he acted in self-defense. In making that defense he admits his intentional killing of another,—a crime under divine and human law, unless it appear in the proof of the killing that it was excusable,—and the burden is rightly upon him to show that it could not be avoided. "We may take it for a general rule that all homicide is malicious, and of course amounts to murder, unless where justified by the command or permission of the law, excused on the account of accident or self-preservation, or alleviated into manslaughter by being either the involuntary consequence of some act not strictly lawful, or (if voluntary) occasioned by some sudden and sufficiently violent provocation. And all these circumstances of justification, excuse, or alleviation it is incumbent upon the prisoner to make out to the satisfaction of the court and jury, the latter of whom are to decide whether the circumstances alleged are proved to have actually existed; the former how far they extend to take away or mitigate guilt. For all homicide is presumed to be malicious until the contrary appeareth upon evidence." 4 Bl. Com. 201. The burden of proving self-defense is not placed heavily upon one accused of taking life. Sacred as is human life, he is not bound to show beyond all doubt that he was declared the following rule: "Before a person can avail himself of the defense that he used a weapon in defense of his life, and be justified, he must satisfy the jury that that defense was necessary at the time; that he did all he could to avoid it, and that it was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself from such great bodily harm as would give him a reasonable apprehension that his life was in immediate danger."

But in Hubbard v. State, 37 Fla. 156, 20 So. 235, an instruction in language almost identical was declared erroneous upon the ground that it required the defendant to satisfy the jury that the act producing the death was necessary, ignoring the established rule of law that, if the evidence upon the question of self-defense, or on any other material question in the case, went far enough to raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury, it was sufficient for acquittal whether the jury was satisfied or not; and further ignoring the well-established rule that the threatened danger to life or person that would excuse the killing of an assailant did not in fact need to be real, but might be apparent only. And to the same general effect were the decisions in Hathaway v. State, 32 Fla. 56, 13 So. 592; Lane v. State, 44 Fla. 105, 32 So. 896.

And in Dorsey v. State, 110 Ga. 331, 35 S. E. 651, it was held that, if the state submitted sufficient evidence to remove the presumption of innocence, the accused was required to establish his defense of self-defense only to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury—in other words, if all the evidence—the people's as well as the defendant's—raised a reasonable doubt of his guilt, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal.

So, in Alexander v. People, 96 Ill. 96, it was held that an instruction was erroneous which told the jury that it was incumbent upon the defendant satisfactorily to establish self-defense. The court said that a defense, though not satisfactorily proven, might be supported by such proof as would produce grave doubts as to the guilt of the prisoner and entitle him to an acquittal. And this case was cited with approval, and followed generally, by numerous other Illinois L.R.A. (N.S.)

cases. Wacaser v. People, 134 Ill. 438, 23 Am. St. Rep. 683, 25 N. E. 564; Smith v. People, 142 Ill. 117, 31 N. E. 599; Halloway v. People, 181 Ill. 544, 54 N. E. 1030; Appleton v. People, 171 Ill. 473, 49 N. E. 708; Lyons v. People, 137 Ill. 602, 27 N. E. 677.

And in Plummer v. State, 135 Ind. 308, 34 N. E. 968, it was held that, as long as there is reasonable doubt whether a homicide was not committed in the reasonable exercise of the right of self-defense, there is a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused; and instructions are erroneous which require the defendant to prove his innocence in that respect beyond a reasonable doubt. And to the same general effect were the decisions in Smith v. State, 142 Ind. 288, 41 N. E. 595, and Lawson v. State (Ind.) 84 N. E. 974.

So, in Trogdon v. State, 133 Ind. 1, 32 N. E. 725, it was held that a defendant in a criminal cause is never required to satisfy the jury of the existence of any fact which, if true, is a complete defense, even though it is affirmative in character like self-defense.

To warrant a conviction in a prosecution for homicide, it was held in Riley v. Com. 94 Ky. 206, 22 S. W. 222, that the jury must be satisfied of the existence of facts which will deprive the defendant of the right of self-defense beyond a reasonable doubt; it is not sufficient that they are established by a preponderance of evidence. And to the same effect were the decisions in Allen v. Com. 86 Ky. 642, 6 S. W. 645; Thacker v. Com. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1584, 71 S. W. 931. But in these cases, however, the question as to which party should furnish proof was not directly discussed.

So, in People v. Coughlin, 67 Mich. 466, 35 N. W. 72, it was held that the burden of proof was upon the prosecution to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was not in self-defense, and that no reasonable belief existed in the defendant's mind at the time that he was in great bodily danger as the facts and circumstances then appeared to him.

And in Hawthorne v. State, 58 Miss. 778, it was held error to charge the jury that compelled to take it, but is humanely permitted to satisfy the jury by a fair preponderance of the testimony that he killed under circumstances justifying his belief that his own life could not otherwise have been saved. To doubt, however, even to reasonably doubt, that life was taken in self-defense, is not to be satisfied that it was so taken, and, when this affirmative defense is left in doubt, it has not been established at all as a basis for acquittal.

There was nothing in the case justifying the presentation of the prisoner's sixth point, and it was therefore properly declined and not read to the jury.

Both assignments of error are overruled, the judgment is affirmed, and the record remitted for the purpose of execution.

the burden of showing that the killing was justifiable was upon the defendant, and, unless he did this to the satisfaction of the jury, he was to be found guilty.

In Harris v. State, 47 Miss. 318, an instruction was approved which made it incumbent on the defendant to produce circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification to the satisfaction of the jury. But such an instruction was condemned in Ingram v. State, 62 Miss. 142, in which case Hawthorne v. State, supra, was approved.

And in Blalack v. State, 79 Miss. 517, 31 So. 105, it was held error to refuse to give the following charge: "The court instructs the jury, for defendant, that the law presumes the defendant innocent, and that the burden of proving beyond all reasonable doubt every material allegation necessary to establish defendant's guilt rests upon the state throughout the trial, and that the burden of proof never shifts to the defendant, and that the law does not require the defendant to prove by his evidence excuse or justification; but if, from all the evidence, the jury entertains a reasonable doubt as to whether the killing was done in the heat of passion, or proceeded from the principle of self-defense, they will find the defendant not guilty."

And in McKenna v. State, 61 Miss. 589, it was held that it was not incumbent on the prisoner to do anything more than to raise a doubt in the minds of the jury as to whether he had a right to believe that the deceased was at the time seeking to do him great bodily harm, and that the only way of avoiding this was to take the life of the deceased. And to the same effect was the decision in Lamar v. State, 63 Miss. 265. To the same effect, also, was the decision in King v. State, 74 Miss. 576, 21 So. 235, where the court said: "First, a state must make out her case to a moral certainty. Then, and not until then, is the accused required by the law of the land to do anything, and then he need only, from the whole body of the evidence adduced for him and against him, raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt, to entitle him to an acquittal."

In criminal prosecutions the burden of proof never shifts, but, as to all defenses which the evidence tends to establish, rests upon the state throughout; hence, a conviction can be had only when the jury are satisfied from a consideration of all the evidence, of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. That rule applies not alone to the case as made by the state, but to any distinct substantive defense which may be interposed by the accused to justify 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or excuse the act charged. Gravely v. State, 38 Neb. 871, 57 N. W. 751.

In State v. McCluer, 5 Nev. 132, the court said: "The statute, it is true, declares that, when the homicide is proven by the state, and no circumstances of mitigation, excuse, or justification are shown, the burden of establishing such mitigation, excuse, or justification devolves upon the defendant; but nothing is said about the degree of proof necessary to be adduced by him to maintain his defense. He is not required to establish the facts constituting his defense beyond a reasonable doubt, . . . nor by evidence preponderating over that produced against him by the state; but only to raise such doubt in the mind of the jury that they cannot be satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

In Brown v. State, 62 N. J. L. 666, 42 Atl. 811 (affirmed in 175 U. S. 172, 44 L. ed. 119, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77), it was held that, on the trial of an indictment for murder, where the justification is self-defense, it is entirely proper to instruct the jury that the burden is on the accused of proving to the satisfaction of the jury a situation and circumstances under which the right of self-defense might be lawfully exercised, provided that they are also instructed that the accused is entitled to the benefit of the reasonable doubt upon the entire case. The court clearly held that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt, even as to self-defense. And this decision was cited with approval, and followed, in State v. Jones, 71 N. J. L. 543, 60 Atl. 396.

So, in State v. Hazlett, 16 N. D. 426, 113 N. W. 374, in a very elaborate opinion the court held that, upon the trial of a person charged with murder, and in which one of the defenses relied on is justifiable homicide, or self-defense, it is prejudicial error to instruct the jury that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish such defense by a preponderance of the evidence. The burden never shifts to the defendant to establish by a preponderance of the evidence either facts and circumstances in mitigation or excuse, or facts establishing an affirmative defense. Under § 10,023, Rev. Codes 1905, where the commission of such homicide has been established by the state, the burden is upon defendant of proving circumstances of mitigation, excuse, or justification, unless the state's proof tends to show that such crime amounts only to manslaughter, or that defendant's act was justifiable or excusable. But this does not mean that defendant is required to do more than show circumstances creating a reasonable doubt as to such matters. And the court expressly disapproved the earlier cases of State v. Yokum, 11 S. D. 544, 79 N. W. 835, and United States v. Crow Dog, 3 Dak. 106, 14 N. W. 437, in which the decision was that the defendant must establish self-defense by the preponderance of evidence.

And in Hamilton v. State, 97 Tenn. 452, 37 S. W. 194, the court said: "No prisoner is bound to establish his defense or innocence beyond a reasonable doubt. All doubts must be resolved in favor of the innocence of the prisoner, and the state must disprove his theory, and make out his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, in order to convict the defendant." And to the same effect was the decision in Frazier v. State, 117 Tenn. 430, 100 S. W. 94.

In Cupps v. State, 120 Wis. 504, 102 Am. St. Rep. 996, 97 N. W. 210, 98 N. W. 546, it was held that proof that a person took the life of another by an act naturally calculated to effect that result prima facie establishes guilt; and such proof casts upon the defendant the burden to rebut the case made against him to the extent of at least creating a reasonable doubt in regard to its being justifiable.

In Trumble v. Territory, 3 Wyo. 280, 6 L.R.A. 384, 21 Pac. 1081, it was held that the accused is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, and the prosecutor must establish, beyond reasonable doubt, every element of guilt, or the accused must be acquitted; hence, the burden of proof is never upon the accused. And to the same effect State v. Churchill (Wash.) 100 Pac. 309.

In United States v. Lewis, 111 Fed. 630, the court, in the charge to the jury, said that the burden of proof rested upon the government throughout the entire case.

In California the cases generally hold that, where an intentional killing has been established, the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that he acted in self-defense. There is some difference of opinion, however, whether this must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, or whether it is sufficient where, from all the evidence, the jury has a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant acted in self-defense. In the earlier cases the defendant was required to show self-defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

Thus, in People v. Milgate, 5 Cal. 127, the court said: "The general doctrine of the books appears to be that, if a jury should find the fact that the prisoner made a felonious assault upon the deceased with an unlawful weapon, inflicting a mortal wound, which produced instant death, and that there was some evidence tending to prove that such wound was given in the heat of blood in sudden and mutual combat, but that the proof of such fact did not preponderate over the proof against it, though it raised some doubt in their minds that the matter of extenuation would not be sufficiently made out, and the judgment of the court would be against the prisoner for the higher offense."

it was held that, where the killing was admitted, the presumption of guilt arises, and the onus is laid upon the prisoner of disproving the guilt; this cannot be done by raising a doubt in the minds of the jury, but by establishing the fact by preponderating proof. And to the same general effect was the decision in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 476.

In People v. West, 40 Cal. 610, a section of the Criminal Code read as follows: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proven, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." And the court held that, under such a statute, it was clearly erroneous to instruct the jury that the burden of proof was upon the defendant, and that he was bound to establish the justifying or mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence, where there was some evidence upon the part of the prosecution which, though perhaps insufficient in itself to convince the jury of defendant's innocence, tended in some degree to show a state of facts which would justify the killing or reduce the defense to manslaughter. The effect of the statute is sufficient to distinguish this case from the earlier cases.

In People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 607, the following instruction was held error: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof, on the part of the prosecution, tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable, or excusable, and this he may show by a preponderance of evidence merely. By a preponderance of evidence is meant that degree of proof which induces the mind of a reasonable man to believe one side of an issue in preference to the other." The decision in this case, however, turned upon another point.

In People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2, 44 Am. Rep. 52, the trial court charged the jury as follows: "To justify the commission of a homicide upon the ground that it was necessary in defense of one's property, it must be made to appear, by a preponderance of the testimony, that the person killed was manifestly endeavoring and intending to commit a felony." The court held that this was error as it was sufficient if the jury found the circumstances such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and the defendant, acting under the influence of such fears, killed the aggressor, although the circumstances might be insufficient to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the aggressor was actually about to commit a felony. In this case it does not appear that the court had in mind the distinction between proof furnished by the plaintiff and that furnished by the defendant, but the language of the court would seem to indicate that, under any circumstances, all that was necessary was that a reasonable doubt as to the self-defense be raised. The court said: "In substance, the jury were told that, unless they found that the justification upon which the defendant relied was made to appear by a preponderance of the evidence, they must convict. But the testimony may have fallen short of such proof, and yet have been sufficient in itself, or in connection with the evidence of the prosecution, to create a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, to the benefit of which the defendant was entitled in law." None of the earlier cases are cited in this opinion.

In People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, the court distinguished People v. West, supra, upon the ground that there was no evidence in the prosecution's case tending to show a state of facts which justified the killing, and held that, under these circumstances, the Penal Code required that the proof on the part of the defense be in some degree stronger than the proof on the other side, or, in other words, that it must preponderate. And this decision was cited with approval, and followed, in People v. Raten, 63 Cal. 421. It may be well to note that in People v. Hong Ah Duck, supra, the Flanagan Case is ignored while the earlier cases are cited with approval.

But in the well-considered case of People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549, the Flanagan Case was cited with approval, and the Hong Ah Duck and Raten Cases were overruled. The court said: "The section casts upon the defendant the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the commission of the homicide. This does not mean that he must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence, but that the presumption that the killing was felonious arises from the mere proof by the prosecution of the homicide, and the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, etc., is thereby cast upon him. He is only bound, under this rule, to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged."

And the principles of the Bushton Case were followed in People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. 207; People v. Lanagan, 81 Cal. 142, 22 Pac. 482; People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 11 L.R.A. 75, 25 Pac. 481; People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405; People v. Marshall, 112 Cal. 422, 44 Pac. 718; People v. Matthai, 135 Cal. 442, 67 Pac. 694.

In People v. Boling, 83 Cal. 380, 23 Pac. 421, the court, in sustaining an instruction, said: "The instruction does undoubtedly require that the defendant shall remove by some kind of evidence in the case (whether appearing in his own or the people's evidence is not important) the presumption which arises from his having killed the deceased, and to that extent the law does shift the burden of proof on him; but the instruction does not declare that it shall be incumbent on him to remove the presumption by a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

preponderance of evidence, which was the vice found in the instruction declared erroneous in the Bushton Case, supra."

Where the evidence of the prosecution showed no circumstances of mitigation or justification, it was held in People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833, that the burden of proof of justifying or excusing the act rested upon the defendant. The court said: "At the close of the prosecution's case the presumption against the defendant was that he had committed an unlawful homicide. It may not be said that the presumption of innocence countervailed against this, since, by the express provision of the law, the presumption of innocence was overcome and a presumption of guilt took its place when the required facts were proven. . . . But here the burden of proving circumstances exonerating the defendant, or reducing the grade of the crime, was cast upon him; and, even though there be no direct contradictory evidence in the record, the jury was not bound to decide in accordance with the defendant's statement, if the presumption the better satisfied their minds."

Where the voluntary killing of deceased was established and admitted, it was held, in People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424, that a prima facie case was made out, and it devolved upon the defendant to show facts which would justify, excuse, or mitigate the killing; and, although his own evidence set out a clear case of justifiable self-defense, yet there was some evidence to the contrary, and, under such circumstances, the court would not set aside a verdict of guilty upon the ground that there was no evidence to support it.

In Arizona, where the statute was taken from California, the courts have adopted the rule in People v. Bushton, supra; Foster v. Territory, 6 Ariz. 240, 56 Pac. 738; Anderson v. Territory, 9 Ariz. 50, 76 Pac. 636; Bryant v. Territory (Ariz.) 100 Pac. 455.

In Iowa the rule seems to be well established that the burden of proof is upon the state to show that the defendant was not acting in self-defense, and the state must do so by evidence sufficiently strong to remove all reasonable doubt.

Thus, in State v. Fowler, 52 Iowa, 103, 2 N. W. 983, it was held that the burden of proof was upon the state to show from the circumstances attending the commission of the offense that the defendant did not act in self-defense.

So, in State v. Dillon, 74 Iowa, 653, 38 N. W. 525, it was held that a charge was erroneous which said, in effect, that, if the defendant in the first instance sought a disturbance or fight with the deceased, but afterwards sought to avoid difficulty, the burden of proving that he inflicted the wound in self-defense is upon the defendant, and he must satisfy the jury that such was the fact; and that this portion of the charge was in conflict with a portion previously given which stated that "the burden of proof is on the state to show the absence of self-defense and the want of sufficient provocation, and the burden of proof at no stage of the case in this class of cases is cast upon the defendant except where the defense is wholly disconnected from the body of the offense and is distinct affirmative matter, as insanity, an alibi, or the like."

And in the State v. Porter, 34 Iowa, 131, it was held that an instruction was erroneous which required the defendant to establish by a preponderance of evidence that he acted in self-defense, as he is entitled to an acquittal if he shows, by the facts attending the commission of the offense proved either by himself or the state, that there is a reasonable doubt that his act was wilful. And to the same effect were the decisions in State v. Morphy, 33 Iowa, 270, 11 Am. Rep. 122; Tweedy v. State, 5 Iowa, 433, and State v. Donahoe, 78 Iowa, 486, 43 N. W. 297.

So, in State v. Shea, 104 Iowa, 724, 74 N. W. 687, it was held that the law in that state was settled that the burden is upon the state to show that the defendant was not acting in self-defense, and that it must do so by evidence sufficiently strong to remove all reasonable doubt. The court said: "No instruction to this effect was given. Such omission in view of the instruction asked was prejudicial error. Contention is made that, as no evidence was adduced by the state tending to show that the act was in self-defense, the burden was upon the defendant to establish the claim that his act was so done. This proposition is mooted, but not decided, in State v. Cross, 68 Iowa, 180, 26 N. W. 62. The court, as now constituted, cannot see any good reason for incorporating such qualification into the rule."

And the principles in the Shea Case are followed generally by the later Iowa cases: State v. Young, 104 Iowa, 730, 74 N. W. 693; State v. Bone, 114 Iowa, 537, 87 N. W. 507; State v. Williams, 122 Iowa, 115, 97 N. W. 992; State v. Smith (Iowa) 99 N. W. 579; State v. Usher, 126 Iowa, 287, 102 N. W. 101; State v. Sharp, 127 Iowa, 526, 103 N. W. 770; State v. Morris, 128 Iowa, 717, 105 N. W. 213; State v. Partipilo (Iowa) 116 N. W. 1049.

In State v. Yates, 132 Iowa, 475, 109 N. W. 1005, the rule of the Shea Case was acknowledged; but it was held that it was not error for the trial court to refuse or neglect to charge in regard to self-defense where the defense was intoxication and there was a total absence of any evidence of self-defense as a ground of justification.

In State v. Hayden, 131 Iowa, 1, 107 N. W. 929, the court said: "What we mean is that an unexplained killing with a deadly weapon is evidence of malice, and that the burden is on the accused in that sense that he must make proof of legal excuse, justification, or extenuation, or take the risk of a conviction upon the presumption or inference of malice." While this case may be distinguished in principle from the Shea Case, nevertheless the language used would indicate that the court did not wholly agree with the principle enunciated in that case.

most carefully considered hold that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt of his guilt arising on the whole case.

Thus, in State v. Wingo, 66 Mo. 181, 27 Am. Rep. 329, it was held error to charge the jury to the effect that, if the defendant shot and killed deceased, the law presumed that it was murder, in the absence of proof to the contrary; and it devolved upon the defendant to show from the evidence in the case, to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, that he was guilty of a less crime or acted in self-defense. The court said: "The state's interest is not promoted by the conviction and punishment of any of her citizens for crimes of which they are innocent, and it is as much the duty of those who represent her to protect the innocent as to convict the guilty. If the Massachusetts doctrine in regard to homicide be correct, the prosecuting attorney has but to introduce those witnesses who saw nothing to justify the defendant, to throw the burden of proving his innocence upon the defendant, and impose upon him the duty of proving by a preponderance of evidence, as in civil cases, the facts he relies upon for justification or excuse. This is 'the careful management of a case on the part of the government' by which the burden is shifted in Massachusetts in prosecutions for homicide. The defendant is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt of his guilt on the whole case, not only as to whether the case made by the state is open to reasonable doubt. But, if the evidence for the state be clear, and, in the absence of other evidence, conclusive, still if the evidence adduced by the accused, whether it establishes the facts relied upon by a preponderance of evidence or not, creates a reasonable doubt of his guilt in the minds of the jury, he is entitled to an acquittal. At no stage of the trial does he stand asserting his innocence."

And in State v. Alexander, 66 Mo. 148, the rule in State v. Wingo, was approved, but it was held not reversible error to give the charge criticized in the Wingo Case, where the jury was clearly informed by the charge taken as a whole, that the burden of proof was upon the people, and that the justification need be proved but to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury. The court said: "We would suggest that, instead of declaring as in the fifth instruction, the court, after stating as in that instruction the presumption of law from an intentional killing with a dangerous weapon, should instruct the jury that it devolves upon the defendant to adduce evidence to meet or repel that presumption." To the same general effect were the decisions in State v. Hill, 69 Mo. 451; State v. Hickam, 95 Mo. 323, 6 Am. St. Rep. 54, 8 S. W. 252; State v. Jones, 78 Mo. 278.

But the contrary doctrine was enunciated in State v. Tabor, 95 Mo. 585, 8 S. W. 744, where the court, after citing Com. v. Drum, 58 Pa. 9, said: "The doctrine in the case just cited from Pennsylvania, from which state our statute respecting murder was obtained, that a homicide being proven or admitted by the prisoner, and no countervailing circumstances being evolved by the testimony of the prosecution, the burden is then cast upon the prisoner to show to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury such circumstances of excuse or palliation as will take away the presumption drawn by the law, that the killing was murder in the second degree, and show that he was guilty of a less crime, or that the homicide was committed in his lawful self-defense, is well settled in this state."

In State v. Brown, 64 Mo. 367, it was stated generally that the court did not err in refusing to give an instruction to the effect that the burden of proof was on the state to prove a case against the defendant, not only that he killed the deceased, but that he did so without any justifiable or legal excuse.

In State v. Beckner, 194 Mo. 281, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 535, 91 S. W. 892, the court upheld a general instruction upon the question of self-defense. In regard to that instruction, the court said: "It does not entail upon the defendant, as the learned counsel claim, the burden of establishing his innocence, but simply that, from all the evidence, it must appear to the jury that there was sufficient cause for the defendant to apprehend that his adversary was about to slay him or do him some great bodily harm, and that it was imminent."

The rule in New York is that the burden of proof is upon the prosecution throughout, and that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt as to the entire evidence.

Thus, in People v. Riordan, 117 N. Y. 71, 22 N. E. 455, it was held that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt, not only to the case made out by the prosecution, but also to any defense interposed; and therefore it was error to charge to the effect that the burden was upon the defendant to establish that defense beyond a reasonable doubt.

And the Riordan Case has been cited with approval, and followed, in a number of New York cases: People v. Downs, 123 N. Y. 558, 25 N. E. 988; People v. Cassata, 6 App. Div. 386, 39 N. Y. Supp. 641; People v. Shanley, 49 App. Div. 56, 63 N. Y. Supp. 449 (for opinion, in special term, on application for certificate of reasonable doubt, see 30 Misc. 290, 62 N. Y. Supp. 389); People v. Epaski, 57 App. Div. 91, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1033; People v. Hill, 65 Hun, 420, 20 N. Y. Supp. 187.

To the same general effect was the decision in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164, 13 Am. Rep. 492, where, under the statute defining the various degrees of homicide, it was held that an instruction to the effect that the law would imply murder from the fact of the killing was erroneous. The court said: "It was in effect instructing the jury that, although the people must prove all these facts, yet they had done so by proving the killing, and by that the case of the prosecution was fully and entirely made out, and 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) that this proof made it the duty of the prisoner to satisfy them that it was not murder which the law would imply from that proof, thus in effect instructing the jury that the proof of the killing cast the burden of proof upon the prisoner to show that it was not murder, but manslaughter, or justifiable homicide. No such burden of proof was, by that, cast upon the prisoner."

Some of the earlier New York decisions, however, are to the contrary.

Thus, in Patterson v. People, 46 Barb. 625, it was held that, where the killing was proved and conceded, it was for the defendant to satisfy the jury that it was in self-defense. The court said: "It would be reversing the whole order of the trial, and the burden of proof, if it devolved upon the people not only to prove the killing, but to negative any possible defense that the statute or common law affords to an alleged offender charged with crime."

And in People v. Schryver, 42 N. Y. 1, 1 Am. Rep. 480, it was held that in all cases of voluntary homicide it was sufficient for the people to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner killed the person, and then the burden is upon the prisoner to show that it was justifiable or excusable, and he must show this by a preponderance of the evidence.

In People v. McCarthy, 110 N. Y. 309, 18 N. E. 128, it was held that, while the burden of proving the accusation was upon the people, the burden of justifying the use of a deadly weapon was upon the defendant. In connection with this case, it may be well to call attention to People v. Shanley, supra, where this decision is criticized and overruled upon the authority of People v. Riordan, supra.

In Texas the cases uniformly hold that it is sufficient if the jury have a reasonable doubt as to the self-defense, and the burden of proof is upon the state at all times. Cogdell v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 178, 63 S. W. 645; Vann v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 434, 108 Am. St. Rep. 961, 77 S. W. 813; Slade v. State, 29 Tex. App. 381, 16 S. W. 253.

In Pratt v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 227, 96 S. W. 8, it was held that, where the prosecution offered in evidence the admissions and confessions of the defendant, which also embraced statements upon his part that the act was committed in self-defense, the burden was upon the state to prove the falsity of the defendant's statement that he acted in self-defense.

Rule that the burden of proof is upon defendant to show self-defense by a preponderance of evidence.

In many cases the courts assert the rule that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show self-defense by a preponderance of evidence. Under such a rule, the burden of proof shifts to the defendant upon the establishment by the prosecution of the intentional killing by the defendant. It should be noted that, under this rule, as in nearly all other cases involving this question, there is some apparent ambiguity of terms; and the practical question determined by these cases is rather the fact that the defense of self-defense must appear by a preponderance of evidence, than the fact that the court states the rule to be that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show self-defense.

Thus, in Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373, it was held that, when the intentional killing has been established without excuse or justification apparent from the evidence of the prosecution, the burden is upon the defendant to prove and fact of extenuation, such as self-defense, by preponderating proof; and it is not sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of such facts.

So, in Territory v. McAndrews, 3 Mont. 158, it was held that an instruction that the burden of proof is upon the prosecution throughout and does not shift in criminal cases was not correct where a statute provided that, the killing being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the homicide, will devolve upon the accused, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution sufficiently manifests that the accused was justified or excused.

In Ohio the rule as laid down in Silvus v. State, 22 Ohio St. 90, is that, where it is sought to excuse an act of killing upon the ground of self-defense, it is incumbent upon the defendant to prove the excuse by a preponderance of evidence. And to the same effect are a number of other Ohio decisions: Weaver v. State, 24 Ohio St. 584; Turner v. State, 5 Ohio C. C. 537; Carr v. State, 21 Ohio C. C. 43; State v. Snelbaker, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 466.

And in State v. Ballou, 20 R. I. 607, 40 Atl. 861, it was held that, if the defendant wishes to justify by self-defense, the burden is upon him to prove such self-defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

And in State v. Yokum, 11 S. D. 544, 79 N. W. 835, where the statute provided, when homicide is proved, the burden of proving justification is upon defendant unless the state's evidence tends to show it, it was held that self-defense must be established by accused by a preponderance of the evidence, and it is not enough that the evidence raises a reasonable doubt as to the defense. And to the same effect was the decision in United States v. Crow Dog, 3 Dak. 106, 14 N. W. 437, which was decided prior to the statute. These cases, however, were disapproved in State v. Hazlett, 16 N. D. 426, 113 N. W. 374.

As was suggested in the opinion in Com. v. PALMER, the leading case in Pennsylvania is Com. v. Drum, 58 Pa. 9, and the holding in that case is sufficiently set out in that opinion. To the same general effect were the decisions in Cathcart v. Com. 37 Pa. 108; Tiffany v. Com. 121 Pa. 165, 6 Am. St. Rep. 780, 15 Atl. 462; Com. v. Brown. 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 640.

In People v. Callaghan, 4 Utah, 49, 6 Pac. 49, it was held that the defendant must sustain the claim that a homicide was committed in self-defense by preponderance of evidence. And to the same effect was the decision in People v. Tidwell, 4 Utah, 506, 12 Pac. 61.

And in Vaiden v. Com. 12 Gratt. 717, it was held that, to make out a case of self-defense in a case of homicide, the accused must show to the jury that the defense was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself against grievous bodily harm; and that, with regard to the necessity that will justify the slaying of another in self-defense, the accused must not have wrongfully occasioned the necessity, for a man shall not in any case justify the killing of another by a pretense of necessity, unless he were without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself. And to the same effect were the decisions in Clark v. Com. 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 440; Lewis v. Com. 78 Va. 732; and Hill v. Com. 2 Gratt. 595.

In South Carolina the general rule is that, while the state must prove the offense beyond a reasonable doubt, yet, if the defendant relies upon self-defense, he must prove such self-defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

Thus, in State v. Welsh, 29 S. C. 4, 6 S. E. 894, it was held that while, in a criminal prosecution, the accused is allowed the benefit of all reasonable doubts, yet, if a party charged with a crime pleads a particular defense, such as self-defense, the fact must be proved by him by a preponderance of the evidence.

So, in State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 117, 11 S. E. 624, it was held that while the state, in a criminal case, is bound to prove every essential element of the charge made beyond a reasonable doubt, the same strictness of proof is not required of a defendant who sets up a special defense, for he is required only to prove such defense by a preponderance of the evidence; but this is subject to the general rule that if, upon the whole testimony, both upon the part of the state and the defendant, the jury entertains a reasonable doubt as to any material point in the case, the defendant is entitled to such doubt. And to the same effect are numerous other South Carolina decisions: State v. Brown, 34 S. C. 41, 12 S. E. 662; State v. Summers, 36 S. C. 479, 15 S. E. 369; State v. Ariel, 38 S. C. 221, 16 S. E. 779; State v. Way, 38 S. C. 333, 17 S. E. 39; State v. Workman, 39 S. C. 151, 17 S. E. 694; State v. McIntosh, 40 S. C. 349, 18 S. E. 1033; State v. Petsch, 43 S. C. 132, 20 S. E. 993; State v. Hutto, 66 S. C. 449, 45 S. E. 13; State v. Reeder, 72 S. C. 223, 51 S. E. 702; State v. Way, 76 S. C. 94, 56 S. E. 653; State v. Moss, 77 S. C. 391, 57 S. E. 1098; State v. Owens, 79 S. C. 125, 60 S. E. 305; State v. Kibler, 79 S. C. 170, 60 S. E. 438; State v. Franklin, 80 S. C. 332, 60 S. E. 953; State v. Lindsay (S. C.) 63 S. E. 1044.

The apparent inconsistency in the language as used in the South Carolina cases is to be explained, doubtless, by the fact that self-defense is looked upon as an affirmative defense, and the absence of self-defense as not one of the elements of the crime.

In State v. Thraikill, 71 S. C. 136, 50 S. E. 551, it was held that the absence of other probable means of escape was an essential element of the plea of self-defense, and, like its other elements, must be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

The rule in West Virginia, as laid down by State v. Dillard, 59 W. Va. 197, 53 S. E. 117, is, that, where a homicide is proved and the prisoner relies upon self-defense, the burden is upon him to establish such defense by a preponderance of evidence; and the fact that the state, in proving the homicide, shows facts from which it may be concluded that the killing was justifiable, cannot alter the rule where self-defense is relied upon; but facts introduced by the state in proving the corpus delicti, which at the same time show, or tend to show, want of malice or that the killing was in self-defense, are to be considered in determining whether or not the evidence does preponderate in favor of self-defense. And to the same effect were the earlier decisions: State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679; State v. Jones, 20 W. Va. 704; State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 801; State v. Zeigler, 40 W. Va. 593, 21 S. E. 763; State v. Staley, 45 W. Va. 792, 32 S. E. 198; State v. Manns, 48 W. Va. 480, 37 S. E. 613; State v. Hatfield, 48 W. Va. 561, 37 S. E. 626; State v. Johnson, 49 W. Va. 684, 39 S. E. 665; State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230; State v. Cottrill, 52 W. Va. 363, 43 S. E. 244.

Rule that jury must be satisfied of the self-defense.

In some cases it is held that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to prove self-defense, not by a preponderance of the evidence, but to the satisfaction of the jury. This is the recognized rule in North Carolina.

Thus, in State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. (2 Winst. L.) 56, 86 Am. Dec. 442, it was held that the onus of proving justification, excuse, or mitigation is upon the prisoner, who must prove his case to the satisfaction of the jury; but the doctrine of reasonable doubt does not apply to matter of mitigation or excuse which the prisoner is required to establish.

And this doctrine was reasserted in State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26, where it was held that the defendant must prove his case to the satisfaction of the jury, and not by preponderance of the evidence; and the earlier decision of State v. Johnson, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 266, in which it was held that it was incumbent upon the prisoner to establish the matters of excuse beyond a reasonable doubt was expressly overruled.

And the doctrine of the Willis Case has been upheld by a large number of other decisions in that state: State v. Haywood, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 376; State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488; State v. Vann, 82 N. C. 632; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481; State v. Carland, 90 N. C. 668; State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 676; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987; State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. 722, 18 S. E. 394; State v. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Byrd, 121 N. C. 634, 28 S. E. 353; State v. Barrett, 132 N. C. 1005, 43 S. E. 832; State v. Castle, 133 N. C. 769, 46 S. E. 1; State v. Clark, 134 N. C. 698, 47 S. E. 36; State v. Walker, 145 N. C. 567, 59 S. E. 878; State v. Quick (N. C.) 64 S. E. 168; State v. Peterson (N. C.) 63 S. E. 87.

So, in State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 512, 6 S. E. 420, the doctrine set forth by the other North Carolina cases was upheld, and the court approved a charge to the jury to the effect that, when the killing was proved to have been done with a deadly weapon or admitted by the prisoner, the burden of showing the mitigating circumstances shifted to the prisoner, and this he must show, not by preponderance of testimony or beyond a reasonable doubt, but to their satisfaction; and, if the jury were left in doubt as to the mitigating circumstances, it would be a case of murder.

And in numerous Delaware cases a charge has been delivered to the jury to the effect that the burden is upon the defendant to establish self-defense to the satisfaction of the jury: State v. Powell, 5 Penn. (Del.) 24, 61 Atl. 966; State v. Brown, 5 Penn. (Del.) 339, 61 Atl. 1077; State v. Cephus (Del.) 67 Atl. 150; State v. Honey (Del.) 65 Atl. 764.

In State v. West, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 371, the judge charged the jury that the defense of self-defense admits the killing, and, as the law presumes it to have been unlawfully and feloniously done by him, until the contrary satisfactorily appears from the evidence in the case, the burden of establishing that defense to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt also rests on the prisoner, unless it otherwise so appears from evidence produced on the part of the state. This is an extreme ruling, and doubtless may be considered overruled by the other Delaware cases preceding.

In numerous cases the decision is ambiguous, and the language is such that it is impossible to classify it under any of the foregoing rules. It will be noted that some state only that the burden of proof is upon the defendant, and do not state to what degree the proof must extend. But, as was suggested above, the ruling in many of such cases was only the approval or disapproval of the charge of the trial court.

In State v. Bailey, 79 Conn. 589, 65 Atl. 951, the court expressly states that the burden of proof (in the primary sense indicated above) is upon the defendant to show self-defense; yet, if there is a reasonable doubt upon the whole case, even as to the self-defense, the defendant should be acquitted. In speaking of the charge of the court, the court said: "The defendant has no reason to complain of the charge thus given. It is elementary law that a party defendant to a judicial controversy of any kind, who relies upon some distinct ground of defense not necessarily connected with the transaction on which the charge against him is founded, assumes as to the fact constituting such defense the burden of proof; that is, he presents an issue upon which he goes forward with his evidence and the other side rebuts. . . .

The trial court, after stating, in conformity with this principle, that all the circumstances of the necessity of the self-defense claimed by the defendant were to be proved by him, added that such proof was to be by a fair preponderance of evidence. Whether such instructions, standing alone, would be, in view of the situation disclosed by the record, a correct statement of the law, we need not consider; for they were immediately qualified by a clear statement of the duty of the jury to acquit if on the whole evidence, including that as to self-defense, a reasonable doubt were raised as to the defendant's guilt. This, in effect, was to say that, even if the evidence which the defendant produced did not suffice to establish by a preponderance of proof the necessity of self-defense, yet it must be considered by them in connection with all the other evidence, and was sufficient to require a verdict in his favor, if, when so considered, a reasonable doubt of his guilt should exist."

In Bell v. State, 69 Ga. 752, it was held that, after charging the different degrees of manslaughter and stating the presumption in favor of the defendant, there was no error in charging that such presumption might be removed by proof of the fact of the killing as charged in the indictment, and the onus be shifted to the defendant to show that it was justifiable.

In Green v. State, 124 Ga. 343, 52 S. E. 431, it was held that, if the evidence relied upon by the state to show the killing contained circumstances of alleviation or justification, the burden of proving that the crime was murder was not shifted, for malice would not be presumed to exist where the evidence showed circumstances of mitigation.

In People v. Tubbs, 147 Mich. 1, 110 N. W. 132, it was held that, a charge in regard to self-defense, to the effect that, unless the facts constituting reasonable cause to believe himself in imminent danger had been established by the defense in the case, there could not be an acquittal on the ground of self-defense, was not reversible error where, from the whole charge, the burden of proof was clearly placed on the prosecution, and the jury could not have been misled.

In State v. Peterson (N. C.) 63 S. E. 87, it was held that, where the killing with a deadly weapon was admitted, the burden was upon the defendant to show self-defense.

In Goodall v. State, 1 Or. 333, 80 Am. Dec. 396, it was held that the mere fact that the killing was admitted by the prisoner did not devolve upon him the necessity to prove that it was justifiable. And this decision was cited with approval, and followed, in State v. Whitney, 7 Or. 386.

In State v. Bertrand, 3 Or. 61, the following charge was made to the jury: "The burden is on the state, in the first instance, to remove the presumption of innocence, and to show that the defendant did the acts that constitute the crime. But, when the state shows beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant purposely did the killing charged in the indictment, with a weapon that was designed for the very purpose of taking life, as soon as that point is established, the burden of proof changes, and the burden then rests upon the defendant. And, if there is not proof to show that the act was justifiable, or to show that it was excusable, the defendant is not entitled to be acquitted for the lack of evidence on the subject of justification or of excuse. Where voluntary killing with a gun is fully proved, and some evidence is offered tending to show a justification or an excuse, if there is not a preponderance of evidence in favor of justification or excuse, the defense is not made out." And a similar charge was given in State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

In State v. Gray, 46 Or. 24, 79 Pac. 53, the court, by implication, held that it would be error to instruct the jury to the effect that the burden of showing that the killing was in self-defense was imposed upon the defendant.

In Rice v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 255, 103 S. W. 1156, the trial court charged the jury as follows: "And, in this connection, you are instructed that, unless you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did not act in his own self-defense as above defined, then you will give him the benefit of the doubt and acquit him." On appeal it was held that this charge either shifted the reasonable doubt upon the defendant, or it was absolutely unintelligible and confusing; and therefore such a charge was error. While it is true that the language of the charge is somewhat confusing, it is difficult to see how it shifts any question of reasonable doubt onto the defendant.

The rule in Alabama.

In Alabama, where the cases are very numerous, the general rule is that, where the killing is proven or admitted, the burden of proving self-defense is upon the defendant; but the cases are not entirely harmonious in regard to the burden of proving the different elements of self-defense, nor the degree of proof necessary. The cases are so numerous and so little in accord with the other cases that they have been grouped separately.

Thus, in Lawson v. State (Ala.) 46 So. 259, it was held that the burden of proving self-defense is upon the defendant, and, unless the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the plea is sustained, the defense fails, as a reasonable doubt as to whether the plea of self-defense is sustained or not is not sufficient to justify an acquittal.

And in Etheridge v. State, 141 Ala. 29, 37 So. 337, it was held not error to refuse to charge: "The burden of proof is upon the state to prove to the jury from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was not free from fault in bringing on the difficulty, before the defendant will be precluded from invoking the doctrine of self-defense."

But in Henson v. State, 112 Ala. 41, 21 So. 79, it was held error not to charge the jury that, if "all the evidence raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to whether he acted in self-defense, the defendant should be acquitted." And this decision was cited with approval, and followed, in Ragsdale v. State, 134 Ala. 24, 32 So. 674.

In Lewis v. State, 120 Ala. 339, 25 So. 43, it was held that a charge was correct which told the jury that the burden of proof of self-defense was upon the defendant, and, to entitle him to a discharge, it must be proved by a sufficient amount of evidence to raise at least a reasonable doubt of his guilt.

Where the defendant was under no obligation to retreat, and there was no evidence that he was at fault in bringing on the quarrel, it was held, in Harris v. State, 96 Ala. 24, 11 So. 255, that the trial court should have charged the jury to the effect that, if they entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant acted upon a reasonable belief that he was acting under impending necessity, or acted before such necessity arose, he was entitled to an acquittal.

In many decisions it is held that the burden is upon the defendant to show certain of the elements of self-defense, while the burden of showing absence of freedom from fault is upon the state; but in none of these does the court state the extent of proof required.

In one of the leading cases in this state, Cleveland v. State, 86 Ala. 1, 5 So. 426, the court laid down the following general rules in regard to the burden of proof of self-defense: "The manslayer must be free from fault in bringing on or provoking the difficulty. The onus of disproving this freedom from fault is not on the defendant. He must be exposed to present, impending peril,—that is, he must be presently exposed to imminent danger of losing his life, or of suffering grievous bodily harm, or must reasonably appear to be so, from which he has no other reasonable mode of escape, without apparently increasing the imminence of his peril. The burden of proving this is on him." And the doctrine of the Cleveland Case as to burden of showing pressing necessity and inability to retreat was followed in the following cases: Lewis v. State, 88 Ala. 11, 6 So. 755; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 18 Am. St. Rep. 96, 8 So. 98; Stitt v. State, 91 Ala. 10, 24 Am. St. Rep. 853, 8 So. 669; Springfield v. State, 96 Ala. 81, 38 Am. St. Rep. 85, 11 So. 250; Keith v. State, 97 Ala. 32, 11 So. 914; Webb v. State, 100 Ala. 47, 14 So. 865; Holmes v. State, 100 Ala. 80, 14 So. 864; Naugher v. State, 105 Ala. 26, 17 So. 24; McBryde v. State (Ala.) 47 So. 302.

And the rule of the Cleveland Case to the effect that the burden of disproving freedom from fault is not upon the defendant was followed in Keith v. State, supra; McDaniel v. State, 76 Ala. 1; Gibson v. State, supra; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dent v. State, 105 Ala. 14, 17 So. 94; Naugher v. State, supra; Howard v. State, 110 Ala. 92, 20 So. 365; Andrews v. State (Ala.) 48 So. 858.

To the same general effect was the decision in Wilkins v. State, 98 Ala. 1, 13 So. 312, where the court said: "When the state proved the intentional killing of deceased by defendant with a deadly weapon, the burden rested on the defendant to show a pressing, imperious necessity to take life in self-defense, unless the fact arose out of the evidence produced against him, to prove the homicide. If this were shown, the burden was then on the state to show that defendant was in fault in provoking the difficulty, which, being established, was a full answer to the plea of self-defense. The law does not presume such provocation, so as to impose the burden of its disproof on defendant."

So, in Linehan v. State, 113 Ala. 70, 21 So. 497, it was held that the burden was upon the defendant to show the various elements of self-defense, unless the evidence which proved the homicide also proved its excuse or justification. The court said: "The burden of proof that defendant was not free from fault in bringing on the difficulty is never on the state until the ingredients of self-defense have been established by the defendant."

And in Wright v. State, 148 Ala. 596, 42 So. 745, it was held that the burden was not on the state to show that the defendant was not free from fault in bringing on the difficulty until the defendant had shown that he was in imminent peril of life and great bodily harm, and could not have retreated without increasing his peril. To the same general effect was the earlier decision in Pugh v. State, 132 Ala. 1, 31 So. 727.

The rule as to the burden of proof is thus stated in Brown v. State, 83 Ala. 33, 3 Am. St. Rep. 685, 3 So. 857: "The use of a deadly weapon, creating the presumption of malice, shifts on the defendant the burden of repelling such presumption, when it is not rebutted or overcome by the evidence which proves the killing. The onus to prove a present pressing necessity, real or apparent, to take life, is on the defendant. But, when he shows this, the prosecution may avoid its effect by proving that the defendant was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, or could have reasonably escaped. The state holds the affirmative of these negative propositions of the plea of self-defense." This decision is criticized in Gibson v. State, supra, upon the ground that the burden was upon the defendant to show that he could not reasonably retreat; but the Gibson Case reasserted the doctrine that the burden was upon the state to show that the defendant was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, and not on the defendant to prove that he did not provoke it.

So, there are numerous other Alabama cases which hold generally that the burden of proof as to self-defense is upon the defendant: Smith v. State, 86 Ala. 28, 5 So.

478; Garrett v. State, 97 Ala. 18, 14 So. 327; Roden v. State, 97 Ala. 54, 12 So. 419; Miller v. State, 107 Ala. 40, 19 So. 37; Howard v. State, supra; Compton v. State, 110 Ala. 24, 20 So. 119; Hendricks v. State, 122 Ala. 42, 26 So. 242; Kilgore v. State, 124 Ala. 24, 27 So. 4; Stewart v. State, 133 Ala. 105, 31 So. 944; Mann v. State, 134 Ala. 1, 32 So. 704; Allen v. State, 146 Ala. 61, 41 So. 624, second trial 148 Ala. 588, 42 So. 1006; Kennedy v. State, 147 Ala. 687, 40 So. 658; Robinson v. State (Ala.) 45 So. 916.

In De Arman v. State, 71 Ala. 351, it was held that the burden of proving that a homicide was committed in self-defense rests on the defendant, unless it can be deduced from the facts and circumstances which prove the killing. And to the same effect was the decision in Hadley v. State, 55 Ala. 31.

So, in Bluett v. State, 151 Ala. 41, 44 So. 84, it was held that the burden was upon the defendant, unless the evidence which proved the homicide proved also the self-defense. And to the same effect was the decision in McCurley v. State (Ala.) 30 So. 1022.

Self-defense when shown by evidence of prosecution.

In many of the cases it is stated or suggested that self-defense may be shown by the evidence either of the prosecution or defendant. In no case is it held that the defendant must introduce the evidence which supports his case, and in numerous cases it has been held that instructions to that effect are erroneous.

Thus, in Crawford v. State, 12 Ga. 149, it was held to be fatal error to charge that the prisoner is required to produce evidence of justification on his part, as the mitigation or justification may as well be shown by the evidence on the part of the state as by proof introduced by the prisoner. The court said that, if the defense was made out by the witnesses on the part of the prosecution, then the defendant need not call any; but, if not, then the defendant must call witnesses and make out his defense by proof.

And in People v. Lemperle, 94 Cal. 45, 29 Pac. 709, it was held that the jury may look to testimony introduced by the prosecution as well as that introduced by the defendant for evidence of mitigating circumstances, or to justify or excuse the act.

And in Alexander v. People, 96 Ill. 96, it was held that any charge which put upon the defendant the burden of introducing evidence to prove justification was erroneous; if the evidence of the prosecution raises a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, it is sufficient. And to the same effect was the decision in Kipley v. People, 215 Ill. 358, 74 N. E. 379.

So, in State v. Castle, 133 N. C. 769, 46 S. E. 1, it was held that the trial judge should have told the jury that the defendant could rely upon the state's evidence for acquittal upon the ground of justification, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that it was not essential that he himself should introduce the evidence showing justification.

And in State v. Moss, 77 S. C. 391, 57 S. E. 1098, it was held that, if the accused conceived that the state had made proof of self-defense for him, he might adopt and rely on that proof as a discharge of his burden to make the proof; but the burden did not on that account shift from the defendant to the state.

So, in Richardson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 612, it was held error to charge that "it devolves upon the accused to establish the facts or circumstances on which he relies to excuse or justify the act," as the proof, in order to convict, is to be found in the evidence adduced on the trial, from whatsoever source it may come.

And in McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93, it was held that a charge in these words, "every homicide is presumed to be committed with malice aforethought, and it devolves upon the prisoner to prove the circumstances which excuse the act," was too broad and unrestricted, and implied that the defendant must himself furnish the evidence. It should also have contained the important addition, "unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him." And to the same general effect was the decision in Head v. State, 44 Miss. 731.

Duty of state affirmatively to prove that killing was not in self-defense.

In some decisions it has been expressly held that the state need not, by affirmative evidence, prove the negative proposition that the killing was not in self-defense, to establish its case.

Thus, in Blanton v. State, 52 Fla. 12, 41 So. 789, it was held that a charge was erroneous which required the state to prove expressly, by affirmative evidence, that the homicide was without justification. The court said: "The burden is upon the state in every prosecution for crime to establish by proof, beyond a reasonable doubt, every material element of the crime charged; and in a prosecution for murder in the first degree it must prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant slew the deceased unlawfully and from a premeditated design to effect his death, and, if these material facts are established by the proof, of necessity it will have been proved that such killing was not justifiable. The burden upon the state is to prove the affirmative proposition; the negative proposition, flowing out of it as a necessary corollary, it does not have to prove by express or affirmative proof, as the charge in question erroneously requires it to do." And this case was followed by Maloy v. State, 52 Fla. 101, 41 So. 791.

So, also, in State v. Cross, 68 Iowa, 180, 26 N. W. 62, it was held that, where no evidence introduced by the state tended to show that the homicide was justifiable, it would have been error to instruct that the burden was upon the state to prove the negative proposition.

And in People v. Shanley, 49 App. Div. 56, 63 N. Y. Supp. 449, it was held that the people, having established the commission of a crime, might rest upon the presumption that the accused person is sane; and, in the absence of proof upon the subject, such presumption will stand as a fact established; and the same rule must be applied to any criminal case where the evidence tends to exonerate the defendant from the consequences of a given act.

The refusal to give an instruction which put upon the state the burden of negating beyond a reasonable doubt defensive matter like self-defense, the burden of affirmatively showing which is upon the defendant, was held proper in Padgett v. State, 40 Fla. 451, 24 So. 145, and in Alvarez v. State, 41 Fla. 532, 27 So. 40.

And in Kent v. People, 8 Colo. 563, 9 Pac. 862, the court said: "The public prosecutor cannot be compelled to search for and put in evidence all the facts connected with the transaction, or exculpatory facts in the prisoner's favor. The policy of the law, as evinced by the presumption of innocence and the doctrine of reasonable doubt, would require the public prosecutor to introduce such proof as will give a fair account of the transaction. This being done, it devolves upon the defendant to produce in evidence such matters of mitigation, justification, or excuse, if any such exist, as may tend to explain his action and show the necessity thereof; otherwise a verdict of guilty must necessarily be returned against him."

In State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200, it was held error to charge that, when the fact of the killing was established, it devolved upon the defendant to excuse the killing, as the true rule was that the jury must find the defendant guilty as charged, beyond a reasonable doubt, upon all of the evidence of the case.

But to the contrary are the Iowa cases cited and sufficiently set out above.

GEORGE CONTOS et al., Appts.,
v.

THOMAS F. JAMISON et al., Respts.

(81 S. C. 488, 62 S. E. 867.)

Tenant — Injury to property — Imputed negligence of landlord.

Tenants are not precluded from holding one who causes the fall of a wall of the building occupied by them through negligent excavation of the adjoining lot liable for the injury thereby caused to their goods, by the fact that one of the proximate and efficient causes of the falling of the wall was negligence of their landlord.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Greenville County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' goods, through alleged negligent excavation on an adjoining lot. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note. — Is the landlord's negligence in relation to the premises imputable to the tenant, or vice versa, so as to prevent a recovery from a negligent third person?

An extensive search fails to disclose any other cases where, as in CONTOS v. JAMISON, it was sought to impute the negligence of the landlord in relation to the premises to the tenants, so as to prevent the latter from recovering against a third person who was also negligent; and only one case has been found which deals with the other side of the question,—that is, whether the negligence of the tenant may be imputed to the landlord, so as to prevent his recovery. This case is Boehm v. Bethlehem, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 385, where an action was brought by the owner of a building against a borough for damages resulting from an overflow caused by a negligent obstruction of a sewer. and it was held, obiter, that, even if the plaintiff's tenants had contributed to the obstruction by throwing refuse in the sewer, it would not relieve the defendants from liability, or prevent the owner of the building from sustaining his action.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs occupied a storeroom known as 210 North Main street, Greenville, South Carolina, as lessees of W. C. Gibson, owner. Defendant Carrie V. Cauble, as guardian and agent, owned the lot adjacent to the south side and employed the defendants Jamison & Morris as contractors to erect certain buildings thereon. On August 8, 1908, while said contractors were excavating close to the side wall of the store occupied by plaintiffs, the wall collapsed and fell, destroying the goods and property of plaintiffs in their storeroom. This action was brought to recover damages, actual and punitive, for the destruction of their property, alleged to have resulted from the grossly negligent and reckless manner in which the work of excavating was done. A nonsuit was granted as to the Cauble defendants, and they are now eliminated from the case. The defendants Jamison & Morris answered, setting up, besides a general denial, that plaintiffs and W. C. Gibson, the owner, had notice of the progress of the excavation and of the manner in which it was done and of the character of the soil, and made no objection to the progress and manner of the work, and did nothing to protect said wall, which negligence on their part contributed as a proximate cause to the injury. The suit resulted in a verdict and judgment for defendants.

The exceptions of plaintiffs-appellants to the admission of certain testimony do not require any extended notice and cannot be sustained. The testimony referred to had been previously admitted without objection, and had some relevancy to the question whether defendants were wantonly negligent.

The vital question raised by the appeal relates to the instruction given to the jury. The court, in giving certain instructions requested by defendants, and in declining to give certain instructions requested by plaintiffs, in the general charge and in the special 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

charge when the jury returned to the courtroom for further instructions on that point, impressed upon the jury that, if the negligence of the owner, Gibson, was one of the proximate and efficient causes of the falling of the wall under the circumstances, the plaintiffs could not recover. This we think was erroneous and prejudicial. The general law is well settled that a proprietor excavating on his own premises is liable for damages done to the adjacent owner's soil if in its natural condition, whether damage results from negligence or not; but, when buildings or other improvements are erected upon the soil, and its natural condition is thus altered, no action lies against such excavator except upon allegation and proof of negligence. Bailey v. Gray, 53 S. C. 518, 31 S. E. 354. There was such allegation in this case, and testimony tending to establish negligence proximately causing injury to plaintiffs' property; but under the charge plaintiffs, as lessees, were denied right of recovery if the landlord Gibson's negligence proximately contributed to the injury, thus imputing to the lessees the negligence of the lessor. No authority has been cited for such a view, and we have found none. The supreme court of Indiana, in Knightstown v. Musgrove, 116 Ind. 121, 9 Am. St. Rep. 827, 18 N. E. 452, approved in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 130 Ind. 143, 14 L.R.A. 736, 29 N. E. 482, declares: "Before the concurrent negligence of a third person can be interposed to shield another whose neglect of duty has occasioned an injury to one who was without personal fault, it must appear that the person injured and the one whose negligence contributed to the injury sustained such a relation to each other in respect to the matter then in progress as that, in contemplation of law, the negligent act of the third person was, upon the principles of agency or co-operation in a common or joint enterprise, the act of the person injured." In Koplitz v. St. Paul, 86 Minn. 373, 58 L.R.A. 75, 90 N. W. 794, the supreme court of Minnesota declared that "negligence in the conduct of another will not be imputed to a party if he neither authorized such conduct, nor participated therein, nor had the right or power to control it." These quotations are made the basis of the text in 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 542. In Watson v. Southern R. Co. 66 S. C. 50, 44 S. E. 375, this court refused to impute to a child non sui juris the contributory negligence of the child's parent or guardian. There is nothing in the mere relation of lessor and lessee which should affect a lessee without fault himself with the negligence of the lessor. There is no agency nor co-operation in a common enterprise, nor power of lessee to control, applicable here, which should excuse the negligence of others. There is a privity between the lessee and the lessor in the lessee's right of possession, but such privity cannot excuse the negligence of another, whether combined with that of the lessor or not. The lessor, Gibson, is not a party in this case, and it was improper to confuse the case with the question of his contributory negligence. The question was: Did the negligence of the defendants Jamison & Morris injure plaintiffs as alleged, and, if so, were the plaintiffs themselves guilty of contributory negligence, excusing the defendants from liability?

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

GULF, COLORADO, & SANTA FÉ RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MRS. ELLIS OVERTON.

(— Tex. —, 110 S. W. 736.)

Damages — mental suffering — injury to relative.

1. One accompanying her invalid sister on a railroad journey, who does not make the contract for the transportation, cannot recover damages for mental suffering due to the physical suffering of the invalid because of the wrongful acts of the carrier in its manner of placing her on the train and neglecting to assist her off.

Carrier — incivility to passenger — inability.

2. A passenger on a railroad train may recover damages for inconvenience and injury suffered by failure of the carrier to exercise toward her that degree of care which is due to a passenger.

Case Note. — Right to recover for mental suffering on account of another's mental or physical suffering.

This note, as suggested by the title, is confined to those cases which involve the right of the plaintiff to recover for mental anguish because of the suffering, mental or physical, of another,—that is, because of sympathy with the suffering of another; and it does not include cases which involve the right to recover for mental anguish for the death of another under statutes giving a right of action for wrongful death. Cases involving the right to recover for mental anguish for wrongs to another which tend to attach disgrace or publicity to the plaintiff or his family, such as seduction, assault, libel, etc., have also been excluded.

In GULF, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. OVERTON it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of defendant's duty as a passenger carrier. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Terry, Cavin, & Mills, Brown & Lomax, and Charles K. Lee, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff could not recover damages for mental suffering because she witnessed mistreatment of and the consequent suffering of her sister.

Messrs. S. C. Padelford and D. W. Odell for defendant in error.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The honorable court of civil appeals refers for a statement of the facts in this case to Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Coopwood (Tex. Civ. App.) 96 S. W. 102, and from the facts stated in that case we make the following condensed statement: Mrs. M. J. Coopwood was a widow whose family conwas sought to make the mental anguish suffered because of another's suffering an element of damages in an action which also embraced direct personal injury. A distinction might be drawn between the question thus raised and the question, Can mental anguish be the basis of the action? As a practical matter, however, this distinction does not appear to have been made.

The weight of authority is to the effect that one cannot recover for mental suffering caused by sympathy with the suffering of another.

Thus, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper 71 Tex. 507, 1 L.R.A. 728, 10 Am. St. Rep. 722, 9 S. W. 598, in an action by a husband for the failure of a telegraph company to deliver a message summoning a physician to attend his wife, the court said: "It is impossible to see upon what principle the sisted of an unmarried daughter, Miss Minnie, a granddaughter, and the appellee, who was a widow and resided with her mother. Mrs. Coopwood, with the members of her family, were on their way to San Angelo with Miss Minnie, who was quite sick, and when they arrived at the depot of the plaintiff in error in Brownwood Miss Minnie was placed in a chair, she being unable to walk. Mrs. Coopwood purchased tickets for all of the party from Brownwood to San Angelo, and paid the regular fare therefor. When the train arrived at Brownwood the porter and brakeman came into the depot, and Mrs. Coopwood explained to them that her daughter was unable to walk, and requested them to carry her into the car, which they agreed to do. About this time Mrs. Overton stated in the presence of the conductor and the porter that she would go onto the train and secure a seat for her sister. "The porter and brakeman picked up the chair Miss Minnie Coopwood was on and carried her out towards the engine and baggage car, with the intention of putting her in the baggage car. Miss Minnie Coopwood asked them not to put her in the baggage car, and cried out to her mother to stop the porter and brakeman and not let them put her in the baggage car. Mrs. Coopwood called to them and asked them not to put her daughter in the baggage car, but they proceeded towards the baggage car, and said that was the place for her if she was sick. Miss Minnie Coopwood begged not to be put on the baggage husband can claim damages for injury to his feelings. His suffering could only be from alarm and sympathy for his wife's suffering. His distress is merely a reflection from her distress, and that might be very considerable; but it is too remote and consequential. She is allowed to recover in this suit, or rather he is, under the forms of law, on account of her injuries of body and mind. To allow him damages for the same injuries would be to allow two recoveries upon the same cause of action. We know of no authority that would justify such a conclusion. The person who suffers the injuries proximately resulting from the wrong done, and such person alone, is entitled to compensation, except in cases where death results, and the cause of action is made to survive to the relatives by virtue of a statute. The husband can sue for such injuries to his wife, but he cannot recover on his own account for his anxiety and sympathy."

And in Woodstock Iron Works v. Stockdale, 143 Ala. 550, 39 So. 335, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 578, the court said: "Under no theory could the plaintiff recover for the mental suffering of himself caused by the sickness and suffering of his wife, as the right to recover for mental suffering resulting from bodily injuries is restricted to the person who has received the bodily hurt. Mental distress caused by sympathy for another's suffering is not a recoverable element of damage."

So, in Bube v. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. 140 Ala. 276, 10 Am. St. Rep. 33, 37 So. 285, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted on the son of the plaintiff, it was held that the father could not recover damages for mental suffering on account of the injuries received by his son. And this decision was cited with approval, and followed, in Reaves v. Anniston Knitting Mills (Ala.) 45 So. 702.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Strate-meier, 6 Ind. App. 125, 32 N. E. 871, it was held that it is not proper to consider as a substantive element of damages any mental distress arising out of sympathy with the sorrow of others.

So, in Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Trimble, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 28 S. W. 96, the court said: "We think the complaining party must be restricted to the mental anguish which emanates from the wrong done himself, and not extended to that which he may experience in contemplating the sufferings of others who may be injured at the same time, however near to him they may be. Were the rule otherwise, each passenger in a railroad wreck might claim the right to recover, not only for the distress of mind which arose from his own injuries, but also for that which he sustained from contemplating the mangled condition of his fellow passengers. And even one who sustained no physical injury himself might be allowed to recover a large verdict for the anguish he endured while witnessing the bleeding forms of his companions and relatives, and listening to their heartrending cries."

And in Gilligan v. New York & H. R. Co. 1 E. D. Smith, 453, it was held that, in an action for alleged loss of services of the plaintiff's son, who was injured by being run over by a railroad car, the pain and mental anguish of the parent was to be wholly excluded in estimating the damages.

So, a recovery was denied the plaintiff in the following cases, for mental anguish because of the physical or mental sufferings of another under the circumstances noted, upon the ground that such mental anguish was not a proper element of damages: Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Trimble, supra (fright and distress of six-year-old nephew negligently carried with plaintiff beyond the proper station); Pacific Exp. Co. v. Black, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 363, 27 S. W. 830 (physical suffering of sick wife because of negligent delay in forwarding medicine); Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180, and Stone v. Evans, 32 Minn. 243, 20 N. W. 149 (physical suffering of wife through malpractice of the defendant physician); Missouri P. R. Co. v. Martino, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 634, 18 S. W. 1066, 21 S. W. 781, (physical and mental suffering of wife injured by negligence of defendant); Covington Street R. Co. v. Packer, 9 Bush, 455, car, and about this time some man, a stranger, walked up and told the porter and brakeman to stop and not put her in the baggage car, to which one of them replied, 'Boss, there ain't enough room in the other car for her,' and the stranger remarked, 'Make the passengers make room for her.' Miss Minnie was then put into a day coach, where she remained in the care of her mother until San Angelo was reached. Shortly before the train got to San Angelo Mrs. Coopwood told the conductor that she wanted him to help them off just as soon as the depot was reached, and the conductor said he would when he got through helping the other passengers off the train. As the train was running into San Angelo Miss Coopwood said to the conductor: 'Please help me off now. I am very sick and suffering.' And Mrs. Coopwood also called to him before he got to the car door and asked him to help them off. To which the conductor made no reply, or, if so, it was not heard by Mrs. Coopwood. When the train stopped at San Angelo, and while the conductor was assisting other passengers off, Mrs. Coopwood asked him to help her daughter off the train, that she was suffering excruciating pain in her lungs, and that she wanted to get her to a house where she could have her taken care of and give her medical aid. The conductor said that when he got through helping the passengers off he would help her off; but, according to Mrs. Coopwood's statement, she did not see him any more, and after all the passengers were off the train except herself and daughters the brakeman came in the coach, and said the conductor had gone home and the train would have to be switched down into the yards. After this a negro porter came in the car, and she asked him to tell the conductor to help them off the train, and he made no reply, but shut the door and left. John Abney, a coach cleaner in the employ of appellant, with whom Mrs. Coopwood was acquainted, next came into the car, and he said they would have to switch the coach off of that track. The coaches were then switched down into the yards probably 100 yards distant from the depot, and John Abney ordered a carriage, and Mrs. Coopwood and her daughters were put in it, and they left, seeking a hotel. The principal hotel of San Angelo had been previously burned, a fact known to appellant's conductor at this time. The passengers who disembarked from the train before Mrs. Coopwood and daughters, who were able to do so, had secured lodging in the hotels, and Mrs. Coopwood and her daughters were compelled to drive to three different places before accom-

15 Am. Rep. 725 (physical suffering of son injured by negligence of the defendant railroad company); Harford County v. Hamilton, 60 Md. 340, 45 Am. Rep. 739 (physical suffering of son injured by defective highway).

In Black v. Carrollton R. Co. 10 La. Ann. 33, 63 Am. Dec. 586, it was held that, in estimating damages sustained by a father for injuries to an infant son, it was error for the jury to take into view the shock to the paternal feelings and the solicitude and anxiety of the parents for the sufferer.

In some cases of this character a recovery has been denied because the mental anguish could not have been within the contemplation of the parties.

Thus, in an action by a husband to recover for mental anguish because of the failure of a telegraph company to deliver to him a telegram from his wife announcing the fact that she had missed her train and would not arrive at her home until the following morning, it was held, in Dayvis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 139 N. C. 79, 51 S. E. 898, that the admission of evidence of privations of the wife and her children would be reversible error.

And in Jones v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. C. 539, 50 S. E. 198, it was held that mental anguish because of the suffering of the sender's wife and child could not be recovered by reason of the negligent failure of the telegraph company to send a message requesting merely that the sender be met at a certain place and time, as such 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

suffering could not naturally and reasonably have been anticipated from a failure to deliver the message.

No recovery can be had by a mother who was carried beyond her destination with a sick child for mental anguish because of the increased suffering of the child through lack of contemplated medical attendance, where such a result could not have been contemplated by the railroad company. Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. v. Boyles, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 33 S. W. 247.

A father cannot recover from a telegraph company for mental anguish in witnessing the suffering of his child because of failure of the company promptly to deliver a telegram summoning the doctor to relieve him,—at least where there is nothing on the face of the telegram to apprise the company that such a claim will be the result of its negligence. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Reid, 120 Ky. 231, 70 L.R.A. 289, 85 S. W. 1171.

In a few cases it has been held that mental anguish suffered because of the suffering of another is a proper element of damages.

Thus, in Gosa v. Southern R. Co. 67 S. C. 347, 45 S. E. 810, it was held no error on the part of the trial court to give a ruling to the effect that one person may recover damages for mental anguish caused by injuries inflicted upon another.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cavin, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 152, 70 S. W. 229, it was held that a father could recover damages for modations could be secured. Mrs. Coopwood and her daughters remained in the car after the train reached San Angelo before they secured a carriage and left it probably a half hour or longer. She and her daughter Mrs. Overton were physically unable to carry Miss Coopwood on and off the train, and this fact, as well, also, as the helpless condition of Miss Coopwood, was well known to appellant's conductor and other employees in charge of the train upon which they were traveling." This suit was brought "to recover of the defendant damages for the physical and mental suffering sustained by Mrs. Overton on account of the alleged wrongful and negligent conduct of the servants in control of one of appellant's passenger trains upon which she was a passenger, at the time of its arrival at Brownwood and thereafter at the town of San Angelo. She also, in addition, seeks to recover for mental suffering sustained by her on account of the alleged negligent and wrongful treatment of her invalid sister, who was partially in her charge and also in the charge of her mother, Mrs. Coopwood, when passengers at Brownwood and at San Angelo." The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of the appellee for the sum of $500.

In his work on personal injuries Mr. Watson states the general rule governing this class of cases thus: "There can be no recovery for such mental suffering as merely results from sympathy for another's mental or physical pain, the right of action in such cases being restricted to the person who has directly sustained the injury." Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, § 406; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 512, 1 L.R.A. 728, 10 Am. St. Rep. 772, 9 S. W. 598. There are numerous exceptions to the general rule stated above, but the facts as found by the court of civil appeals do not bring this case within any one of the exceptions. Mrs. Overton was not a party to the contract for carrying Miss Minnie Coopwood, nor did the railroad company, by undertaking to transport the sister, place itself under any duty to Mrs. Overton, and there can be no negligence as to Mrs. Overton, unless there was some duty which was due from the company to her. The honorable court of civil appeals rested its decision upon the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Coopwood, which was a companion case to this. The application for writ of error in that case was denied because Mrs. Coopwood was the mother of the injured party, and in control of her at the time, and in exercising that control entered into a contract with the railroad company for the transportation of increased mental anguish incurred while watching the suffering of his sick child, when such increased suffering was occasioned by the negligent failure of the telegraph company promptly to deliver a message addressed by the parent to a physician directing him to come to the sick child at once.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419, it was held that the mental anguish of the plaintiff in seeing his wife suffer because of the failure of a telegraph company promptly to send a message summoning a physician was a proper element of damages. And to the same effect was the decision in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stephens, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 129, 21 S. W. 148.

In some cases the decision upon this question is somewhat vague.

Thus, in Gulf, C. & S. F. Teleg. Co. v. Richardson, 79 Tex. 649, 15 S. W. 689, the court said: "The charge of the court properly placed the right of the father to recover upon the existence of his own distress, and not as compensation for the sufferings or death of the child,—any further, at least, than the sufferings of the child were the inducement to his own distress."

And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Coopwood (Tex. Civ. App.) 96 S. W. 102, a mother brought suit against a railroad company for wrongful treatment of an invalid daughter by the servants of the company, and the company or its servants knew of the relationship at the time that the tickets were bought. The court held that the wrongful and negligent acts of the carrier's servants toward the sick and dependent daughter was a violation of the duty imposed by law upon the carrier, and the carrier would be held liable in damages for the mother's own mental anguish emanating therefrom, but would not be liable for such mental anguish as may have been caused by the mother's sympathy for her child. The court said: "Her recovery must be restricted to such mental anguish as may have been caused her as a direct result of such wrongful or negligent acts independent of the child's suffering." The distinction attempted to be made by the court in this case seems to be rather finely drawn, and it is difficult to see how the mother, under the circumstances of the case, could suffer mental anguish because of the treatment of the daughter which would be distinct from the mental anguish suffered because of sympathy with the daughter in her ill-treatment. Attention should be called to the fact that this case arose out of the same facts as did GULF, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. OVERTON, but in this case the action was brought by the mother, who had made the contract with the railroad company.

Upon the question of parent's mental anguish as an element of damages at common law for personal tort to minor child, see case note to Sperier v. Ott, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 518.

her invalid daughter from Brownwood to San Angelo. The acts of the employees of the railroad company and its negligence towards Miss Minnie was a direct violation of the contract with the mother. Therefore this court held, in acting upon the application, that the railroad company owed to Mrs. Coopwood the duty to carry her daughter to San Angelo with that care which was due to a passenger. Mrs. Coopwood's injury resulted from a violation of this contract and a failure to perform that duty.

There is evidence which tends to show that Mrs. Overton suffered some inconvenience and injury from the failure of the railroad company and its employees to exercise that degree of care towards her that was due to a passenger, and for such injury she is entitled to recover. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the District Court be reversed, and that this cause be remanded to the District Court for trial in accordance with this opinion.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

PETER BURNETT AND WIFE

v.

FORT WORTH LIGHT & POWER COMPANY et al.

(—Tex. —, 112 S. W. 1040.)

Electricity — defective insulation — trespasser — liability.

An electric company which maintains defectively insulated wires over another's roof for violation of a penal ordinance of the municipal corporation is not liable for the death of a boy who, in trespassing upon the roof, comes in contact with the wires and is killed.

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a question arising upon appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Tarrant County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiffs' son. Answer returned favorable to appellees.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to measure of duty of one maintaining electric wires on another's premises, toward trespasser or licensee on such premises, see case note to Guinn v. Delaware & A. Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 988. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Booth & Knight, for appellants:

The defendants were guilty of violating the city ordinances, and such violations were the direct and proximate cause of the injuries complained of, for which they are liable.

Messrs. R. L. Carlock and Capps, Cantey, Hanger, & Short for appellees.

Gaines, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a certified question for our decision by the court of civil appeals for the second supreme judicial district. The certificate is as follows:

"On January 15, 1908, the judgment in this case was reversed and the cause remanded in an opinion that day filed by us, a copy of which accompanies this certificate, wherein the case was thus briefly stated: 'A negro boy about twelve years old went with a companion near the same age to the roof of the Dundee building, in Ft. Worth, Texas, passing up a stairway and out through a trapdoor, and was there instantly killed by coming in contact with a live guy wire which had become charged with electricity through the failure of the appellees to comply with one or more of the penal ordinances of the city of Ft. Worth. This suit was brought by the parents of the deceased boy against the appellees to recover damages on account of their failure to observe said ordinances. The court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the appellees, and to this the errors are assigned.'

"Since then the case of Greenville v. Pitts (Tex.) 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 979, 107 S. W. 50, has been decided by your honors and brought to our attention by the appellees, who have filed a motion for rehearing, which is now pending. We are inclined to distinguish this case from the one before us on the ground that the case cited was one of common-law liability, whereas in the one we have to deal with the liability is exclusively statutory; and also, upon closer examination of Brush Electric Light & P. Co. v. Lefevre, 93 Tex. 604, 49 L.R.A. 771, 77 Am. St. Rep. 898, 57 S. W. 640, to further distinguish that case on the same ground, since it was there held that the statutory liability should have been eliminated on demurrer; our inclination being, as said in Clements v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 44 La. Ann. 692, 16 L.R.A. 43, 32 Am. St. Rep. 348, 11 So. 51, to treat the ordinance or ordinances relied on as 'a contract with each and every inhabitant of the city,' and, on the alleged trespass feature, to follow Davoust v. Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 536, 84 Pac. 760, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 847. See also Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369.

"But, inasmuch as we entertain serious doubts as to whether this course would finally be sustained by your honors, and as this could not be determined without another trial and appeal, after considerable delay and expense, we deem it advisable to now certify to your honors for decision the question raised by the counter propositions, other than the first, set out and discussed in our opinion above referred to, and particularly by the third counter proposition, which denied liability on the ground 'that the roof of the Dundee building was not a place to which the public had a right to resort, that, in going out upon said roof, the boy was an intruder or trespasser, and that, from all the circumstances, the appellees could not reasonably have anticipated or expected that some trespasser would go out upon the roof of said building and come in contact with said wire;' that is, Did the court err in instructing a verdict on that ground, the evidence showing that the boy had no business on the roof and had no permission from the owner to be there, although a way of access had been provided by means of a stairway from the street and a trapdoor to the roof?

"For a fuller statement of the question involved, we respectfully refer to our opinion and the briefs of both parties."

In the case of Greenville v. Pitts, supra, referred to in the certificate, it was distinctly held that the city was not liable for the injury inflicted in that case, for the reason that the plaintiff went upon the building in pursuit of his own business, without invitation or express permission from the owner thereof. This was in accordance with the ruling in the case of Brush Electric Light & P. Co. v. Lefevre, supra, which is also referred to in the certificate. The reasoning of the court upon which that opinion is based is that, since there was not a scintilla of evidence that the awning over which the wires were stretched "had ever been used by any person as a place of resort, either for pleasure or business," therefore the injury could not have been anticipated, and the defendant was not liable. In that case there was an attempt to plead an ordinance making it the duty to keep its wires insulated, but a special demurrer was sustained to the allegation for vagueness of pleading. There is not a suggestion in the opinion in the case that, if the ordinance had been well pleaded, it would have made any difference. It is almost universally held that the violation of a statutory duty is negligence per se. But as we understand it this is the difference between negligence at common law, usually a question of fact, and the violation of a statutory duty,—"only this and nothing more." When a plaintiff sues for the neglect of the provisions of a statute or of the ordinance of a city, and proves such violation, and that he has been injured as the proximate cause thereof, he has established the first postulate in his case; that is, the negligence of the defendant. But does this preclude the defendant from showing that he has been guilty of contributory negligence?

We have been unable to find any authority which countenances a contrary doctrine in any of the books. We find nothing in the case of Clements v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. supra, to sustain the doctrine. In that case Clements was employed to go upon the roof of a gallery to make some repairs, and while there, without negligence on his part, came in contact with an electric wire belonging to the defendant company, which was not insulated as required by an ordinance of the city of New Orleans. The defendant, having a right to be upon the roof and not being shown to be guilty of contributory negligence, was held entitled to recover. The case of Davoust v. Alameda, supra, is sufficiently shown by the following part of the headnote: "An electric light company causing the death of a person by negligently leaving a live wire on the ground cannot escape liability because such person was at the time on a path leading across a vacant lot, where the owner had for many years permitted the public to use the path, so that the deceased might be regarded as a licensee." It is evident from this that the point we have under consideration could not have been decided in that case. So in Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. supra, it was held, where a person was injured by falling into an excavation along the line of the track of the company, which it had been required to fence by an ordinance of the city, that, "if a railroad company which has been duly required by a municipal corporation to erect a fence upon the line of its road within the corporate limits for the purpose of protecting against injury to persons fails to do so, and an individual is injured by the engine or cars of the company in consequence, he may maintain an action against the company and recover, if he establishes that the accident was reasonably connected with the want of precaution as a cause, and that he was not guilty of contributory negligence."

On the other hand, the doctrine is laid down in England that a person who sues for damages for an injury resulting from the failure of defendant to comply with a statutory duty cannot recover if it be shown that he is guilty of contributory negligence. "That a person guilty of contributory negligence should not recover, even when the injury arises from neglect to observe a statutory duty, is not only reasonable, but clear law." 1 Beven, Neg. p. 337. In the case of Caswell v. Worth, 5 El. & Bl. 849, Mr. Justice Coleridge says: "The statute makes the omission of a certain act illegal, and subjects the parties omitting it to penalties. But there can be no doubt that a party receiving bodily injury through such omission has the right of suing at common law. The action, however, must be subject to the rules of common law; and one of those is that a want of ordinary care, or wilful misconduct, on the part of the plaintiff, is an answer to the action." See also Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. L. R. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

7 Exch. 130; Caswell v. Worth, supra. The same doctrine is laid down in the following American cases: Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 458, 30 L.R.A. 82, 49 Am. St. Rep. 935, 32 S. W. 460; O'Donnell v. Providence & W. R. Co. 6 R. I. 211. In the Tennessee case and the Rhode Island case just cited it was held, although the duty of the defendant was statutory, contributory negligence was a defense to the suit.

We have found no cases except those of Greenville v. Pitts and Brush Electric Light & P. Co. v. Lefevre, which decides the proposition that a trespasser is without remedy in such a case; but in neither of the cases last mentioned was there any other defense, and in neither was the plaintiff held entitled to a recovery. We fail to see how a trespasser acquires any right by reason of the negligence arising from the violation of an ordinance of a city or a statute, rather than from negligence at common law. In Bishop on Written Laws the author sums up the law on the subject discussed as follows: "One who disobeys the law subjects himself to any proceeding, civil or criminal, which the same law has ordained for the particular case, in the absence of which ordaining, or in the presence of it when not interpreted as excluding other methods, he is liable to those steps which the common law has provided for cases of the like class, as to an indictment, or to a civil action, or to both, according to the nature of the offending. The civil action is maintainable when, and only when, the person complaining is of a class entitled to take advantage of the law, is a sufferer from the disobedience, is not himself a partaker in the wrong of which he complains, or is not otherwise precluded by the principles of the common law from his proper standing in court." Bishop, Written Laws, par. 141. See also cases there cited.

We answer that in our opinion, since the deceased boy was clearly a trespasser upon the roof of the building where its wires were strung, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

ELIZABETH McKIM, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA.

(217 Pa. 243, 66 Atl. 340.)

Highway — obstruction — liability of municipality.

1. A municipal corporation permitting the maintenance by an electric railway company of a trolley pole in the street in such a manner as to constitute a dangerous obstruction to public travel is liable to a traveler injured thereby.

Same — nighttime.

2. The rule requiring city streets to be kept clear of dangerous impediments applies to the nighttime.

Same — unobstructed space.

3. The fact that there is ample space for travel between the curb and a trolley pole set in the middle of the street does not render the pole any the less a dangerous obstruction to travel after dark when no light is maintained near it.

Evidence — opinion — dangerous obstruction.

4. It is not error to exclude the opinion of witnesses as to the dangerous character of an obstruction in a street, where it can be easily described, and the question whether or not it was dangerous easily determinable by the jury.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Philadelphia County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph R. Fahy, for appellant:

An elevation or hump in the form of the trolley base 3 feet square and rising 15 inches above the street level was such a defect in the highway as rendered it unsafe for ordinary travel.

Subject Note. — Liability of municipal corporation for permitting obstruction to be placed in street.

I. Scope, 507.

II. Right to permit obstruction; general rules, 507.

III. Uses permitted to abutting owners.

a. Generally, 509.

b. For deposit of building material, 510.

c. For water, gas, and sewer connections, 512.

d. For construction of sidewalks, 515.

e. For area ways, hatch ways, coal holes, etc., 516.

f. Signs and other objects overhanging or liable to fall, 517.

IV. Use permitted for business and general purposes, 519.

V. Use by street railway, 521.

VI. Permitting acts in street which obstruct traffic, 523.

VII. Knowledge or notice of obstruction, 523.

VIII. Effect of contributory negligence, 525.

IX. Conclusion. 525.

I. Scope.

This note assumes the existence of duly established streets and sidewalks and the proper application of the general rule that it is the duty of a municipal corporation to use ordinary and reasonable care to keep its streets and sidewalks free from obstruction and in a reasonably safe condition so that persons can pass along them in the ordinary methods of travel in safety, leaving questions as to obstructions in streets generally, and as to the construction and application of the rule of liability, and as to what streets are so established as to be a subject of municipal liability, for consideration in other and more general notes in course of preparation. And it is confined to questions of liability for obstructions placed in the streets, not by the municipal corporation itself, but by its license or consent, either expressly or tacitly given. And it is intended to cover 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

only obstructions for the benefit of third persons. Cases concerning obstructions placed in streets for the benefit of the traveling public which are incidental to the use of the streets as such, such as curbstones, horse blocks, and hitching posts are not included. And the obstructions here considered are things that are foreign to the street, and which are brought, or left, or made in it, and which are patent and visible and stand up in the way so that one might collide with or fall into them, as distinguished from mere defects in construction, or want of repair.

II. Right to permit obstruction; general rules.

While streets and sidewalks are intended for travelers and pedestrians, in order to transact business, and to build houses and reconstruct streets, and to build public improvements or public utilities in the streets, and perhaps for other purposes, the streets and sidewalks must of necessity at times be partly occupied by goods and materials to be used for such purposes; and such temporary use of a street for such purposes, and for a reasonable time, is a lawful use, and not an obstruction for which the city can be held liable. Hesselbach v. St. Louis, 179 Mo. 505, 78 S. W. 1009; Stephens v. Macon, 83 Mo. 345; Ladoga v. Linn, 9 Ind. App. 15, 36 N. E. 159; Kansas City v. McDonald, 60 Kan. 481, 45 L.R.A. 429, 57 Pac. 123; Frost v. Portland, 11 Me. 271; Sinclair v. Baltimore, 59 Md. 592; Grant v. Stillwater, 35 Minn. 242, 28 N. W. 660; State ex rel. Beatty v. Omaha, 14 Neb. 265, 45 Am. Rep. 108, 15 N. W. 210.

And, where a municipal corporation gives a license authorizing work in its streets for a purpose which is proper and lawful, the blame for a resulting injury must attach to the person who misuses or abuses the license, and not to the borough or municipality. Susquehanna Depot v. Simmons, 112 Pa. 384, 56 Am. Rep. 317, 5 Atl. 434; Warsaw v. Dunlap, 112 Ind. 576, 11 N. E. 623, 14 N. E. 568.

And a municipal corporation is not liable

The city was liable.

The city is under an affirmative duty to keep the streets safe for the ordinary purposes of travel, by night and by day.

delphia v. Wright, 100 Pa. 235; Musselman v. Hatfield, 202 Pa. 489, 52 Atl. 15; Seranton v. Catterson, supra.

Messrs. Thomas Raeburn White and John L. Kinsey, for appellee:

The pole being a lawful structure, this action cannot be maintained.

Trolley systems authorized by law and consented to by councils are not nuisances.

Rafferty v. Central Traction Co. 147 Pa. 579, 30 Am. St. Rep. 763, 23 Atl. 884; to a person injured by reason of the misuse or abuse of the license, whether the misuse or abuse is by a independent contractor for the work from the licensee, or by the licensee himself. Susquehanna Depot v. Simmons, supra.

Unless the thing authorized is intrinsically dangerous, or the municipal authorities have notice of the negligence of the licensees. Warsaw v. Dunlap, supra.

The duty, with respect both to the general public and the occupants of premises along the streets of a city, of keeping the streets free from permanent or long-continued nuisances, however, rests primarily with the municipal government. Bentley v. Atlanta, 92 Ga. 623, 18 S. E. 1013.

And a municipal corporation may not knowingly and unnecessarily permit or authorize a nuisance or dangerous obstruction to be placed in one of its streets without being answerable for damages occasioned thereby. Little v. Madison, 42 Wis. 643, 24 Am. Rep. 435.

This is the rule in McKIM v. PHILADELPHIA.

If a work in a street, amounting to a nuisance, is, for any reason, tolerated by the city authorities, it is their duty to exercise supervision over its construction and condition; and it is negligence and a breach of duty in them to omit the exercise of such supervision. Wendell v. Troy, 39 Barb. 329, affirmed in 4 Abb. App. Dec. 563.

A city has no power, in the absence of statutory authority, to grant to an individual any right in a street which will interfere in any degree with its use by the public. Mansfield v. New York, 119 App. Div. 199, 104 N. Y. Supp. 386; Cohen v. New York, 113 N. Y. 532, 4 L.R.A. 406, 10 Am. St. Rep. 506, 21 N. E. 700; Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 161, 43 S. E. 345; McCoull v. Manchester, 85 Va. 579, 2 L.R.A. 691, 8 S. E. 379.

And the fact that such a right was granted in no way affects the right of a person receiving an injury therefrom to recover therefor against the city. Richmond v. Smith and McCoull v. Manchester, supra.

And where a city, without pretense of authority and in direct violation of a statute, assumes to grant to a private individual the right to obstruct the public highway while in the transaction of his private business, and, for such privilege, takes compensation, it must be regarded as itself maintaining a nuisance so long as the obstruction is continued by reason of and under such license; and it is liable for all damages which may naturally result to a third person who is injured by reason or in consequence of the placing of such obstruction in the highway. Cohen v. New York, supra; Kalteyer v. Sullivan, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 488, 46 S. W. 288.

So, where a city grants a license to an individual to place an obstruction in a street, and an injury results to a third person from the negligent mode in which the licensee exercises the privilege granted to him, the question of negligence upon the part of the city in permitting the use, or acquiescing in the use, of the mode, after notice or knowledge thereof, is one of fact for the jury in an action against the city for the injury. Cohen v. New York, 33 Hun, 404.

But there must be some proof of negligence, showing permission to use, or acquiescence in the use of, the mode, after notice or knowledge on the part of the city. Ibid.

While a city has the right temporarily to allow obstructions on the streets and sidewalks for any lawful purpose, so long as they remain there the traveling public should have notice and warning thereof; and, if a city permits a dangerous obstruction in a street, it can justify its action only by showing that it took proper steps to protect the public. Arthur v. Charleston, 51 W. Va. 132, 41 S. E. 171.

And a city which permits an individual to make an excavation in a street for any proper purpose is under duty to see that proper barricades are placed about the excavation to prevent injury to passers-by; and, if it fails to do so, and injury results to a person in the exercise of due care on his part, it is liable for the injury. Cov-

Reeves v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 152 Pa. 153, 25 Atl. 516; Lockhart v. Craig Street R. Co. 139 Pa. 419, 21 Atl. 26.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Eleventh street, in the city of Philadelphia, extends north and south, and crosses Federal street nearly at a right angle. At the place of this accident it is 100 feet wide and 70 feet from curb to curb, and in the middle has a single-track electric railway line, on which cars run north. The supply wires of the trolley system are supported by metal poles, placed alternately on the right and left, and near the track, instead of at the curb. One of these poles stood near the west rail, and about 10 feet north of the north house line of Federal street. It was of iron, about 9 or 10 inches in diameter and supported by a conical-shaped base, which was about 2½ feet in diameter at the street level and 15 or 18 inches in height. John McKim, a milk dealer and the plaintiff's husband, drove a one-horse milk wagon east on Federal street about 5:45 o'clock in the morning of January 24, 1903. He entered Eleventh street, and, turning to go north, his wagon struck the base of the trolley pole, was upset, and he was thrown to the ground and received severe injuries, from which he died a few hours later. The morning was very dark, and there was no artificial light on the pole nor in the vicinity of the pole. There is an electric street light located at the southeast ington v. Bryant, 7 Bush, 248; Lincoln v. Walker, 18 Neb. 244, 20 N. W. 113.

And in such a case the individual and the city can be held jointly liable in the same action. Peoria v. Simpson, 110 Ill. 294, 51 Am. Rep. 683.

But, where a city permits a person to make an excavation in a street for temporary purposes of building and the like, it is sufficient to relieve it from liability for resulting injuries that proper signals and safeguards were placed about the excavation on quitting work; and neither the corporation nor the contractor is liable if a wrongdoer removes the signals or barricade during the night. Ball v. Independence, 41 Mo. App. 469; Theissen v. Belle Plaine, 81 Iowa, 118, 46 N. W. 854; Minns v. Omamee, 2 Ont. L. Rep. 579.

Unless the city had notice, or such time had elapsed that it may be presumed to have known, of the removal. Theissen v. Belle Plaine, supra.

Nor has a municipal corporation any authority to authorize or permit private persons or corporations to erect or maintain permanent obstructions in its streets for partly private purposes. Savage v. Salem, 23 Or. 381, 24 L.R.A. 787, 37 Am. St. Rep. 688, 31 Pac. 832.

But the right of a municipal corporation to authorize the erection of structures in a street by private persons or corporations for the purpose of serving the public is not destroyed or affected by the fact that the service of the public is to be for private gain. Ibid.

And a city which has granted a privilege to erect a nuisance in a street cannot escape liability for an injury resulting therefrom on the ground that, being without authority to grant the permit, its act was ultra vires. Richmond v. Smith, supra.

So, a municipal corporation permitting an obstruction in a street is not relieved from liability for failure in the performance of its duty to have such safeguards and lights as will protect travelers from accident and injury thereby, by the fact that the work is in the hands of contractors who are liable for the injury. Bauer v. Roches- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ter, 35 N. Y. S. R. 959, 12 N. Y. Supp. 418; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 437; Godfrey v. New York, 104 App. Div. 357, 93 N. Y. Supp. 899; McAllister v. Albany, 18 Or. 426, 23 Pac. 845; Drake v. Seattle, 30 Wash. 81, 94 Am. St. Rep. 844, 70 Pac. 231.

Or because it omitted to remove it for the reason that a third person had previously assumed to give warning thereof. Tiers v. New York, 74 Hun, 452, 26 N. Y. Supp. 688.

The subject of obstruction of street or sidewalk for business or building purposes is considered in note to Flynn v. Taylor, 14 L.R.A. 556.

III. Uses permitted to abutting owners.

a. Generally.

The owner of the soil over which a highway passes may rightfully dig and excavate therein and use the same in any manner for his own benefit, provided he does not interfere with the public easement. Birmingham v. Dorer, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 69.

And permission given by the authorities to the owner of an apartment house to fence in an adjacent portion of the sidewalk in a manner consistent with the general parking system of the city, which is valid and proper, and the fencing in thereof in accordance with such permission, does not create a nuisance for which the city is liable, in the absence of anything to show that the owner converted the inclosure to uses of his own inconsistent with the parking system. Domer v. District of Columbia, 21 App. D. C. 284.

But a municipal corporation is liable for damages resulting from the digging by a private owner or individual of any trench or other excavation in one of its public streets for a private purpose or benefit, and his neglecting properly to guard the same and keep it in repair, if the corporation had either actual or constructive notice of the dangerous condition of the street for a length of time reasonably sufficient to guard the public safety before the injury in question was sustained. Birmingham v.

corner of Eleventh and Federal streets, but it had not been lighted for at least a week prior to the accident. McKim's wagon carried a light, as required by city ordinance. This action was brought by the widow of McKim to recover damages for his death, which she alleges was caused by the negligent and improper conduct of the city in not keeping its street, at the place of the accident, in a reasonably safe condition for persons who had occasion to use it. She avers in her statement that the city permitted the pole with its large projecting base to remain in the street for more than two years, without providing "means whereby such structural obstruction should be exposed or made conspicuous by proper light," and during the night of January 23, 1903, "without fixing or placing any light or signal near such obstruction to denote its position." The defense is that the trolley pole was located by authority of law, was a lawful structure, and was therefore not a nuisance, and that it was not an omission of duty on the part of the city to permit it to be constructed or remain on the location where it was placed without providing the necessary means to protect the public, using the street at night, against danger incident to a collision with it. On the trial below, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff has taken this appeal.

It is conceded by the appellant that the trolley company was authorized by legislative and municipal action to locate and Dorer, supra; Sproul v. Seattle, 17 Wash. 256, 45 Pac. 489.

And the duty of a city to keep its streets and sidewalks free from defects, and its liability for injuries occasioned by such defects, are not affected by the fact that individuals, as owners of the fee, are permitted to use the premises above or below the sidewalk, or street, for private purposes not inconsistent with the rights of the public. Bacon v. Boston, 3 Cush. 174.

So, a city is liable for injuries resulting from a depression or obstruction in a street or sidewalk caused by operations of an abutting owner, if it has actual or constructive notice of the defect, though the owner is also liable. Philadelphia v. Smith, 1 Monaghan (Pa.) 147, 16 Atl. 493; Covington v. Johnson, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 602, 69 S. W. 703.

And it is the duty of a municipal corporation to cover and keep in repair any covering over an excavation made by a private owner of the soil over which a street passes, for his private benefit. Birmingham v. Dorer, supra.

The question of reasonable necessity and use of a margin of a highway by an abutting owner is ordinarily one for the jury, and usually arises where a larger portion is occupied than is deemed fairly necessary for the purpose, or its use is claimed to have been unreasonably prolonged. Loberg v. Amherst, 87 Wis. 634, 41 Am. St. Rep. 69, 58 N. W. 1048.

b. For deposit of building material.

The temporary use of a part of a street in which to deposit building materials for buildings being erected on abutting property is a lawful use where there is ample room left for the passage of vehicles, and notice is given of the obstruction by a light or otherwise to avoid the danger. Shallcross v. Philadelphia, 187 Pa. 143, 40 Atl. 818; Ladoga v. Linn, 9 Ind. App. 15, 36 N. E. 159; Kansas City v. McDonald, 60 Kan. 481, 45 L.R.A. 429, 57 Pac. 123; Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

And all that can be done to prevent accident is the deposit of material in a reasonable place, and the placing of guards, or the giving of reasonably precautionary signals to warn the public. Sinclair v. Baltimore, 59 Md. 592.

The right of an abutting owner to place building materials in the street belongs to him simply as an abutter, and not as an owner of the fee of any part of the street, and is founded on and limited by the reasonable necessity, to be determined by the facts of the case in the absence of any regulations on the subject, and may extend to more than one half of the width of the street. Raymond v. Keesberg, 84 Wis. 302, 19 L.R.A. 643, 54 N. W. 612; Senhenn v. Evansville, 140 Ind. 675, 40 N. E. 69; State ex rel. Beatty v. Omaha, 14 Neb. 265, 45 Am. Rep. 108, 15 N. W. 210.

And that a pile of lumber was left by an abutting owner between the traveled part of the street and the sidewalk, against which a person drove his horse and was injured, does not constitute a violation of a statutory requirement that municipalities shall keep their streets in good repair, and in condition reasonably safe and fit for travel, where the street was of ordinary width and sufficient space was left for ordinary travel. McArthur v. Saginaw, 58 Mich. 357, 55 Am. Rep. 687, 25 N. W. 313.

So, an owner of property abutting on a public street or highway has the right to use temporarily a reasonable portion thereof for the deposit of mortar boxes, etc., while necessarily used in plastering his house, and, although he might be able to use his yard or garden for the purpose, he is not bound to do so at the peril of injuring his shrubbery or plants, and may insist upon his rights as an abutting owner. Loberg v. Amherst, 87 Wis. 634, 41 Am. St. Rep. 69, 58 N. W. 1048.

And where, under conceded facts, no more space in a street was used by an abutting owner than was actually occupied by two mortar boxes of ordinary size, a barrel of lime, and some sand, and there is no claim that the use was prolonged for an unreasonable time, the question of reasonable necessity and use of the margin of the high-operate its railway on Eleventh street, and to place the poles, carrying the wires which supply electricity, along and near its track in the center of Eleventh street; but the line was required to be constructed and maintained subject to municipal regulations and approval, as the city ordinance of August 5, 1886, provides that "the laying, construction, and maintenance of all wires, . . . poles, or cables shall be under the supervision of the chief of the electrical bureau and subject to his approval; and the same shall be laid under the rules and regulations of the board of highway supervisors." There is no doubt of the authority of the legislature to authorize an electric railway company to lay its tracks and operate its lines on the streets of a city or of any other municipality; and it may do so directly or by authorizing its agent, the municipality, to grant the authority; and it may empower the municipality to accompany the grant with such restrictions and limitations as may seem proper to protect the public in the use of the highways of the city. In 2 Abbott on Municipal Corporations, § 829, it is said: "The legislature, or one of its properly delegated agencies, may, by its action, authorize the use of a street in such a manner as will cause an obstruction, and which, without such authority, would be regarded as illegal and a nuisance. The discretionary power is often given municipal bodies to authorize these encroachments or obstructions, and, where an abuse of discretion is not shown, their way is one for the court, and the case ought not to be submitted to the jury. Ibid.

And, where a person was thrown from a bicycle and injured while riding along a street in a city, by an obstruction consisting of a pile of mortar placed there by a mason in moderate quantities for completing the work in which he was engaged, and of old material to be removed, and the heap was not large, being probably about the same in size as those usually kept for that purpose, but being such that it ought to have been guarded by a light, the act of the mason in leaving the heap unguarded on the night in question was not sufficient to charge the city with negligence. Johnson v. Poughkeepsie, 29 App. Div. 16, 51 N. Y. Supp. 190.

Nor is a city liable to a person injured by a pile of building material in front of a lot upon which a building was in course of erection, having no guard or light to give warning of its presence, by driving upon the same, where it had passed an ordinance requiring a lighted lamp or lantern to be placed upon such obstructions, which ordinance had not been observed, it being a mere police ordinance intended to protect the streets against obstruction, the city having no police agency of its own and not being allowed the direction and control of the police officers within its limits, it having therefore no means at its command to enforce the ordinance. Sinclair v. Baltimore, supra.

A city cannot escape the duty resting upon it to keep its streets in a condition reasonably safe for public travel, or the responsibility which this duty imposes, however, by permitting a private builder to leave a pile of material in a dangerous condition in a street. Magee v. Troy, 48 Hun, 383, 1 N. Y. Supp. 24.

And the fact that a city council grants a license to use a street for the deposit of building material neither suspends nor abrogates the duty of the city to use reasonable care to keep the streets in a safe condition. Grant v. Stillwater, 35 Minn. 242, 28 N. W. 660; Indianapolis v. Doherty, 71 Ind. 5; Laporte v. Henry, 41 Ind. App. 197, 83 N. E. 655.

The use, by persons constructing buildings abutting on a street, of a portion of the same for the deposit of necessary building materials, being exceptional and foreign to the purposes for which the thoroughfare was laid out and maintained, the city must exercise vigilance to the end that no traveler be harmed by such encroachment. Kansas City v. McDonald, 60 Kan. 481, 45 L.R.A. 429, 57 Pac. 123; Lewis v. Atlanta, 77 Ga. 756, 4 Am. St. Rep. 108; Indianapolis v. Doherty, supra; Parks v. New York, 111 App. Div. 836, 98 N. Y. Supp. 94, affirmed in 187 N. Y. 555, 80 N. E. 1115.

And all these encroachments must be reasonable as to both their extent and duration, must be guarded and so protected as to secure passers-by from danger; and, if they are not so guarded and protected, they remain nuisances, and for damages resulting in consequence the corporation is responsible if it had notice of their existence. Herfurth v. Washington, 6 D. C. 289; Grant v. Stillwater, supra; Foy v. Winston, 126 N. C. 381, 35 S. E. 609.

The exercise of the authority to use the street for this purpose will not justify leaving it in an unsafe or dangerous condition. Grant v. Stillwater, supra.

And, while the city may lawfully permit the obstruction of a street opposite a house that is being built, for the purpose of facilitating the mechanics, the obstruction must not be obviously dangerous; if it is so obviously dangerous that men of ordinary prudence would condemn its use, permission for its use should be absolutely refused by the city authorities, but, if not so obviously dangerous when used with ordinary care, the city ought not to be held liable for an injury resulting from its presence in the highway. Winters v. New York, 15 Daly, 102, 2 N. Y. Supp. 695.

And, where a city permits a person to make an excavation in a public highway for the temporary purpose of building and the like, and danger therefrom can be averted only by special precautions, such as placing guards or the lighting of the street, the city, which has authorized the work, is plainly bound to take such precautions. Ball v. Independence, 41 Mo. App. 469.

action will be sustained if coming within the general principles in respect to the creation and use of a highway." What, therefore, would otherwise be a nuisance if placed in a street may be legalized and relieved of this fault by legislative or municipal action.

.Conceding the right of the electric company to place its poles in the center of the street, and that, by reason of municipal permission, they do not create a nuisance by being located there, yet there was a duty imposed upon the electric company to exercise the power conferred by the municipality in such manner and way as not unnecessarily to obstruct the highway or interfere with the purpose for which it was primarily constructed. Unless the intention is manifest,

Nor does the fact that a city allows only a reasonable part of a street to be used for depositing building material thereon, and requires the builder to indicate the locality of such materials by proper lights, relieve the city from the duty to prevent the street from being so occupied as to endanger passers-by, or from the damages arising from a breach of such duty. Cleveland v. King, 132 U. S. 295, 33 L. ed. 334, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90.

So, while the mere deposit and storage of materials in a street, where a builder has a license from a city, in a place covered by the license, is not a nuisance, a license to a builder will not relieve the builder and the city from the duty of so storing, or guarding, or lighting a pile of lumber as to leave the street reasonably safe for the traveler by night as well as by day; and whether this has been done in a particular case is a question for the jury. Magee v. Troy, supra.

And liability of a city for an injury resulting from building or other material deposited in a street and kept in such a condition as to render the street unsafe is the same whether the material was deposited in the street with or without a license from the city. Grant v. Stillwater, supra.

And neither the person erecting the building, nor the city itself, can escape liability simply upon the issuance of a permit to place building material upon the street. Senhenn v. Evansville, 140 Ind. 675, 40 N. E. 69; State ex rel. Beatty v. Omaha, 14 Neb. 265, 45 Am. Rep. 108, 15 N. W. 210.

So, a municipal corporation having exclusive power over the streets has the right to determine by ordinances to what extent and under what circumstances they may be encumbered with building materials; but such regulations must be reasonable, and the obstruction must not be allowed to continue longer than necessary. Sinclair v. Baltimore, 59 Md. 592; Reinhard v. New York, 2 Daly, 243.

And an agreement between a contractor who placed building material in a street and an adjoining owner for whom the material was to be used, showing him to be an init will not be presumed that the legislature or its agent, the municipality, intended, when granting the right of the company to locate its poles in the middle of the street, to deprive the public of the right to use the street without danger and with safety to themselves. This is made more apparent by the fact that the city ordinance requires the poles to be located under the supervision and subject to the approval of the municipal officers. When an electric company invokes municipal action for its protection in occupying the streets of a city, it must appear that the company acted strictly in accordance with the authority conferred. In stating the English rule on the subject, Chief Justice Cockburn, in Vaughan v. Taff Vale R. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 679, 685, says:

dependent contractor, is inadmissible in evidence in an action against the city to recover damages for personal injuries caused by obstructions in the street. Koch v. Williamsport, 195 Pa. 488, 46 Atl. 67.

And an action for damages lies directly against the municipal corporation in which a street is situated, for injuries sustained by building materials encumbering the street, irrespective of the negligence of the contractors. Humphries v. Montreal, 9 Lower Can. Jur. 75.

Nor is the liability of a city which granted an abutting property owner a permit to obstruct a street by placing building material thereon, for an injury to a person at night because he was not warned of the obstruction, affected by the fact that the original building material constituting the obstruction was removed from time to time and replaced with other material. Apker v. Hoquiam (Wash.) 99 Pac. 746.

And evidence of one's occupation and use of premises in front of which he has placed building materials is presumptive evidence of his ownership of the premises, so as to make him an abutter on the highway with the rights of an abutting owner. Loberg v. Amherst, 87 Wis. 634, 41 Am. St. Rep. 69, 58 N. W. 1048.

In Michigan the unauthorized or excessive use by abutters upon a street of the privilege of occupying portions of the street with lumber and materials for building purposes is an abuse to be rectified under the police powers of the public, and does not belong to making or repairing of ways when what is done does not create what is properly a defective way. McArthur v. Saginaw, 58 Mich. 357, 55 Am. Rep. 687, 25 N. W. 313.

c. For water, gas, and sewer connections.

Municipal corporations have the right to have gas and water pipes sunk in their streets, and to give permission for the sinking thereof, and the making of excavations therefor; and the city is required to use only ordinary care in notifying the public traveling on such streets of the condition

"When the legislature has sanctioned and authorized the use of a particular thing, and it is used for the purpose for which it was authorized, and every precaution has been observed to prevent injury, the sanction of the legislature carries with it this consequence, that, if damage results from the use of such thing independently of negligence, the party using it is not responsible." That rule, of course, is limited in this country by the constitutional provision that prohibits the legislature from taking private property for public use without just compensation. But, aside from this limitation, the rule as stated by the learned chief justice is certainly sound in principle, and clearly indicates that the beneficiary of the authority granted is required to exercise the legislative grant without negligence and with the necessary precaution to prevent injury to another. In a recent work on Nuisances it is said that the rule may be stated to be that, where one has the sanction of the state for what he does, unless he commits a fault in the manner of doing it, he is completely justified, provided the legislature has the constitutional power to act. Joyce, Nuisances, § 69. And in § 73 of the same work, citing authorities to support the text, it is said: "So, though a corporation may be authorized by law to do a certain act, it must so use its powers as not to injure another. The fact that a work is a lawful and beneficial one will not relieve the party constructing it from liability to another who is injured by its improper and thereof; and, if the public knows of such condition, or by the exercise of ordinary care could know of it, the city is excusable for failure to give notice. Peoria v. Walker, 47 Ill. App. 182.

And a municipal corporation is not liable for damages resulting from the digging of a trench in one of its public streets by a private individual under a license from the corporate authorities for the purpose of making connection with the main conduit pipes for distributing water to the inhabitants, and neglecting properly to fill the same, since excavations made for this purpose are for private benefit, done at private expense, and usually without any direct superintendence of the public; and only the persons who make them, or cause them to be made, are answerable for any injury they occasion to the right of travel. West Chester v. Apple, 35 Pa. 284, 78 Am. Dec. 336.

And a city, by granting an owner of property abutting on a street a franchise which authorized him to excavate in the street for the purpose of putting in a waterworks plant, does not thereby become a party to such person's failure to comply with an ordinance prohibiting unguarded excavations in the street; and, if the city is liable at all for an injury caused by such excavation, it must rest upon the theory that the landowner failed properly to guard the excavation, and, after due notice, the city failed to exercise reasonable diligence to accomplish that purpose itself. Browne v. Bachman, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 430, 72 S. W. 622.

Nor do the granting of a license by the officers of a municipal corporation to a plumber to make and connect surface pipes for conducting water from the distributing pipes of the city to private houses, and the giving of a special permit to him to connect with a city sewer under the direction of the city inspectors, make the plumber an officer or servant of the city when employed by and working for private parties; and the city is not responsible for the damages occasioned by his negligence in not guarding an excavation made by him in the street, and leaving a pile of earth thereon. Dorlon v. Brooklyn, 46 Barb. 604.

A city is not relieved from its obligation under its charter to keep the public highway free from nuisances and in a condition to be safely traveled, so as to relieve it from liability for an injury resulting from a trench in a street, however, by the fact that the trench was dug by the owner of adjoining property for the purpose of conducting water to his premises from the pipes of the city, and that, by the city ordinances, the necessary excavation, filling up, and paving were to be done by such owner. Baltimore v. Pendleton, 15 Md. 12.

A permit from village authorities to lay a drain does not authorize the person receiving it to open or dig in a street; and, where an opening is made in a street in pursuance of such a permit, the person making it is a trespasser; and, if his work renders the street unsafe for ordinary travel, it is the duty of the village authorities having actual or constructive notice of the dangerous condition created by him to take proper measures to protect the public against it. Boyle v. Hazleton, 171 Pa. 167, 33 Atl. 142.

Since the excavation of openings in streets and sidewalks for the purpose of laying a private drain from a house to the public main in the street would be a public nuisance if done without permission, it is the duty of a municipal corporation giving such permission to see to the work the same as if it were being done by its own agents, in order that it may be done diligently and properly, and not negligently to the risk or detriment of individuals. Anderson v. Wilmington, 8 Houst. (Del.) 516, 19 Atl. 509; Savannah v. Donnelly, 71 Ga. 258.

And a city which impliedly consents to the temporary digging of a ditch in its streets by private persons is liable for injury resulting from their negligence in failing to put out danger signals or barriers to guard it at night. Corsicana v. Tobin, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 492, 57 S. W. 319.

Nor is a city which permits a gas company to make excavations in its streets for the purpose of laying gas pipes relieved from liability to a person injured by falling into an excavation unnecessarily left open in a unskilful construction. The grant of a franchise by the state to a person does not confer upon him the right to inflict damage upon another which, by reasonable caution, could have been prevented." Mr. Smith, in his Modern Law of Municipal Corporations (§ 1097), after announcing the doctrine that the legislature may authorize a person or corporation to do an injurious act which would otherwise be a nuisance, proceeds to say: "And, if the power may be exercised in a way not to seriously injure the public, but is exercised in a way regardless of the public interest, there will be no legislative protection. The grant of power is in all cases to be exercised in such manner as to least interfere with public rights and interests, and by construction the grant or license is construed in favor of the public. Besides, there is a high degree of care to be exercised in carrying out the grant of power in such cases." The rule is well stated by Mitchell, J., in Pine City v. Munch, 42 Minn. 342, 6 L.R.A. 763, 44 N. W. 197, where he says: "If the legislature expressly authorizes an act which must inevitably result in public injury, what would otherwise be a nuisance may be said to be legalized; but, if they authorize an erection which does not necessarily produce such a result, but such result flows from the manner of construction or operation, the legislative license is no defense. In order to justify a nuisance by legislative authority, it must be the natural and probable result of the act authorized, so that it may fairly be street, by the fact that it has obtained from the gas company an agreement for securing the safety of the streets. Russell v. Columbia, 74 Mo. 480, 41 Am. Rep. 325.

And, where workmen are impliedly permitted by a municipal corporation to dig a ditch across a sidewalk to connect pipes with the city waterworks for private individuals, it is for the jury, in an action against the city for an injury resulting from the ditch, to say whether sufficient precautions were taken to enable a person of ordinary prudence, with the exercise of ordinary care, to have passed along the sidewalk in safety. Foy v. Winston, 126 N. C. 381, 35 S. E. 609.

So, while a municipal corporation may license parties not in its employ to open the public streets and sidewalks with trenches to connect house drains, water or gas pipes, with the public main in the street for private advantage alone, it has the same responsibility in the work as if it were done by its own agents; and it is liable for damage to persons who were injured in consequence of the negligent work of a plumber or other person acting under its license. Anderson v. Wilmington, supra; Rock v. American Constr. Co. 120 La. 831, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 653, 45 So. 741; Godfrey v. New York, 104 App. Div. 357, 93 N. Y. Supp. 899; Reinhard v. New York, 2 Daly. 243; Hewitt v. Cleveland, 21 Ohio C. C. 505.

The city must respond in damages to one who is injured by reason of an unprotected excavation, regardless of whether it had any actual knowledge of such condition. Hewitt v. Cleveland and Rock v. American Constr. Co. supra.

And, where a city permitted plumbers to dig a ditch across a sidewalk to connect pipes with the city waterworks for private individuals without special application and permit, its liability for an injury resulting to a traveler from the ditch is not affected by the fact that the work was not done by the city or its employees, and that the city had no knowledge that the ditch was being cut and had been left unguarded. Foy v. Winston, supra.

And whether the plumber or the city was responsible for the acts of laborers in leaving 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

unguarded an excavation made in a street to connect private property with the city water mains, where the city ordinance prohibited any person, without the consent of the water board, from tapping or making any connection with a distributing pipe, which had been interpreted to include the making of the excavation by the board, whose custom had been to furnish men for that purpose; and the plumber employed by the landowner had, in accordance with such custom, applied for and received the men, who were to be paid by the city, which was to be reimbursed by the plumber,—is a question for the jury to determine. Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 96, 18 L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44.

So, the negligence of the city employees in leaving uncovered an excavation in a street, made by them under direction of the superintendent of the city waterworks, for the purpose of connecting a private house with a street main, makes the city liable although the work was done at the request of a private contractor who had agreed with the owner of the house to do the work. Ibid.

And the city is liable though there was a condition that the work should be done with care and due regard for the safety of all who might have occasion to pass that way; such a condition not absolving the city from its duty to keep the streets in proper condition. Springfield v. Scheevers, 21 Ill. App. 203.

And a village charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for persons making lawful use thereof, which licenses the construction of a drain in one of its most important streets, is bound to exercise ordinary care not only as to the construction of the drain, but also as to its use within the street. Svendens v. Alden, 101 Minn. 158, 112 N. W. 10.

So, where a person in the nighttime fell over a hydrant maintained within the limits of a sidewalk of a city by a private company with the consent of the city, the city is liable for the injury caused thereby, where it had knowledge of the existence thereof, and had permitted it to remain in a dangerous said to be covered by the legislation conferring the power. Wood, Nuisances, 853-861." In Babbage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 281, 14 L.R.A. 398, 29 N. E. 132, the defendant sought to excuse himself for maintaining a nuisance by having procured municipal permission for his act. It was held that he was not liable, in the absence of negligence; but Vann, J., delivering the opinion, says: "The person receiving the license is held to impliedly agree to perform the act permitted with due care for the safety of the public, and is made liable for any violation of duty in this regard." And in a more recent case in New York (Morton v. New York, 140 N. Y. 207, 22 L.R.A. 241, 35 N. E. 490), it is held, as stated in the syllabus, that the legislative authority which will shelter an actual nuisance must be express, or a clear and unquestionable implication from powers conferred, certain and unambiguous, and such as to show that the legislature must have intended and contemplated the doing of the very act in question. "Lawful acts may be performed in such a manner, so carelessly, negligently, and with so little regard to the rights of others," says Agnew, J., in Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Gilleland, 56 Pa. 445, 94 Am. Dec. 98, "that he who, in performing them, injures another, must be responsible for the damage."

Applying these principles to the case in hand, we think the learned court below erred in withdrawing the case from the jury and directing a verdict for the defendant city. In this state, as all our cases on the condition for a long time. King v. Oshkosh, 75 Wis. 517, 44 N. W. 745.

And the fact that a hydrant was erected by a water company under a license from the city for that purpose does not relieve the city from liability for an injury caused by it after it had notice that the street was rendered unsafe thereby. Burnes v. St. Joseph, 91 Mo. App. 489.

d. For construction of sidewalks.

The act of a property owner who improves a sidewalk under an ordinance of a town cannot be deemed the act of the town in such sense as to charge the town with his negligence; in order to charge the corporation, evidence of the negligence of the property owner must be supplemented by evidence that the town authorities were negligent, or that the work directed to be done was intrinsically dangerous. Dooley v. Sullivan, 112 Ind. 451, 2 Am. St. Rep. 209, 14 N. E. 566.

And an ordinance requiring the work of building sidewalks to be done under the supervision of the city engineer, and obligating the city to pay one third of the cost, does not make the city responsible for the negligence of a person building a sidewalk under a contract with the owner of adjacent land, where the charter makes it the duty of the owner of land to build the sidewalk. Thompson v. West Bay City, 137 Mich. 94, 100 N. W. 280.

So, where an excavation is made by a lot owner pursuant to an ordinance requiring him to improve the sidewalk, only ordinary care is required of the municipal corporation, its agents and contractors, and ordinary care does not require that a watch be kept during the night over the excavation, unless there are circumstances peculiar to the particular case making it necessary; as a general rule it is sufficient that proper signals or guards were placed about the excavation on quitting work, and neither the corporation nor its contractor is liable if a wrongdoer removes the signals during the night. Dooley v. Sullivan, supra.

ever the public convenience or interests require it, to put the sidewalks of its streets in a reasonably safe condition, and instead of performing this duty, it permits the proprietors of adjoining property to construct sidewalks of their own, it is liable for all damages resulting from their unsafe condition. Oliver v. Kansas City, 69 Mo. 79; Boucher v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 456; Plattsmouth v. Mitchell, 20 Neb. 228, 29 N. W. 593; Hiller v. Sharon Springs, 28 Hun. 344; Hill v. Fond du Lac, 56 Wis. 242, 14 N. W. 25.

And, where the work ordered necessarily causes an obstruction or defect in the street, which renders it dangerous, and the proprietor neglects to use proper safeguards to prevent accidents, and an accident results, the city is liable therefor. Boucher v. New Haven, supra.

So, where a municipal corporation licenses a lot owner to build a sidewalk in front of his lot, which walk it is the duty of the corporation to build and maintain, and in the performance of such work the lot owner negligently leaves an obstruction in the street which causes an injury, the city is liable therefor. Davis v. Omaha, 47 Neb. 836, 66 N. W. 859.

A license given by a municipal corporation to an individual to construct a sidewalk, under which he acted, raises no presumption of license to leave an area open and unguarded, to the injury of others. Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. 657, 18 L. ed. 427.

And a person building a sidewalk under license from a municipal corporation, who leaves an area open and unguarded which causes an injury for which the municipal corporation is called upon to pay, cannot defeat the just claim of the corporation or of the injured party by proving that the work which constituted the obstruction or defect was done by an independent contractor. Ibid; Davis v. Adrian, 147 Mich. 300, 110 N. W. 1084.

So, a city is liable for an accident caused by a defective sidewalk, although the walk was constructed by a private person without its order, where the defect was known to the subject declare, the highways are primarily for the passage of persons on foot and in vehicles. It is the duty of the municipal authorities having control of the highways to keep that fact in view, and, while permitting them to be used for other purposes, it should not be done in a manner which would prevent their use by the public or would render them unsafe and dangerous. Seventy years ago the legislature of this state declared that the public highways should be constantly kept in repair and kept clear of all impediments to easy and convenient passing and traveling. This is the law of the commonwealth to-day, and includes the cities as well as the rural districts. The electric company was authorized by the ordinance to locate and operate its railway on Eleventh street, but there is nothing in the ordinance from which even an inference can be drawn that the use of Eleventh street by the company should exclude the public from it, or that the company was authorized to construct or operate its railway in a manner which would render the street unnecessarily dangerous. As it was the duty of the city to keep its streets clear of unnecessary impediments or obstructions and reasonably safe for public use, we cannot assume or infer that the councils intended to hand over Eleventh street to the electric company with permission to erect and maintain obstructions on it in total disregard of the rights of the public. In view of this duty of the city and of the unquestioned duty of the elec proper officers of the city, or might have been known by the exercise of ordinary care, in time to have repaired it before the accident. Barnes v. Newton, 46 Iowa, 567.

And the liability of a municipal corporation to a person who fell through a defective grating in a public sidewalk is not affected by the fact that, if its ordinances had been complied with by the owner of the property fronting on the sidewalk, the injury would not have occurred. Reinhard v. New York, 2 Daly, 243.

And property owners who, by direction of the borough authorities and in obedience to the requirement of an ordinance for that purpose, are engaged in paving and curbing the sidewalk in front of their respective properties, are not in any proper sense contractors exercising an independent employment over which the authorities have no control, so as to relieve the borough authorities from the duty of seeing that the street or streets on which the work is being done are kept in a condition that is reasonably safe for public travel. Trego v. Honeybrook, 160 Pa. 76, 28 Atl. 639.

So, where a city improved the roadway of a street and one sidewalk, but not the opposite one, and a lot owner on the unimproved side made a sidewalk in front of his property under the direction as to the grade thereof of the civil engineer of the city, it being a continuation of a sidewalk which had been used by the public for several years, and the sidewalk so constructed terminated in an abrupt descent, over which a foot passenger fell in the night and injured himself, the city, having notice of the dangerous character of the sidewalk, is liable for the injury in the absence of negligence on the part of the person injured, notwithstanding the fact that the sidewalk had been constructed without authority from it. Higert v. Greencastle, 43 Ind. 574.

But, where the duty to build sidewalks rests upon the owner or occupant of abutting premises, and the performance of it is in no sense the act of the city, the city cannot be held liable for injuries resulting from the plan of constructing the walk, as when a step was left at one end of it. Marquette v. Cleary, 37 Mich. 296.

And a city is not liable for an injury due to the negligence of a contractor in improperly constructing a barrier to prevent people from walking on a new cement sidewalk, where the duty of building the sidewalk was not imposed by law upon the city. Thompson v. West Bay City, 137 Mich. 94, 100 N. W. 280.

Nor can a city be held liable for a defective or obstructed condition of a sidewalk built by an adjoining landowner outside of the line of the street, where the city had never assumed control over it, and had no legal right to go upon the land. Jewhurst v. Syracuse, 108 N. Y. 303, 15 N. E. 409.

e. For area ways, hatch ways, coal holes, etc.

If it is necessary to occupy a sidewalk and dig an area in it in order to make a better building, and the sidewalk can be occupied and the area dug and secured without danger to the public, this encroachment made on the street is reasonable and the work lawful; but it is essential that every possible precaution should be used against danger, and, if the area is left open and it is dangerous, it is a nuisance which can be abated. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

And where a hatch way is inserted in a sidewalk by an abutting owner with the knowledge and consent of the city authorities, and with their implied license, it is the duty of the city to see to it that it is so located and constructed as not to render the walk unnecessarily unsafe to persons passing along the same when the hatch way may be open. McClure v. Sparta, 84 Wis 269, 36 Am. St. Rep. 924, 54 N. W. 337.

And a city is liable for injuries received by a traveler who falls into a hatch way which a house owner has been allowed to locate and maintain in a dangerous condition, although the immediate cause of the accident was the negligence of such house owner in not guarding the opening. Ibid.

So, a city which issues a permit to the tric company to construct this line so as to maintain the street in a reasonably safe condition for use by the public, the question arises in this case whether the electric company observed its duty in exercising the authority conferred by the city, or whether it negligently erected this pole or negligently maintained it so as to cause the accident which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's decedent. These were questions for the jury. If the pole, either in its original construction, or in the manner of its maintenance, was dangerous to the public in the use of the street by day or night, municipal consent would afford the company no protection. The city, likewise, would be culpable, and liable to any person injured by reason of its neglect to protect him against the unlawful use of the street. In daylight, of course, the pole could be seen and avoided; but at night, and especially when it is very dark, as on this occasion, and could not be seen, a jury certainly would be justified in finding that it was a dangerous obstruction. If, in the construction of its railway, it had been necessary to leave a hole in the street of equal dimensions with the base of the pole, it could not reasonably be pretended that municipal consent to construct the railway on the street would authorize such action on the part of the company, unless the public was, by some means, warned by day and night of the existence and location of the hole. The hole, however, would not be more dangerous than the base of the pole which owner of land abutting upon a street to excavate beneath the sidewalk, which necessitates the removal of the sidewalk itself and the erection of a temporary bridge in place thereof, is under an absolute duty to see to it that the portion of the street interfered with by reason of the permit is kept reasonably safe, or that a person using it is seasonably warned that he cannot rely on the presumption that it is safe for use. Parks v. New York, 111 App. Div. 836, 98 N. Y. Supp. 94, affirmed in 187 N. Y. 555, 80 N. E. 1115.

And a city which permitted a lot owner to make a dangerous cellar way in a sidewalk and street in front of his house, which he subsequently covered with a frail trap-door defective in construction, and around which no safeguards were placed, and through which a person traveling over the sidewalk about two months afterwards broke and was precipitated into the excavation below, causing personal injuries, cannot relieve itself from liability because the dangerous and unguarded opening was made and covered by the lot owner, since it was its duty to supervise the work of covering the excavation and to cause the use of suitable precautions to prevent accident. Abilene v. Cowperthwait, 52 Kan. 324, 34 Pac. 795.

Nor can a municipal corporation escape liability for failure to maintain a sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition by permitting a property owner to have a coal hole in his walk. Chicago v. Jarvis, 226 Ill. 614, 80 N. E. 1079.

And a city which permits the construction of a vault in a sidewalk must use due care and diligence to see that the vault is properly constructed, and the opening thereto securely and safely covered; and, where it has exclusive control over the sidewalk, the court will infer, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that it was constructed under a license from the city authorities. Kenyon v. Indianapolis, Wilson, Super. Ct. (Ind.) 129.

And, where an abutting owner on a street, who was erecting a building with the knowledge and consent of the city authorities, in order to reach the basement, made an excavation under the sidewalk, which was kept covered by loose boards, except when access to the basement was necessary, when a portion of them were removed, and replaced when the necessity was past; and an unknown person removed the covering after 6 o'clock, and that night a person fell into the opening and was injured,—the question whether this covering of boards, which could be easily removed, afforded a sufficient security, is one for the jury in an action against the city for the injury. Sterling v. Thomas, 60 Ill. 264.

In Kansas no city has any power to confer upon any private person any right to use a street or any portion thereof for the purpose of a cellar way, or for any other purpose except for passing and repassing. Smith v. Leavenworth, 15 Kan. 81.

But, while the use of any portion of a street for a private cellar way is unauthorized by law, yet, if the cellar way was so guarded as to be perfectly safe under all ordinary circumstances for persons traveling upon the street, the city would not be so guilty of negligence as to be liable for some unforeseen injury resulting from some fortuitous circumstances which could not, in the ordinary course of events, be expected or anticipated as likely to occur. Ibid.

1. Signs and other objects overhanging or liable to fall.

Things hanging over a street with permission of the municipal corporation are obstructions for which it may be held responsible, where they make travel unsafe, as well as things upon the ground. Larson v. Grand Forks, 3 Dak. 307, 19 N. W. 414.

And, where an occupant of premises abutting on a city street suspended a business sign from an iron rod extending from the building so that it hung over the middle of the sidewalk and about 13 feet above it; and the city allowed the sign to remain in that position after receiving notice, or after it should have known, that the sign had become unsafe,—it is liable for personal injuries sustained by a pedestrian in consequence of the sign falling upon him. Leary caused McKim's death, and both would manifestly be a dangerous obstruction in the middle of a city street of a very dark night with no signals or lights to indicate their location. The rule which requires the streets of a city to be kept clear of dangerous impediments applies to the nighttime, as well as to the daytime, and demands of the municipality action which will maintain the safety of the street during the whole of the twenty-four hours.

The fact that there was ample space between the pole and the curb for teams to pass and repass, as suggested by the appellee, does not alter the case. This pole stood nearly in the center of the street, where a traveler would presume there was safety, and where instinctively he would go of a dark night in order that he might have safe transit. This was a thickly populated community, and, notwithstanding the width of the street, the city, as well as the electric company, should have expected the frequent use of every part of the street, both by night and day. Care, under the circumstances, therefore, required the company, and on its default, the city, to give notice of the presence of the pole to those who might be using the street at night. It was a question for the company, subject to the approval of the city, to determine what was necessary for this purpose. The only obligation resting upon either of them was that they took reasonable precaution to accomplish the purpose intended. This might have been done by a light on the pole itself, or by lights in the immediate vicinity of the pole, or in other ways that could be suggested. The failure, however, to observe any precaution to protect people using the street during the night became a question

v. Yonkers, 95 App. Div. 126, 88 N. Y. Supp. 829.

So, an improperly constructed billboard standing wholly in a street between the sidewalk and the abutting property is a defect in the sidewalk, within the meaning of a statutory provision that no action shall be brought against a municipal corporation on account of injuries resulting from defective streets or sidewalks after six months from the date of the injury, unless written notice of such injury be served on the corporation within ninety days after its occurrence. Bliven v. Sioux City, 85 Iowa, 346, 52 N. W. 246.

And evidence tending to show that a billboard which a city had permitted to be erected and maintained close to or upon a sidewalk, and which blew over and injured a traveler, was not securely braced at the time; and that such condition had existed for about a year prior thereto,—is admissible in an action against the city for the injury. Bemis v. Omaha (Neb.) 116 N. W. 31.

But, where a billboard was placed in a portion of a street not generally used by the public; and the board was not an obstruction and did not interfere with the ordinary use of the street or sidewalk near it; and it was constructed in a substantial manner so as to be safe under ordinary circumstances; and it was blown over by an extraordinary and unprecedented wind, and a person was injured thereby,—the city cannot be held responsible for the injury. Oak Harbor v. Kallagher, 52 Ohio St. 183, 39 N. E. 144.

And, where a billboard erected near or upon a street by permission of the city was blown over, and it injured a traveler, and the witnesses in behalf of the plaintiff, in an action for the injury, testified that the character of the storm which blew the billboard over was extraordinary and unprecedented, and others, in behalf of the defendant, testified that the storm was not worse than had occurred through various years, and that in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

preceding years the winds had been as high and variable as the one that overturned the billboard, the court will not say, as matter of law, that reasonable men might not differ as to whether or not the windstorm was of such a character that the city, in the exercise of ordinary care, would not be bound to anticipate and guard against it. This should be left to the jury. Bemis v. Omaha, supra.

So, a municipal corporation which permits the stringing of a wire across a public street for the giving of an acrobatic performance is liable to a pedestrian on the street for injuries caused by being struck by a performer who falls from the wire while engaged in his performance, where the duty is imposed upon the municipality by statute of keeping its streets free from nuisances. Wheeler v. Ft. Dodge, 131 Iowa, 566, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 146, 108 N. W. 1057.

And, where an electric light company licensed to use a street erected a pole therein, and, to keep it in position, attached a wire from the top thereof extending across the street, which was fastened to a decayed and unsafe tree outside and beyond the street, the city, having actual notice or knowledge of the negligence and carelessness of the company in so fastening the wire, was under duty to exercise at least reasonable diligence in having the wire removed or safely secured; and, where the decayed tree fell, and the wire was thereby loosened so that it lay across the street about 8 inches above the sidewalk, and injuries were sustained by a person tripping upon it, the city may be held liable for the injury though it had no notice of the falling of the tree and the presence of the wire in its position after the fall. Lafayette v. Ashby, 8 Ind. App. 214, 34 N. E. 238, 35 N. E. 516.

But evidence in an action against a city for damages for personal injuries sustained by a collision with a pole overhanging the driveway of the street, that the pole was erected by a telephone company with the of negligence which should have been submitted to the jury.

It is not necessary in this case to discuss or determine the duty of a city to light its streets. The broad question presented for decision here is whether the city, under the circumstances disclosed by the testimony, was guilty of negligence in permitting a dangerous obstruction on one of its streets which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's decedent. That is a question which, under a proper charge by the court, was for the jury.

We are not convinced that the trial court erred in refusing to admit the opinions of the plaintiff's witnesses as to the dangerous condition of the street. There was no difficulty here in the witnesses' describing the pole, its size, the manner of its structure, its location, and all of the conditions existing at the place of the accident. Whether, under all the circumstances, the pole either in its original construction or in its maintenance was dangerous to public travel on that street, of a dark night, was as easily determinable by the jury as by the witnesses. Where mere descriptive language is inadequate to convey to the jury the precise facts, or their bearing on the issue, a witness may be allowed to supplement his description by his opinion, to put the jury in position to determine the facts in issue; but, when the circumstances are such that they can be fully and accurately described to the jury, and their bearing on the issue, estimated by persons without special knowledge or training, opinions of witnesses, expert or other, are inadmissible. Graham v. Pennsylvania Co. 139 Pa. 149, 12 L.R.A. 293, 21 Atl. 151.

The eleventh and twelfth assignments are sustained, the judgment is reversed, and a venire facias is awarded.

sanction of the city, and that it was 8 inches inside of the curb line at its base, and that for more than a year it had been permitted from a point 7½ to 8 feet above the street to overhang the driveway. the construction of which was such as to render it proper for travelers to use all parts of the driveway up to the curb, is not sufficient to go to the jury on the question whether the position of the pole was such as to make the highway unsafe for public travel. Fisher v. Mt. Vernon, 41 App. Div. 293, 58 N. Y. Supp. 499.

So, a city which permitted an owner of property abutting on a street to maintain a platform extending out from the second story of his building over the sidewalk is not liable to a person passing by under the platform, who was struck by a bale of hay which was thrown out of the second story of the building by the occupant, where the injury was the result of carelessness and negligence of the occupant in throwing the bale of hay from the second story to the sidewalk, and the accident would have been just as likely to have happened in the absence of a platform as in its presence, the platform being a condition, and not the cause of the accident. Parmenter v. Marion, 113 Iowa, 297, 85 N. W. 90.

But, where a railroad trestle which passed over a public street in a city was always so low that it necessarily impaired the usefulness of the street, and the city permitted such trestle to be built and maintained, and an injury resulted from the insufficiency of the height of such trestle above the street, the whole question of the responsibility of the railroad company and of the city, and of their negligence in respect to the trestle and street, is properly left to the jury in an action for the injury. Ft. Scott v. Peck, 5 Kan. App. 593, 49 Pac. 111.

IV. Use permitted for business and general purposes.

An abutting owner upon a street, engaged in manufacturing goods, has the right to make reasonable use of the street for the deposit of his manufactured goods for the purpose of loading and unloading them, though not directly authorized by an ordinance of the city; but he has no right to make a permanent use of the streets for storing his property, or to make such temporary use as will unreasonably interfere with travel, and the reasonableness of the use should be measured by the character of the articles to be handled. Gerdes v. Christopher & S. Architectural Iron & F. Co. 124 Mo. 347, 25 S. W. 557, 27 S. W. 615.

And, where a manufacturing company left large iron pillars in the street in front of its place, for a number of days, for the purpose of loading and unloading; and a traveler collided with them and was injured,—it is a question for the jury to say whether or not they were allowed to remain in the street an unreasonable length of time. Ibid.

So, fuel and other things may be placed in the street until they can be removed to the owner's premises. Herfurth v. Washington, 6 D. C. 289; Ladoga v. Linn, 9 Ind. App. 15, 36 N. E. 159.

It is the duty of a municipal corporation, however, to forbid and prevent the use of its highway margins as places of deposit for private property; and, if it negligently suffers such margins to become and remain unsafe by being thus encumbered, a person who, without fault on his part, meets with an accident on account thereof, may recover of the municipality. Morse v. Richmond, 41 Vt. 435, 98 Am. Dec. 600.

Streets and highways are designed for the use of the public for the purpose of passage and travel, and their use by an individual simply for his own convenience and accommodation, unaccompanied with the public use, as for drains, sewers, vaults, or cesspools, is unauthorized and essentially a nuisance; and the municipal corporation is responsible for injuries thus occasioned, because it is illegal and improper and a breach of duty in it to allow a public thoroughfare to be thus diverted to a mere private use. Wendell v. Troy, 39 Barb. 329, affirmed in 4 Abb. App. Dec. 563; Curry v. Mannington, 23 W. Va. 14.

And, where a person fell over a casting in a street which was much frequented by day and night, and there was evidence in an action against the city for the injury that castings or machinery were upon the sidewalk all the time and had been for months before the accident, but no witness could say positively that the same pieces were there for any considerable time, but several said that substantially the same obstruction was there, consisting of the product of a factory, it is a question for the jury to determine whether the constant repetition of the act of placing machinery and castings upon the sidewalk was such as to amount to substantial continuity of obstruction as distinguished from the lawful temporary use of the sidewalk. Davis v. Corry, 154 Pa. 598, 26 Atl. 621.

So, an adjoining owner has no right to appropriate a portion of the highway as a stable yard or storage place for his drays or wagons when they are not in use. Ladoga v. Linn, supra.

And, when a dangerous piece of machinery is placed in an alley by the owner of abutting lots, and is allowed to remain for years, both the individual and the municipal corporation are guilty of negligence, and both are liable for injuries sustained by a child who is hurt upon such machinery. Osage City v. Larkin, 40 Kan. 206, 2 L.R.A. 56, 10 Am. St. Rep. 186, 19 Pac. 658.

So, a building or other similar structure erected and maintained in a public street of a municipality by a third party for his private use is a nuisance, although sufficient space is left for the passage of vehicles and persons; and the municipality is guilty of negligence if, with notice thereof, it permits the street so to be obstructed. McDowell v. Preston, 104 Minn. 263, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 190, 116 N. W. 470; Smith v. Davis, 22 App. D. C. 298.

And, where a city granted a license to a person to move buildings in the streets subject to the supervision of the city marshal, the city is responsible for the condition in which the building was while in the street; and, where a person was injured by the upsetting of a buggy in which she was riding by reason of one of the wheels striking a timber projecting therefrom, evidence tending to show that the work of moving the building was negligently done is competent in an action against the city for the injury. Hayes v. West Bay City, 91 Mich. 418, 51 N. W. 1067.

And the city, in such case, cannot escape liability for the injury because of a contract with an electric light company to light the street, where it appears that this contract was not always performed. Ibid.

So, where a city suffers a market to be carried on in the street in violation of law and the rights of the public, though the city itself did not establish the market, the occupation of the street by it is a nuisance, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which it is the duty of the city to abate, and for which, if anyone is injured thereby, it is liable to be held in damages. O'Dwyer v. Northern Market Co. 24 App. D. C. 81.

And the facts that sheds or stalls are erected and occupied as a market by permission of the commissioner of streets; and that fees for the use of such sheds and stalls as market stands at a fixed rate for a period of several months are collected of the market by its clerk, and by him paid to the controller of the city; and that the erection and occupation of such sheds prevented access to the houses fronting on such street and caused special damage to the owners thereof,—are sufficient prima facie to establish the liability of the city for such damage. St. John v. New York, 3 Bosw. 483.

And a charter provision of a city that the board of aldermen shall not have power to authorize the placing or continuing of any obstruction upon any sidewalk except the temporary occupation thereof during the erection or repair of a building on a lot opposite the same does not authorize such contractor to place a tool chest on a sidewalk while repairing a sewer on the opposite side of the street. Warden v. New York, 123 App. Div. 733, 108 N. Y. Supp. 305.

So, a municipal corporation does not, by merely permitting another to erect and operate an electric-light and power plant in the city streets, become charged with the duty of maintaining poles, wires, and lamps connected therewith in a safe condition, and of inspecting them from time to time; the rights of the public are sufficiently protected by imposing the duty of keeping watch over these appliances upon the corporation or person owning and operating them, and holding the municipal corporation liable only in cases wherein, after actual or constructive notice of the existence of the danger to the public in the use of the street, growing out of or caused by some defect in the appliances, the municipal corporation does not use diligence in obviating the danger thus created. Denver v. Sherret, 31 C. C. A. 499, 60 U. S. App. 104, 88 Fed. 226.

And the duty imposed upon a municipal corporation in regard to highways and streets, to keep them ordinarily safe for travel and in proper repair for that purpose, relates only to construction and repair, and does not apply to the condition of a scaffold erected by a party under a contract with the city to furnish and set off fireworks. Herdenwag v. Philadelphia, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 292, affirmed in 108 Pa. 72, 31 Atl. 1063.

So, where, by the terms of a written contract with a municipality to furnish a display of fireworks, a contractor undertook to purchase the fireworks and set them off and do the whole work for a designated sum for the entire services, he is an independent contractor; and the municipality is not liable for injuries caused to a traveler in the street by the contractor's negligence in the erection of a scaffold for the fireworks. Hei- denwag v. Philadelphia, 168 Pa. 72, 31 Atl. 1063.

And, while a city has no legal right to grant a license to store or keep a wagon in the street, its liability for an injury resulting from keeping a wagon in the street is not established by the mere proof of the fact of granting the license. Cohen v. New York, 33 Hun, 404.

But a city which authorizes and sanctions and knowingly and carelessly allows one of its principal streets to be obstructed by an exhibition of wild animals therein, which exhibition is calculated to produce injury to persons lawfully traveling along the street, is liable for an injury caused by the animals frightening a team traveling on the street and rendering it unmanageable so that a passenger is injured. Little v. Madison, 42 Wis. 643, 24 Am. Rep. 435.

V. Use by street railway.

A railroad cannot occupy a street with its tracks, even temporarily, unless the right is clearly conferred by its charter; and the common council of the city cannot confer such right; and the unauthorized occupation of a street by railway tracks is a nuisance per se, which equity will restrain upon information of the attorney general without a preliminary trial at law. Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Streets Pass. R. Co. 10 Phila. 353.

And a complaint alleging that the defendant city directed the maintenance of a railroad in a public highway, which constituted a nuisance from which the plaintiff suffered special damage, is good as against a demurrer. Redford v. Coggeshall, 19 R. I. 313, 36 Atl. 89.

But the duty of a city to keep its streets and alleys open and free from all nuisances does not prevent the carrying out of specific authority to permit and authorize the laying of railway tracks in its streets, alleys, and public places. Heath v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 11, 15 N. W. 573; Michigan City v. Boeckling, 122 Ind. 39, 23 N. E. 518; Lockport v. Licht, 221 Ill. 35, 77 N. E. 581.

And the fact that an obstruction was placed in a street by a railroad company under a franchise authorizing it to build a railway track in a street does not exonerate the city from liability for an injury caused thereby if it had been there a sufficient length of time to arrest the attention of the city; in such case it was its duty to either require the railroad company to restore the street to a reasonably safe condition, or to make such restoration itself. Bryne v. Syracuse, 79 Hun, 555, 29 N. Y. Supp. 912; Wilson v. Watertown, 3 Hun, 508.

And the supposition and assumption upon the part of the authorities of a village which has granted to a railroad company the franchise to construct its railroad in streets of the village, that the company will do all that is essential in the way of precautionary measures for the safety of travel in the streets does not excuse them from that reasonable care and vigilance in the management of the streets which their duty to the public imposes upon them. Hoyer v. North Tonawanda, 79 Hun, 39, 29 N. Y. Supp. 650.

And, where a complaint charges the defendant city with directing the maintenance of a railroad in a public highway, which constituted a nuisance, from which the plaintiff suffered special damage, a plea setting up a charter to construct and operate a street railway in such street as the defendant's city council should determine, and an ordinance of said council designating as one of such streets the highway in controversy, is sufficient. Redford v. Coggeshall, supra.

So, municipal corporations in the streets of which railway tracks are permitted are bound to see that the construction of railway tracks in their streets does not unnecessarily interfere with and endanger other uses of such streets. Kennedy v. Lansing, 99 Mich. 518, 58 N. W. 470; Steubenville v. McGill, 41 Ohio St. 235.

And a city whose duty it is to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition is not absolved from its responsibility therefor by a contract whereby a street railway company occupies a street and undertakes to keep the street so occupied in order. Aiken v. Philadelphia, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 502.

A municipal corporation is not relieved of care and responsibility for the condition of its street by permitting a railway company to lay out and operate its track upon and along it. Cline v. Crescent City R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 1031, 6 So. 851; Campbell v. Stillwater, 32 Minn. 308, 50 Am. Rep. 567, 20 N. W. 320; Hoyer v. North Tonawanda, supra.

Or because the injury complained of was caused by misconduct or negligence in the construction or repair of a street railway. Bailey v. Boston, 116 Mass. 423, note.

And, if a railroad company acting under its charter creates an obstruction in a highway by which a traveler sustains damage, the municipal corporation is answerable as if the same acts had been done by an individual. Sides v. Portsmouth, 59 N. H. 24; Cline v. Crescent City R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 327, 26 Am. St. Rep. 187, 9 So. 122.

And, where a village gives a railroad company permission to construct its railroad in its streets, and in doing so the railroad makes an excavation in a street, whether the village is chargeable with a want of reasonable diligence in not seeing to it that the excavation is provided with safeguards, and whether the injury of a person who falls into the excavation is attributable to the negligence of the village, are questions for the jury. Hoyer v. North Tonawanda, supra.

So, under a power authorizing railroad tracks to be laid in the streets, a city has no right to authorize railroad tracks to be laid upon a street so as to exclude the other public uses of the street so long as it shall remain a public street. Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, 32 Am. St. Rep. 179, 28 N. E. 934; Stack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619.

And a municipal corporation may be liable in the first instance for a defect or obstruction in its streets or highways caused by the negligence of a street railway corporation occupying an unjust and unnecessary portion of the way. District of Columbia v. Sullivan, 11 App. D. C. 533.

Thus, where a street is repaved by a city from the outer rail of a street-car track occupying it to the curb, and thrown open to the public; but the space between the rails of the street car company is left obstructed and in a dangerous condition, and the city receives notice that the street car company will not repave it,—it is under a duty to put that portion of the street in a reasonably safe condition, and is liable for an injury resulting from its failure to do so. Peoria v. Gerber, 108 Ill. 318, 48 N. E. 152, affirming 68 Ill. App. 255.

And, where the flagging composing a walk had been torn up by a railway company preparatory to laying a track, and, before it was completed, an injunction was obtained by an abutting owner restraining the company and all persons acting in aid or assistance of it from in any manner interfering with the streets in front of the abutting owner's premises, the injunction is not designed to interfere with the duty of the city in keeping its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition, and does not relieve it from liability for an injury caused by the removal of the walk. Dale v. Syracuse, 71 Hun, 449, 24 N. Y. Supp. 968.

And, where a railroad company, pursuant to authority from a city to build its road on certain streets of grades to be approved by the city authorities, dug a trench in a street, and, upon notice by the city authorities, suspended work until the city fixed the grade of the street and built a fence around the ditch; and these conditions remained for several months, awaiting the establishment of the grade, when an accident took place causing an injury,—it is a question for the jury, in an action against the city for the injury, whether the city authorities were negligent in suspending the work and allowing the street to remain in such a condition for such a length of time. Lane v. Syracuse, 12 App. Div. 118, 42 N. Y. Supp. 219.

So, where, in the separation of grades of a street and a railway crossing it under a statutory provision therefor, a general order was passed by the city council authorizing the mayor to designate in writing streets which it was necessary to close, and, acting under this order, the mayor authorized the railroad company, which was required to perform the work, to close a part of a particular street, and, while it was thus closed, a person was injured by falling into an unguarded trench in the highway, the city cannot escape responsibility therefor on the plea that, until the street was reopened for travel, it was relieved by the intervention of the railroad company of all liability for 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) a defective way caused by the act of reconstruction; the way still remained a public way which the city was charged with the primary duty of keeping reasonably safe for the use of travelers. Trophy v. Fall River, 188 Mass. 310, 74 N. E. 465.

Nor is the liability of the city affected by the fact that the excavation in question was made by a contractor of the railroad company in taking up and relaying the tracks, where the work had not been abandoned, but was in full progress when the accident occurred. Long v. Philadelphia, 212 Pa. 125, 61 Atl. 810.

And, where a city authorized an excavation as a necessary part of the construction of a roadbed of a cable-railway line along and beneath the surface of a street, the intervention of no independent contractor for any part of the work essentially embraced within the general plan as authorized by the city can relieve the city from liability for its failure to enforce the taking of such precautions in the course of the work as would keep adjacent portions of the public thoroughfare reasonably safe for the purposes for which they were left open for use. Haniford v. Kansas City, 103 Mo. 172, 15 S. W. 753.

And, where a municipal corporation, by ordinance, permits a street railway company to perform work involving the tearing up of its streets, the ordinance providing that the operation is to be subject to inspection by the city, and that the streets, upon the conclusion of the work, are to be properly repaved with due diligence; and that, if this is not done, the city may do the work itself at the expense of the street railway company,—the city is liable to a person who is injured through the dangerous condition in which the street is left by the street railway on the completion of the work at the point of the accident, if such dangerous condition has existed long enough to charge the city with notice thereof. Aiken v. Philadelphia, supra.

So, if the authorities of a city suffer a railway company to erect a bridge at a street crossing and maintain it, together with the approaches thereto, in such manner as to render the same a public nuisance, the city is liable for the consequences, just as it would be if the improper work had been done by the city itself. Bentley v. Atlanta, 92 Ga. 623, 18 S. E. 1013.

And the duty charged by law upon incorporated towns, of keeping their streets in proper condition for travel, extends to a bridge built in a street by a railroad company on its right of way as an approach to a crossing of its track; and, whatever obligation may rest upon the railroad company to keep such bridge in a safe condition, the town still remains liable for negligence in that regard. Fowler v. Strawberry Hill, 74 Iowa, 644, 38 N. W. 521; Bentley v. Atlanta, 92 Ga. 624, 18 S. E. 1013.

So, the right of way or franchise conceded by a city to a railroad company to lay its tracks in a street does not deprive a traveler on the street of the right of using any part of the street or the track itself, and in so doing the traveler is not a trespasser. Cline v. Crescent City R. Co. supra.

And a town is liable for injuries resulting from defects in those portions of its streets which are within the location of railroads which cross them, of which it has or may have reasonable notice, if it can remedy them by reasonable care and diligence without interfering with the construction or operation of the railroads. Noyes v. Gardner, 147 Mass. 505, 1 L.R.A. 354, 18 N. E. 423.

And, where a street railway company is under contract with a city to construct and keep its railway in such manner and condition as not to prevent the crossing of streets by teams and wagons at any point with safety; and a person rightfully driving on the street or crossing the track of the railway, exercising due care, is injured by reason of the negligence of the railway company in the construction of its tracks, or in suffering them to become dangerous to travel, the city permitting the railway to be so constructed, or having notice or knowledge that it is out of repair and dangerous to travel,—both the railway company and the city are liable for the injury. Union Street R. Co. v. Stone, 54 Kan. 83, 37 Pac. 1012.

So, a city which sees fit to intrust to the servants of a railroad company which, with permission, has opened a trench for a sewer or drain, the duty of keeping the trench properly guarded, is responsible for their neglect, whether momentary or otherwise. Blessington v. Boston, 153 Mass. 409, 26 N. E. 1113.

And where, in such case, the city knew that the barriers would need to be frequently removed to accommodate passing cars, and that the street was much traveled, and that the railroad company had stationed two men for the purpose of moving and replacing the barriers; and it adopted no additional safeguards of its own,—the fact that an accident from falling into the trench was due to the momentary failure of the servants of the railroad company to replace the barriers would not relieve the city from liability therefor. Ibid.

But, while municipal corporations are bound to see that the construction of railway tracks in streets does not necessarily interfere with or endanger other uses of such streets, they are not insurers of street-car passengers against defects in the street-car system itself. Kennedy v. Lansing, 99 Mich. 518, 58 N. W. 470.

And a municipal corporation, permitting a street railroad company to occupy its streets, which did not fix or direct the location of the tracks, or of the trolley poles, or determine the width of the cars, is not liable to a person who, while riding on one of the street railway company's open cars, which were wider than ordinary cars, and while standing upon one of the side boards used as steps came in contact with one of the trolley poles and was injured thereby. Ibid.

And, where a railroad company was authorized by law to construct a railway across a street, and, while the construction was proceeding lawfully and without negligence or undue delay, a person attempting to cross the railway track fell and was injured, no recovery can be had against the city for the injury. Atkin v. Hamilton, 24 Ont. App. Rep. 389.

So, where a railroad bridge over a street was destroyed by fire, and the railroad company built a temporary bridge supported by timbers and trestle work, which obstructed a part of the highway, the selectmen of the town have no right forcibly to remove the temporary bridge, but do their full duty by applying to the county commissioners for its removal. Flanders v. Norwood, 141 Mass. 17, 5 N. E. 256.

VI. Permitting acts in street which obstruct traffic.

This will be made the subject of a separate note.

VII. Knowledge or notice of obstruction.

Notice is not necessary to establish the liability of a municipal corporation for an obstruction in a street, where the obstruction was produced by acts done with the express sanction of the municipality. Haniford v. Kansas City, supra; McDermott v. Kingston, 19 Hun, 198.

And the act of a person making an excavation in a street by permission of the city is the act of the city; and no notice to the latter of such excavation is necessary to render it liable to a person sustaining an injury therefrom. Stephens v. Macon, 83 Mo. 345; Louisville v. Keher, 117 Ky. 841, 79 S. W. 270; South Omaha v. Burke, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 309, 91 N. W. 562; Hoyer v. North Tonawanda, 79 Hun, 39, 29 N. Y. Supp. 650; Hewitt v. Cleveland, 21 Ohio C. C. 505.

And the issuance by a city of a permit to a telephone company to replace a telephone pole charges the city with knowledge of a depression occasioned by the sinking of the ground following the setting of the new pole. Merritt v. Kinloch Teleph. Co. (Mo.) 115 S. W. 19.

So, where an injury was caused by a cut in a street made for the purpose of putting in water pipes, it is not necessary for the person injured to prove express or implied notice to the city of the existence of the cut in order to recover for the injury. Sevestre v. New York, 15 Jones & S. 341.

And permits given by the superintendent of the city waterworks to make a connection of water pipes from an adjoining house to the water main in the street are admissible in evidence in an action against a city for an injury caused by an excavation in a street, on the question as to whether the city had notice of the trench, as facts requiring the city to take notice of what was done under its authority likely to become dangerous. Clute v. Albany, 7 N. Y. Week. Dig. 565.

So, it is the duty of a municipal corporation, the common council of which has, by resolution, authorized a private citizen to construct a drain upon his premises beneath the street to connect with a public sewer, provided the same is done under the direction of a proper city officer, to send a competent person to oversee the work; and, if it neglects to do so, and the work is improperly done, and an injury results from such negligence to which the person injured did not contribute, the city is liable for the damages. Wendell v. Troy, 4 Keyes, 267.

And, where a gas company empowered by law to lay its gas pipes through the streets of a city with the consent of the city obtained such consent, agreeing to leave the streets in good condition, and not to allow the ditches which it might dig to be left open longer than should be necessary to lay or repair the pipes, and, in the prosecution of its work, it opened a ditch in one of the streets, which, for want of pipe, was left open for several days, and while so open a person passing at night fell in and was injured, the city, giving permission so to occupy the street, is liable for the injury without proof of notice, to the same extent as if the ditch had been opened by its own servants. Russell v. Columbia, 74 Mo. 480, 41 Am. Rep. 325.

And, where a city council gave permission to an individual to remove a sidewalk on a street and make an excavation for a basement of a building he was about to erect, the fact that the permit was granted was notice to the authorities that the work was in progress, and they were charged with the duty of seeing that it was properly conducted, and it was incumbent upon them to see that the excavation was so guarded as to protect travelers upon the street from being injured by it. Sutton v. Snohomish, 11 Wash. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 847, 39 Pac. 273.

So, where a section of a sidewalk was removed and an injury to a traveler resulted, the city may be held liable therefor when the removal of the sidewalk was with the assent of the authorities, on the theory that knowledge of the defect by the city can be presumed, or that a duty rested upon it to watch what was done by its assent, so that it should not be left unfinished and dangerous. Higgins v. Salamanca, 6 N. Y. S. R. 119.

And, where a city grants the right to place building material upon sidewalks or streets that may obstruct them, the city is at once charged with notice that the streets and sidewalks may be obstructed by the person to whom the privilege had been granted; and it is required to exercise ordinary care to prevent persons from being injured by such obstructions. Blocher v. Dieco, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 689, 99 S. W. 606.

And, where a city grants permission to an owner of property abutting on a street to maintain a coal hole in the sidewalk, the duty immediately arises, upon the part of both the city and the property owner, to use ordinary care to see that it is safe for public use; and, if the construction is such that the cover is likely to be displaced, the city is liable to a pedestrian who falls into the hole, although it is without actual notice of the defect, since it has constructive notice from the beginning. Drake v. Kansas City, 190 Mo. 370, 109 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 689.

Where an injury results from the negligent mode in which a licensee of a city exercised the privilege granted to him, however, the city can be held liable for a resulting injury only on proof of knowledge or notice to the city, and subsequent acquiescence in the use. Cohen v. New York, 33 Hun. 404.

And the fact that the street commissioner or other authorities of a municipal corporation had knowledge that a license given by the municipality to lay a private water pipe in a street was being misused or abused by an independent contractor of the licensee, or by the licensee himself, in that the excavations for the water pipes in the streets were left in an unguarded and dangerous condition, will not render the municipality liable for damages resulting from such misuse or abuse of the license. Susquehanna Depot v. Simmons, 112 Pa. 384, 56 Am. Rep. 317, 5 Atl. 434.

And the fact that a city, in giving permission to a company engaged in transporting passengers in cars drawn by horses to use a street, required the company to lay and maintain its tracks in a specified manner, does not make the city liable for an injury resulting from the construction of the company's tracks, although the company may not have conformed to the ordinance. Michigan City v. Boeckling, 122 Ind. 39, 23 N. E. 518.

And a city which permitted an owner of land abutting upon the street to construct a coal vault under the sidewalk is not liable for an injury to a person who fell into the coal hole where the aperture had been open only three minutes before the accident occurred, and no city official had notice of its being uncovered. Lafayette v. Blood, 40 Ind. 62.

So, where a municipal corporation licensed a lot owner to build a sidewalk in front of his lot within a specified time, and the lot owner did nothing toward building the walk within the specified time, and afterwards, without the knowledge or permission of the municipal corporation, he proceeded to build the walk, and, for that purpose, deposited a number of flagstones in the street opposite his lot and left them there without barriers or signals, and the night following the evening of the deposit a traveler was injured by coming in contact with them, the corporation is not liable for the injury. Davis v. Omaha, 47 Neb. 836, 66 N. W. 859.

VIII. Effect of contributory negligence.

The subject of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured, as affecting the liability of a municipal corporation for an injury caused by a defect or obstruction in a street, is reserved for consideration in another note. And, inasmuch as the fact that an obstruction was permitted to be placed in a street by the municipality is of no effect on rules of law with reference to contributory negligence as affecting municipal liability in such cases, the reader is referred to that note, and nothing is left to be said here.

IX. Conclusion.

Where an obstruction in a street of a municipality results from some act or thing done by license or permission of the city, either express or implied, the municipal corporation is liable for an injury to a traveler, caused thereby, to the same extent as though it had been created without authority, unless it was one of the class of slight obstructions which are permissible. If the license was for a lawful and proper purpose, however, the municipal corporation is not liable for the results of an abuse of it by a licensee or a contractor, unless the thing authorized was intrinsically dangerous or the municipal authorities had notice of the negligence of the licensee. But a municipal corporation has no power, in the absence of statutory authority, to grant to an individual any right in a street which will interfere to any great extent with its use by the public. Streets may be partly occupied by goods for business purposes, and by material for building purposes, and by facilities in aid of traffic, and perhaps by other things designed for general utility, without imposing municipal liability. But the use must be limited to reasonable necessity both as to time and as to space. And if, for any reason, a work in a street amounting to a nuisance is tolerated by a municipal corporation, it is its duty to exercise supervision over its construction and condition, and to see that proper warning thereof is given to the public.

Within these rules, the owner of the soil over which a highway passes may use it in any manner for his own benefit so long as he does not interfere with the public easement, and the municipality is liable only when he creates a dangerous condition of which it has knowledge or notice. And the temporary use of a part of a street for the deposit of building materials for buildings being erected on abutting property is a lawful use where ample room is left for the passage of vehicles and proper notice is given of the obstruction. But such an obstruction must not be so obviously dangerous that men of ordinary prudence would condemn its use.

On the same principle, excavations for water, gas, and sewer connections between abutting buildings and mains and sewers in the streets may properly be made. But the rule making it the duty of the municipal corporation to see that such excavations are properly guarded is especially applicable. And, where the work is for private advantage alone, the municipality has the same responsibility as though it were done by itself. And these rules apply, also, to excavations made and obstructions created by abutting owners, in constructing sidewalks along their property. And area ways, hatch ways, and coal holes permitted in sidewalks are governed by the same rules.

So, streets may be encumbered, within the rules and restrictions above expressed, to some extent by goods, the stock of a business, or the product of a manufacture, in the streets in the course of manufacture and transportation. But this, like other uses, must be reasonable, and a street cannot be used for the purpose of the storage of private property. And generally permission to occupy streets by erections for markets or other business purposes, or for public exhibitions, cannot be given, and the municipality is liable for resulting injuries.

Nor does the duty of a city to keep its streets free from nuisances or obstructions prevent it from permitting their occupation by street and other railway tracks. But the right to occupy streets with railroad tracks must be conferred by statute. And municipal corporations are bound to see that the construction of railway tracks in their streets does not unnecessarily interfere with and endanger other uses of such streets. And an undertaking on the part of the railway company occupying a street with its tracks to keep the street in proper condition does not relieve the municipality from its responsibility with reference thereto.

That which a municipal corporation licenses or permits is supposed to be within its knowledge. And notice is not necessary to establish its liability for an obstruction in a street where the obstruction was produced by acts done with its sanction. But, where an injury results from the negligent mode in which a licensee of a city exercised a privilege granted him, there must be some proof of negligence, showing permission to use, or acquiescence in the use of, the mode after notice or knowledge on the part of the municipal corporation.

Thomas Boyd, Appt.,

v.

THOMAS M. BOYD and

JOSEPHINE PORTER BOYD, Respnt.

Cotenant — outstanding title — purchase — laches.

1. A delay for four years before demanding a right to share in a purchase of the property by a cotenant under an outstanding encumbrance, and until the property has more than doubled in value, is such laches that equity will refuse to enforce it as against one who purchased the property for value from the purchasing tenant.

Appeal — discretion — rights of cotenant.

2. The determination of the chancellor that, because of laches, a joint tenant should not be permitted to share in the benefit of a purchase by his cotenant under an outstanding encumbrance on the property, will not be interfered with on appeal, except in case of abuse of discretion.

(May 26, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fresno County in favor of one defendant in an action to secure a share in the benefit of a purchase of joint property under an outstanding encumbrance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frohman & Jacobs, for appellant:

One cotenant cannot deprive another cotenant of his interest in the common property by purchasing an encumbrance or outstanding title.

Case Note — Laches as affecting the right of one cotenant to benefit of purchase of outstanding title by another.

The doctrine of STEVENSON v. BOYD, that a cotenant may, by delay, lose the right to benefit by the purchase of an outstanding title by his fellow owner, is well established. Thus, in Savage v. Bradley, 149 Ala. 169, 123 Am. St. Rep. 30, 43 So. 20, it was held that, under ordinary circumstances, two years was a reasonable time within which a cotenant might elect to contribute to the purchase of an outstanding title made by another cotenant, and that therefore, where a cotenant did not attempt to exercise this right for nearly ten years after the redemption of the property from a mortgage sale by another cotenant, such laches lost him the right to benefit by such purchase.

And in Mandeville v. Solomon, 39 Cal. 125, it was held that, while equity would not permit a cotenant to acquire an outstanding or adverse claim to the common property solely for his own benefit, or to the exclusion of his cotenant, it at the same time exacted of the latter the exercise of reasonable diligence in making his election to participate in the benefit of the new acquisition, and having, upon principles of fair dealing, compelled the purchasing tenant to allow his cotenant this opportunity, the latter would not be permitted to equivocate or trifle with the opportunity thus afforded him, or to make it a means of speculation for himself by delaying until some event in the future, such as an increase in the value of the land should determine his course.

And in Stevens v. Reynolds, 143 Ind. 467, 52 Am. St. Rep. 422, 41 N. E. 932, and in Ryason v. Dunten, 164 Ind. 85, 73 N. E. 74, the court quoted with approval the following language of Freeman on Cotenancy & Partition, § 156: "The right of a cotenant to share in the benefit of a purchase of an outstanding claim is always dependent on his having, within a reasonable time, elected to bear his portion of the expense necessarily incurred in the acquisition of the claim. A most natural and material inquiry, then, is, What is a reasonable time? To this inquiry no positive answer can be given. In this, as in all other questions in regard to reasonable time, no doubt each case must necessarily be determined upon its own peculiar circumstances. The cotenant, asking a court of equity to award him the benefit of a purchase, must show reasonable diligence in making his election. Whatever delay he may have occasioned must be entirely consistent with perfect fair dealing on his part, and in no wise attributable to an effort to retain the advantages while he shirks the responsibilities of the new acquisition."

And in Craven v. Craven, 68 Neb. 459, 94 N. W. 604, it was held that the right of joint tenants to participate in the benefit of a superior claim purchased by one of them in possession was dependent upon a timely offer to contribute their rightful proportion of the money expended by the tenant in possession in procuring such superior claim; and that, where such purchasing tenant and his heirs were allowed to remain in open and notorious possession of the common property for more than ten

That one cotenant may buy the interest of another at forced sale is by no means beyond dispute.

Bracken v. Cooper and Montague v. Selb, supra; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 674.

The rule that one cotenant cannot obtain the title to the whole property by buying in years, without any assertion of right on the part of his cotenants, such delay would defeat their right to any benefit in the purchase.

And in Buchanan v. King, 22 Gratt. 414, it was held that while, as a general rule, a joint tenant or tenant in common was not permitted to purchase an outstanding title for his own benefit, the cotenant must, within a reasonable time, make his election to claim the benefit and to contribute to the expense incurred in procuring such title; and that, if he unreasonably delayed in this until there was a change in the condition of the property or in the circumstances of the parties, he would be held to have abandoned all benefit arising from the new acquisition.

And the foregoing case was cited and followed in Pillow v. Southwest Virginia Improv. Co. 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. 32, 53 Am. St. Rep. 804, and Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 216; and its language was quoted with approval in Morris v. Roseberry, 46 W. Va. 24, 32 S. E. 1019.

And this doctrine of laches was recognized, also, in Barnes v. Boardman, 152 Mass. 391, 9 L.R.A. 571, 25 N. E. 623, and in Holterhoff v. Mead, 36 Minn. 42, 29 N. W. 675, though the courts in those cases held that no laches was shown; and in the following cases, in which the cotenant seeking to share in the benefit of the purchase by his cotenant was held to have lost his right thereto by a failure to assert it until after the lapse of the time parenthetically shown: Francis v. Million, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 42, 80 S. W. 486 (thirteen years); Smith v. Washington, 11 Mo. App. 519 (three and one-half years); Koke v. Balcken, 73 Hun, 145, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1038, af- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) firmed without opinion in 148 N. Y. 732, 42 N. E. 724 (twelve years).

The doctrine was also recognized in Oliver v. Hedderly, 32 Minn. 455, 21 N. W. 478, where it was held that, if one cotenant bought in an encumbrance upon, or adverse title to, the common property, his fellow cotenants were entitled to share in the benefit of his purchase, unless they unreasonably neglected in some manner to assert their right in that behalf.

So, in the following cases the rule was laid down that the cotenant seeking to share in the benefit of a purchase of an outstanding title by his cotenant must assert such right within a "reasonable time." Brittin v. Handy, 20 Ark. 381, 73 Am. Dec. 497; Goralski v. Kostuski, 179 Ill. 177, 70 Am. St. Rep. 98, 53 N. E. 720; Lee v. Fox, 6 Dana, 172; Reed v. Reed, 122 Mich. 77, 80 Am. St. Rep. 541, 80 N. W. 996; Nalle v. Parks, 173 Mo. 616, 73 S. W. 596; Boskowitz v. Davis, 12 Nev. 446; Roberts v. Thorn, 25 Tex. 728, 78 Am. Dec. 552; Rippetoe v. Dwyer, 49 Tex. 408; McFarlin v. Leaman (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 44; Cedar Canyon Consol. Min. Co. v. Yarwood, 27 Wash. 271, 91 Am. St. Rep. 841, 67 Pac. 749. See also 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 679.

In Burr v. Mueller, 65 Ill. 258, it was held that the right of a cotenant to elect, within a reasonable time after purchase by his fellow tenant of an outstanding encumbrance, to avail himself of the purchase by offering to contribute his due proportion of the sum expended therein, was a personal right, and did not attach to the estate so as to permit the mortgagee of such cotenant to exercise the same.

an outstanding title or encumbrance is not limited to cases where both cotenants hold under the same instrument.

Messrs. F. H. Short and F. E. Cook for defendant Boyd.

Sloss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Thomas Boyd, now deceased, was the father of Melissa J. Stevenson, the plaintiff, Thomas M. Boyd, one of the defendants, George Culberson Boyd, and Mary Alice Zinns. In December, 1892, Thomas Boyd and his son, the defendant Thomas M. Boyd, each then owning an undivided one half of an 80-acre tract of land situated in Fresno county, executed a deed of trust of said real property to E. R. Hamilton and W. P. Coleman, as security for the payment of their promissory note for $3,200, payable two years after date to the Sacramento Bank. In October, 1897, Thomas Boyd, the father, conveyed his undivided one-half interest to the plaintiff in trust, to receive the rents and profits, and to pay them to the use of the grantor, Thomas Boyd, during his life, and, in case George Culberson Boyd should survive his father, to apply such rents and profits for his support and maintenance during his life. The deed of trust gave plaintiff power to sell, mortgage, or lease said real estate, and provided that, if the property was not sold by plaintiff, in pursuance of said deed of trust, it should, upon the death of Thomas Boyd and George Culberson Boyd, be vested in the plaintiff and Mary Alice Zinns, share and share alike. In July, 1897, Thomas M. Boyd married his codefendant, Josephine Porter Boyd. Some months thereafter the Sacramento Bank, the holder of the note secured by the deed of trust to Hamilton & Coleman, requested payment of the note. Some attempt was made to raise the money, but it was not paid, and the bank finally directed the trustees to sell. The sale was originally advertised to take place in March, 1898, but Mrs. Stevenson, the plaintiff, secured from the bank a postponement for six months. In August, 1898, the defendant Thomas M. Boyd made arrangements with the Bank of Selma to pay off the loan of the Sacramento Bank, which at that time amounted to about $3,400. Of this amount, some $1,800 was furnished by the defendant Josephine Porter Boyd, and the balance by the Bank of Selma. The note was assigned by the Sacramento Bank to the Bank of Selma, and the latter directed the trustees, Hamilton & Coleman, to make a sale. On October 15, 1898, the trustees did sell the property for $3,500,—a little more than the amount due on the note. The purchaser at the sale was the Bank of Selma, which immediately conveyed to T. M. Boyd and Josephine Porter Boyd, the defendants. On February 21, 1901, Thomas M. Boyd conveyed to his codefendant, Josephine Porter Boyd, an undivided one-half interest in the ranch for $7,500, of which $500 was paid in cash and the balance in instalments, evidenced by notes. Some of these notes were paid by Mrs. Boyd to her husband.

On October 13, 1902, two days less than four years after the sale by the trustees to Thomas M. & Josephine Porter Boyd, and over nineteen months after the conveyance from Thomas M. Boyd to Josephine Porter Boyd, this action was brought by the plaintiff. The complaint alleged that, prior to the trustees' sale, the defendants, in pursuance of a conspiracy to that end, did, by threats of violence and otherwise, prevent the plaintiff from raising the money necessary to pay off her one half of the indebtedness to the Sacramento Bank, and that they procured the Bank of Selma to take an assignment of the note, and to direct a sale of the property by the trustees, Hamilton & Coleman, for the purpose of destroying the rights of plaintiff under the deed from Thomas Boyd. It is alleged that the Bank of Selma, in taking the assignment of the note from the Sacramento Bank, was acting as agent for the defendants, and not in its own interests. In the complaint plaintiff offers to pay to the defendants such portion of the indebtedness paid to the Sacramento Bank, and to make such allowance to the defendants, for the cultivation of the property since the sale, as the court may deem equitable. She asks for an accounting of the profits, and prays judgment that it be decreed that she is the owner, as trustee, of an undivided one-half interest in said real property, and that defendants be compelled to convey to her such interest free of encumbrance, except for her just share of the indebtedness to the Sacramento Bank. Thomas M. Boyd and his wife,

Josephine Porter Boyd, answered separately. Each of the answers denies that the defendants had conspired or contrived to defeat the deed of trust under which plaintiff claims, or to deprive the plaintiff, as trustee, of her interest in the property, or that plaintiff was prevented by any act of the defendants, or either of them, from raising the money necessary to pay her share of the indebtedness. The defendant Josephine Porter Boyd set up a special defense of laches, alleging that, at the time the land was sold by the trustees to the Bank of Selma, and by the Bank of Selma to the defendants, its value did not exceed $5,000; that, on February 21, 1901, Thomas M. Boyd sold his interest in the land to Josephine Porter Boyd for the sum of $7,000, more than $3,000 of which has been paid in cash and the balance in notes secured by mortgage; that since said sale by the trustees to the Bank of Selma, and by the Bank of Selma to the defendants, the land has greatly increased in value, and is now of the value of about $15,000; that the defendant bought the interest of her codefendant in good faith, and paid and obligated herself to pay the full increased value thereof to said codefendant Thomas M. Boyd; that plaintiff made no claim to any interest as trustee or otherwise in or to said property, and took no steps and made no effort to subject said property to any claim until it had greatly increased in value. The defendant further alleges, on information and belief, that the plaintiff would not have made any such claim had the property not increased in value, and that at the time the defendant Josephine Porter Boyd bought the said property the same was of little value, and yielded very little income, and that, in buying the same, the defendants ran the risk of losing the money paid upon the purchase price thereof. It is further alleged that ever since the sale the defendants have cultivated the land, and been in charge thereof, and have improved and increased the value of said property. The answer of Thomas M. Boyd, in addition to its denials of many of the allegations of the complaint, sets up a claim, as against his wife, the codefendant Josephine Porter Boyd, his contention being that the $1,800 belonging to Josephine Porter Boyd, which went into the purchase of the property at the time of the trustees' sale, was a loan to him, and that the conveyance of the undivided one-half interest to said Josephine Porter Boyd was made as security for such loan. The trial resulted in findings and judgment in favor of the defendant Josephine Porter Boyd. The court found against the allegations of the complaint regarding a conspiracy between the defendants, found against the allegation that the sum of $1,800 paid by Josephine Porter

Boyd was a loan to her codefendant, and found that the conveyance of October 19, 1898, from the Bank of Selma to Thomas M. Boyd and Josephine Porter Boyd, conveyed to each of said defendants an equal undivided one-half interest in and to said property, and that the defendant Josephine Porter Boyd in consideration of said conveyance, paid, as a part of the purchase price for said land, the sum of $1,800. It was found that Josephine Porter Boyd did not take the title of such one-half interest as security for any loan to her codefendant Thomas M. Boyd. The allegations of the answer of Josephine Porter Boyd, with reference to the defense of laches, are all found to be true, except that the court finds that the value of the property at the time of the conveyance to the defendants was $6,000, instead of $5,000, as alleged in the answer. As conclusions of law, the court found that the plaintiff should take nothing against Josephine Porter Boyd, and said Josephine Porter Boyd should have judgment against plaintiff and her codefendant for her costs. Judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

Thomas M. Boyd has not appealed; and, so far as concerns the issues raised by the pleadings between himself and his codefendant, the finding that the payment of $1,800 by the respondent, Josephine Porter Boyd, was not made as a loan to her husband, stands unquestioned.

The appellant's position is that, inasmuch as she and defendant Thomas M. Boyd were cotenants in the property, the latter could not purchase for himself alone the outstanding interest vested in the trustees Hamilton & Coleman, but was bound to hold any title, acquired on such purchase, for the equal benefit of himself and his cotenant, upon condition that the latter should contribute, or offer to contribute, her portion of the purchase money. This is undoubtedly the general rule as to cotenants. "A cotenant cannot take advantage of any defect in the common title by purchasing an outstanding title or encumbrance, and asserting it against his companions in interest. The purchase is, notwithstanding his designs to the contrary, for the common benefit of all the cotenants. The legal title acquired by him is held in trust for the others, if they choose, within a reasonable time, to claim the benefit of the purchase by contributing or offering to contribute their proportion of the purchase money." Freeman on Cotenancy & Partition, 2d ed. § 154. The respondent contends that this principle applies only where the cotenants hold under the same instrument. Whether or not the rule is subject to this qualification is a question which has given rise to a considerable conflict of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

authority. It need not, however, be here decided. Assuming that the plaintiff (regardless of her allegations that the defendants prevented her from paying off her share of the debt to the Sacramento Bank) was entitled, as against her cotenant and his wife, to claim the benefit of the purchase by them of the interest sold by the trustees, she must still fail, for the reason that the court below found that her cause of action was barred by laches. This finding is fully sustained by the proofs offered and the principles of law applicable.

The plaintiff's delay in seeking relief in the courts had not lasted for such a period as to make the statute of limitations available as a bar to the suit. Undoubtedly mere delay to commence the suit for a period less than that of the statute of limitations is not a sufficient reason for dismissing the proceeding. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674. It is well settled, however, that courts of equity will often refuse relief, even where the statutory time of limitation has not run. "There must be something more than a mere passive neglect. There must be, in addition, a showing of facts amounting to acquiescence in the acts complained of, or of other circumstances which, coupled with the delay, will render the granting of the relief inequitable." Lux v. Haggin, supra. In Chapman v. Bank of California, 97 Cal. 155, 159, 31 Pac. 896, the court says: "Regardless of the question as to whether there has been a plea of the statute of limitations, a court of equity will refuse to entertain a suit brought after unreasonable delay. Harris v. Hillegass, 66 Cal. 79, 4 Pac. 987; Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 791, 14 Pac. 791. The refusal to grant relief is not put upon the presumption of payment or analogy to the statute of limitations, but upon considerations of public policy, and the difficulty of doing entire justice between the parties in consequence of the unreasonable delay. The principal factors in determining whether the plaintiff had been guilty of laches are acquiescence and lapse of time; but other circumstances are also material, such as, that a change in the value or character of the property has taken place. The matter is one which is left to the sound discretion of the chancellor in each case."

These principles have been applied with, perhaps, more than ordinary strictness to the case of a cotenant demanding the benefit of a purchase by the other cotenants. "The right of a cotenant to share in the benefit of a purchase of an outstanding claim is always dependent on his having, within a reasonable time, elected to bear his portion of the expense necessarily incurred in the acquisition of the claim. . . . The cotenant asking a court of equity to award him the benefit of a purchase must show reasonable diligence in making his election. Whatever delay he may have occasioned must be entirely consistent with perfect fair dealing on his part, and in no wise attributable to an effort to retain the advantages while he shirks the responsibilities of the new acquisition." Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, 2d ed. § 156. In Mandeville v. Solomon, 39 Cal. 125, this court said: "Equity does not deny to a tenant in common the right to purchase in an outstanding or adverse claim to the common property. It, however, deals with the tenants after such a purchase is made. While it will not permit one of them to acquire such a title solely for his own benefit, or to the absolute exclusion of the other, it, at the same time, exacts of that other the exercise of reasonable diligence in making his election to participate in the benefit of the new acquisition; and having, upon its own principles of fair dealing, compelled the purchasing tenant to allow his cotenant this opportunity, the latter will not be permitted to equivocate or trifle with the position thus afforded him, or to make it a means of speculation for himself, by delaying, until the rise of the land or some event, yet in the future, shall determine his course. Unless he make his election to participate within a reasonable time, and contribute, or offer to contribute, his ratio of the consideration actually paid, he will be deemed to have repudiated the transaction, and abandoned its benefits." See also 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 679; Stevens v. Reynolds, 143 Ind. 467, 52 Am. St. Rep. 422, 91 N. E. 931; Reed v. Reed, 122 Mich. 77, 80 Am. St. Rep. 541, 80 N. W. 996; Buchanan v. King, 22 Gratt. 414; Morris v. Roseberry, 46 W. Va. 24, 32 S. E. 1019; McFarlin v. Leaman (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 44.

We think the facts shown in the case at bar are clearly sufficient to justify the conclusion of the court that, so far as the defendant Josephine Porter Boyd is concerned, the delay of the plaintiff was so great as to deprive her of the right to seek the relief here demanded. It is not disputed that the plaintiff knew of the trustees' sale and of the conveyance by the Bank of Selma to the defendants at the time these transactions took place. In the meanwhile the respondent has purchased the interest of her cotenant, has cultivated and cared for the land, has made some improvements upon it, and taken the risks of declining values and failure of crops. It is in evidence, and it is found by the court, that property of this character was in little demand at the time of the sale. Since such sale it has increased greatly in value, until, at the time of the trial, it had more than doubled in value. We cannot doubt that the court below was fully justified in finding that a delay of almost four years was unreasonable under these circumstances. To permit the plaintiff now to reinstate herself as the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the land, upon payment of one half of the amount paid at the trustees' sale, thereby securing to herself the full benefit of the increase in the value of the land, without having undergone any of the risks connected with its holding and cultivation, would manifestly be inequitable. The appellant points out certain facts which, it is alleged, should have been held to have excused the delay in seeking relief. But whether or not, under all the circumstances, the delay has been such as to render it inequitable to grant the relief is, in the first instance, a question for the trial court, the determination of which is left, as is said in Chapman v. Bank, supra, "to the sound discretion of the chancellor in each case." The matters relied on by appellant as explaining her delay were proper to be considered by the court below; but, without stating them at length, we are compelled to say that, giving due effect to all of them, they were not of such character as to require that court to conclude that, at least as against the respondent Josephine Porter Boyd, the plaintiff had not slept on her rights to such an extent as to require the denial of relief.

Our views on this point make it unnecessary to consider any of the other contentions urged by counsel.

The judgment is affirmed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hillsborough County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent construction of the flooring about a public swimming pool. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. T. Martin and H. S. Hampton, for plaintiff in error:

The wife, sued jointly with the husband, is liable for the damages flowing from the commission of the tort.

Prentiss v. Paisley, 25 Fla. 929, 930, 7 L.R.A. 640, 7 So. 56; 2 Bishop, Married Women, 254; Brazil v. Moran, 8 Minn. 236, Gil. 205, 83 Am. Dec. 773.

Mr. Thomas Palmer for defendants in error.

Hocker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1907, the plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the plaintiff, filed an amended declaration against the defendants in error in the circuit court of Hillsborough county in the following language:

"Frank T. Graham, by his attorneys, W. T. Martin and Davis & Hampton, files this his amended declaration, by leave of the court first had and obtained, and sues Virginia Tucker and James F. Tucker, her husband, in an action of case, damages, $3,000, for that whereas, heretofore, to wit, on or about the 14th day of July A. D. 1906, the said Virginia Tucker was the owner of certain premises, situated in the county of Hillsborough and state of Florida, on which were located a certain swimming pool and bath houses, the said property being the separate statutory property of the defendant Virginia Tucker, a married woman, whose husband is James F. Tucker, the defendant herein; that on said premises on said date the said defendants were conducting a certain swimming pool, or public bathing place, where the public were invited to enter and for certain hire and reward were allowed to bathe in said pool, the same being a public resort. And plaintiff avers that, while conducting the said public bathing resort, the said defendants, in fitting up the said premises for the use of the public, disregarding their duty to provide safe premises by law, so negligently and carelessly constructed and equipped said premises that divers planks, the flooring of the walk way surrounding said pool, were uneven, and the ends of the same were allowed to project over the side of said pool, the same constituting a danger-of a laborer employed upon a building being erected by her, although the work was being performed under the supervision of her husband, as her agent, and the intestate's death was due to the former's negligence. Schmidt v. Keehn, 32 N. Y. S. R. 11, 10 N. Y. Supp. 267.

Husband and wife are both liable for damages caused to adjoining property by reason of the negligence of those engaged in remodeling a building owned by the wife. Flesh v. Lindsay, 115 Mo. 1, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374, 21 S. W. 907. The wife's liability in such a case arises from a statute providing that the annual products of the wife's realty may be attached or levied if for any debt or liability created for the cultivation or improvement of her real estate; as the right to improve, repair, and remodel her property implies that she may employ servants for that purpose, for whose carelessness and negligence she and her husband will be held jointly liable.

But the sale of liquors by a husband upon his wife's property, will not render it liable for the payment of a judgment obtained against him for unlawful sales, under a statute making property rented or leased or permitted to be used for the sale of liquors liable for such judgments, where the wife never consented to the use of her property for that purpose, but strongly objected thereto, and it appeared that there was no collusion between the husband and wife. Benhoff v. Weaver, 14 Ohio C. C. 370.

And the fact that the wife did not resort to legal proceedings in order to prevent such use of her property does not affect her liability, as it is not the policy of the law to stir up litigation between husband and wife. Ibid.

A married woman is liable as the harborer of her husband's dog which, with her consent, is kept upon premises owned by her. Valentine v. Cole, 1 N. Y. S. R. 719; Hugron v. Statton, Rap. Jud. Quebec 18 C. S. 200, contra Bundschuh v. Mayer, 81 Hun, 111, 30 N. Y. Supp. 622; Burch v. Lowary, 131 Iowa, 719, 117 Am. St. Rep. 443, 109 N. W. 282; Strouse v. Leipf, 101 Ala. 433, 23 L.R.A. 622, 46 Am. St. Rep. 122, 14 So. 667. For a full discussion of this question, see Quilty v. Battie, 135 N. Y. 201, 17 L.R.A. 521, 32 N. E. 47.

As to the effect of so-called married women's acts upon the husband's liability for wife's torts, see case note to Kellar v. James, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1003.

ous projection to persons using said pool in the ordinary way of walking along said walk way, and the condition of said premises was known to the said defendants, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care, but was unknown to the plaintiff.

"Plaintiff avers that, on said date, while he was lawfully using the said premises and walking along said walk around said pool provided for the public, and without negligence on his part, his feet slipped on the wet flooring of said walk way and he was precipitated in said pool; that in falling his left leg came in contact with one of the projecting points of said planks, which were uneven and had been allowed to project over said bath pool, and from the effect of which his left leg was then and there bruised, cut, and wounded, by means of which he became sick and sore, and from thence for a period of several months was confined to his bed from said injuries. The plaintiff avers that he has been compelled to pay out a large sum of money for physicians' services and for medicine in an effort to rid himself of the injury caused by the negligence of the defendant, and, in addition thereto, was compelled to submit to two surgical operations in order to effect a cure of the injury above set forth. Wherefore plaintiff says he has been injured and sustained damages to the sum of $3,000, and therefore brings his suit."

This amended declaration was demurred to, and the substantial matters to be argued were, among others, that, first, the declaration does not state a cause of action; second, that a married woman cannot be sued at common law for a tort such as that complained of; third, that, under the Constitution and laws of Florida, a married woman's property cannot be subjected to a judgment such as that sought for; fourth, that, under the laws of Florida, the husband has the sole control of her real property, and is alone responsible for torts committed thereby.

The demurrer was sustained, and a judgment entered for the defendants. To review this judgment a writ of error was sued out. The assignments of error here are, first, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer; and, second, that it erred in entering judgment for the defendants.

The sole question presented and urged here by the plaintiff is whether a married woman is liable under the Constitution and laws of Florida in an action for a tort such as is described in the declaration. The only decision of this court cited to sustain the contention that she is so liable is the case of Prentiss v. Paisley, 25 Fla. 927, 7 L.R.A. 640, 7 So. 56. In this case this court held 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that "a married woman is personally liable for her wrongful civil acts or actual torts [italics ours], including frauds, not growing out of or founded upon, or directly connected with, or a part of, or the means of effecting, a contract which she has undertaken to make; and she may be sued jointly with her husband in respect to such acts, or separately if she survives him. His liability for her torts is a result of the mere fact that by the common-law rules a suit cannot be maintained against the wife alone during her coverture. If before or pending the action she dies, the right of action against him falls. Whenever her coverture avoids the contract, it is likewise a bar to a personal recovery for the fraud, and this cannot be overcome by suing ex delicto." One of the cases cited in support of this view is the case of Liverpool Adelphi Loan Assn. v. Fairhurst, 9 Exch. 422, which seems to be generally treated as a leading case. In Prentiss v. Paisley there is not the slightest intimation that the liability of a married woman for her torts is in any way enlarged or affected by the Constitution or laws of Florida, changing the common law as to her ownership of a separate legal estate and giving her power to make certain specified contracts with reference thereto, and making the same liable in invitum in equity to certain specified debts. It is uniformly held by this court that these constitutional and statutory changes do not make her liable to a personal judgment or decree, unless it may be that the statute allowing her to be made a free dealer would have that effect. Prentiss v. Paisley, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Hirschkowitz, 46 Fla. 588, 35 So. 22; 2 Bishop, Married Women, § 265. This court, in the case of Mercantile Exch. Bank v. Taylor, 51 Fla. 473, 41 So. 22, undertook to distinguish between those contracts of sale, transfer, and conveyance which a married woman may make under our statutes, and which may be enforced against her, and those obligations which a court of equity is authorized by the Constitution to enforce in invitum against her separate legal estate. It has never been held by this court that the effect of our constitutional provisions and statutes is to place a married woman in the position of a feme sole, but, on the contrary, that her common-law status remains, except to the extent it has been modified by these provisions and statutes. Micou v. McDonald (Fla.) 46 So. 291.

In the case of Liverpool Adelphi Loan Assn. v. Fairhurst, supra, it was held that "a feme covert is . . . responsible for all torts committed by her during coverture, and the husband must be joined as a defendant; and consequently they are liable for frauds committed by her as for other personal wrongs; but, when the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife, and is the means of effecting it, and parcel of the same transaction, the wife cannot be responsible, and the husband be sued for it together with the wife."

In Head v. Briscoe, 5 Car. & P. 484, it was held that a husband was liable for a slander perpetrated by his wife, though he was living apart from her.

In the case of Woodward v. Barnes, 46 Vt. 332, 14 Am. Rep. 626, it is held that husband and wife are not jointly liable for those torts of the wife which are founded on her contracts, and it is said: "The general principle that for the torts or frauds of the wife an action may be sustained against her and her husband applies only to torts simpliciter, or cases of pure, simple tort, and not where the substantive basis of the tort is the contract of the wife." See 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 905; 2 Bishop, Married Women, § 261; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 5th ed. § 76; Henley v. Wilson, 92 Am. St. Rep. 160 and note (137 Cal. 273, 58 L.R.A. 941, 70 Pac. 21).

In the case of Simpson v. Bowden, 33 Me. 549, it is held that the law will not imply a contract in a case where the parties cannot legally make an express contract.

In the case of Chase v. Second Ave. R. Co. 97 N. Y. 384, 49 Am. Rep. 531, it is held that "an implied contract is one which the law infers from the facts and circumstances of the case; but it will not be inferred, so far as I can conceive, in any case where an express contract would for any reason be invalid." 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. 1078.

It may be doubtful whether this statement of the law is entirely correct. Bishop treats it under the title of "Contracts Created by Law." He says: "When the law lays on one a duty to another, it creates a promise from the former to the latter to discharge the duty. The limits of the doctrine is that where, from the nature of the case, not merely from inability of the party, there could not be a contract in fact, the law does not undertake to create the impossible." Bishop, Contr. 2d ed. §§ 182 to 186, inclusive. So he shows that, though the contract of a minor or insane person for necessities on agreed terms would not be binding, yet the party who furnishes the goods may recover of the one liable in law to pay, not what the contract provides, though it may be looked to, but what they were reasonably worth. Id. § 188.

In the case of Marye v. Root, 27 Fla. 453, 8 So. 636, this court has occasion to critically examine the constitutional and statutory provisions, then and now existing, conferring upon married women certain property rights which she did not have at common law. The result of that decision is that the statute providing the property of a wife shall remain in the care and management of the husband, but that he shall not charge for the management, nor shall the wife be entitled to sue her husband for the rent, hire, issues, proceeds, or profits of her said property, is not in conflict with the constitutional provision that all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned by her before marriage or acquired afterward by gift, devise, descent, or purchase, shall be her separate property and not liable for the debts of her husband. The present constitutional provision (Const. 1885, art. 11, § 1), modifies the former (that of 1868), in that she may make her separate property liable for her husband's debts by her consent, given by some instrument in writing executed according to the law respecting conveyances by married women. The second section of said article also provides that her separate property may be charged in equity for certain obligations. If the statute giving the husband the care and management of a wife's property was not in conflict with the Constitution of 1868 (and to that extent we approve the views of the court in that case), it is not perceived that it would violate that of 1885. Fritz v. Fernandez, 45 Fla. 318, 34 So. 315; Rawls v. Tallahassee Hotel Co. 43 Fla. 288, 31 So. 237. A married woman, it is true, has been given some additional statutory rights since the decision in Marye v. Root, supra, such as the right to her earnings and wages and the right to bring suit or actions for or concerning her real estate without joining her husband or next friend. Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 2591, 2593. Section 2594 also provides that specific performance may be decreed against a married woman. We are not called upon to say what would be the effect of the renunciation by the husband of his statutory right to manage and control his wife's property. See Fritz v. Fernandez, supra. We can discover, however, neither in the Constitution nor statutes, any purpose to remove generally all her common-law disabilities, but only those specifically mentioned; nor any purpose to make her liable for those torts for which she was not liable at common law. In several states a married woman has either by statute or constitutional provision been placed upon the legal footing of a feme sole, and she is therefore held liable for her torts. In some the statutes expressly provide she shall be so liable. Norris v. Corkill, 32 Kan. 409, 49 Am. Rep. 489, 4 Pac. 862; Quiltv v. Battie, 135 N. Y. 201, 17 L.R.A. 521, 32 N. E. 47; Strouse v. Leipf, 46 Am. St. Rep. 122, and note (101 Ala. 433, 23 L.R.A. 622, 14

So. 667); Henley v. Wilson, 92 Am. St. Rep., note p. 169.

We have noticed two cases in which it is held that, under the common law, as well as under the statutes which authorize a married woman to own and control property, she is liable for a tort committed in the management of such property. One is the case of Mayhew v. Burns, 103 Ind. 328, 2 N. E. 793, and the other is the case of Flesh v. Lindsay, 115 Mo. 1, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374, 21 S. W. 907. In the first case the tort consisted in making an excavation, causing a pitfall, into which the plaintiff fell. The maxim Sic utere, etc., is applied, and it is said she was liable at common law as well as under the statute. In the second case the tort grew out of the negligent repairing of a party wall between the property of a married woman and another. It was held that she was liable, both under the statute and at common law. But, as a married woman could not own, control, and manage a separate legal estate at common law, we cannot understand the conclusions of these courts, which are unsupported by any authority directly in point. The erection and maintenance of a party wall is a matter of contract, unless required by statute (22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 240), and we have seen no authority holding a married woman liable for a tort based on a contract. Our court, as we have seen, has decided the contrary. Prentiss v. Paisley, supra. There is an analogy between the common-law disability of a married woman and that of an infant, and, while both are liable for pure torts, we have seen no case which holds either liable for an injury due to lack of skill and experience. 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 621.

We find no authority holding a married woman liable for a tort under the circumstances stated in the declaration.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

All concur, except Parkhill, J., disqualified, who takes no part.

v.

S. S. HULETT et al.

(— Idaho, —, 97 Pac. 37.)

Waters — determination of rights — nature of action.

1. A suit to ascertain, determine, and determine the extent and priority of a water right and appropriation partakes of the nature of an action to quiet title to real estate.

Equity — quieting title — venue.

2. An action to quiet title to real estate must be prosecuted and maintained in the jurisdiction in which the res or subject-matter is situated.

Waters — priorities — extraterritorial rights.

3. The courts of Idaho, in ascertaining, decreeing, and protecting property rights in water appropriations within the jurisdiction of this state, may at the same time and for that purpose inquire into and determine rights and priorities on the same stream, that are located and situated higher up the stream and beyond the state line, in order to fairly and finally judicially determine the relative rights of the parties and decree the extent of title and right of possession of the subject-matter located and situated within this state.

Same — extraterritorial diversion.

4. The jurisdiction of the courts of Idaho to ascertain and determine water appropriations within this state is not ousted or defeated by the fact that a defendant sets up

Case Note. — Jurisdiction to determine the rights of private parties in interstate streams.

This note is confined strictly to the question of jurisdiction as affected by the situs of the property or of the act of which complaint is made, and does not include the question by what law the substantive rights of the parties are to be determined, nor any other question affecting the merits. It also excludes any consideration of the question of citizenship or amount involved as affecting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The general question as to the jurisdiction of equity over suits affecting real property in another state or country is treated in a subject note to Proctor v. Proctor, 69 L.R.A. 673, and the question as to the jurisdiction of actions at law for damages for breach of contracts, or for torts relating to real property, in another state or country, will be the subject of a subsequent note in this series.

The case of Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Miller & Lux, 81 C. C. A. 207, 152 Fed. 11, which is quite similar to Taylor v. Hulett, is sufficiently set out in the foregoing opinion.

The position of these two cases, that the court of the state in which the property affected by the diversion of the water is situated has jurisdiction to quiet the owner's title to the water rights, and, as incidental to that jurisdiction, the power to enjoin the defendant from diverting the water, although the diversion takes place in another state, is sustained by the decision in Willey v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939, 73 Pac. 210. The latter case, however, does not go to the extent of declaring that the jurisdiction of the courts in his answer that he has an appropriation of the waters of the stream in controversy, and that he diverts the waters from such stream in the state of Wyoming for use and application in irrigating lands situated within that state.

Injunction — jurisdiction — full faith and credit — diversion of water.

5. The injunctive remedy to prevent the continuance of the diversion of the water of a stream to the detriment of a prior appropriator of the waters thereof operates in personam, and, where personal service has been had upon the defendant in the action for injunction, the court has jurisdiction to award the injunctive relief, and such decree is entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of every other state.

Courts — jurisdiction — enforcing decree.

6. Where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and acquires jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by service of process, it is thereby vested with full power and authority to hear and determine all questions that occur in the case and are essential to determine the merits of the issues raised; and it likewise has authority and jurisdiction to make such orders and issue such writs and process as may be necessary and essential to carry the decree into effect and render it binding and operative.

Injunction — enforcement in foreign state.

7. The fact that a defendant against whom a writ of injunction is ordered goes beyond the jurisdiction of the state, and cannot be reached by the courts in order to punish him for contempt, does not avoid the judgment and decree; but the same may be enforced, in the orderly administration of the law, with like force and effect in the state in which the defendant is found and served with process.

(August 3, 1908.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Fremont County in defendants' favor in an action to determine and quiet title to certain water rights. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

of the state in which the property affected is located is exclusive. Upon the contrary, it appearing in that case that water was appropriated in Wyoming by means of a head gate and ditch in that state for the irrigation of land some of which was in Wyoming and some in Montana, it was held that the owners of the Montana property, as well as the owners of the Wyoming property, could invoke the jurisdiction of the Wyoming court to enjoin the diversion of water by the defendants in Montana. The court, however, while stating that, in order to protect the rights of the Montana complainants in and to the water, it would be necessary to consider and determine what their rights were as against the defendant and to that extent the court would assume jurisdiction, declined to pass upon the question whether the jurisdiction would extend to the entering of a decree quieting the title of such plaintiffs to the water claimed to have been appropriated by them for the use of the Montana land; remarking that it was a perplexing question.

It was held in Lamson v. Vailes, 27 Colo. 201, 61 Pac. 231, that, under the so-called irrigation statutes, a court of Colorado has no jurisdiction to award priorities to a ditch having its headgate in Colorado, but which was intended to and does carry water outside of the state, except to the extent the appropriation is made for land in Colorado.

The Utah supreme court in Conant v. Deep Creek & C. Valley Irrig. Co. 23 Utah, 627, 90 Am. St. Rep. 721, 66 Pac. 188, conceded the jurisdiction of a court of Idaho, to protect prior appropriators of water in Utah against subsequent appropriators who diverted the water in Idaho, and to limit and determine the rights of the Idaho appropriators with reference thereto, but denied the jurisdiction of the Idaho court to adjudicate and determine, as between themselves, the rights of appropriators who diverted water from the stream in Utah and used the same for irrigation of lands in that state.

Whether or not the jurisdiction of the court of the state in which the property affected is exclusive where the suit is in its essence one to quiet the title to the water rights, it is clear from the authorities that its jurisdiction is not exclusive of that of the state in which the act complained of is done, where the suit is merely to enjoin a wrongful act, such as a diversion of the water, or to abate the nuisance created thereby. Indeed, the court, in Stillman v. White Rock Mfg. Co. 3 Woodb. & M. 539, Fed. Cas. No. 13,446, was of the opinion that the courts of Rhode Island had exclusive jurisdiction of a suit to abate a nuisance consisting of the diversion of water by a canal in that state to the injury of complainant's property located in Connecticut, upon the theory that the suit was quasi in rem. The opinion added that, if this view of the rights of the parties was not sound, it "might be reasonable in a case like this to hold a wrongdoer liable either where the direct act is done, or where the consequential injury was felt."

And so the following cases, while not necessarily implying that the jurisdiction is exclusive, nevertheless hold or assume that a Federal court sitting in the state in which the water is diverted, has, in a proper case, jurisdiction of an action to enjoin the diversion of water to the injury of property in another state. Howell v. Johnson, 89 Fed. 556; Pine v. New York, 50 C. C. A. 145, 112 Fed. 98, reversed on another point in 185 U. S. 93, 46 L. ed. 820, 22 Sup. Ct.

Messrs. Clark & Budge for appellant.

Mr. A. H. McConnell, for respondents:

Injunction does not lie unless the rights of the party invoking it are clearly established; and if, in the establishment of such rights, the title to real estate situated in another state is involved, or the right to the use and enjoyment of the same curtailed, then the court is acting in excess of its authority when it assumes jurisdiction of the case.

Wiley v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939, 73 Pac. 210; Conant v. Deep Creek & C. Valley Irrig. Co. 23 Utah, 627, 90 Am. St. Rep. 721, 66 Pac. 188.

Allshie, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, a resident citizen of Fremont county, in this state, commenced his action in the district court of the sixth district for the purpose of obtaining a decree establishing his right and quieting his title to a certain quantity of the water of Spring creek for irrigation purposes, and for an injunction restraining and enjoining the respondents from interrupting or interfering with his right, or in any manner preventing the water of the stream flowing down to his point of diversion. It is alleged in the complaint that Spring (or Seymour) creek has its source in Uinta county, Wyoming, and flows from thence into the Teton basin, in the state of Idaho, and that the plaintiff has appropriated the water of the stream and diverted it at a point in this state, and uses and applies it on his land situated in this state; that his grantors and predecessors in interest, in the year 1901, obtained a judgment and decree, that has become final, wherein and whereby their right and priority to 8% cubic feet per second of the water of this stream has been determined. It was further alleged that, during the irrigation season of 1906, the defendants interfered with plaintiff's rights by diverting water from the stream at a point above plaintiff, so as to hinder and prevent plaintiff from receiving the amount of water to which he was entitled. The defendants were each personally served within this state, and all appeared and demurred to the com-

Rep. 592; Morris v. Bean, 123 Fed. 618 (injunction, however, denied because of defects in pleading); Hoge v. Eaton, 135 Fed. 411 (reversed in 72 C. C. A. 74, 141 Fed. 64, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 487 on another ground); Anderson v. Bassman, 140 Fed. 14; Morris v. Bean, 146 Fed. 423 (affirmed in 86 C. C. A. 519, 159 Fed. 651).

So, in Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Connecticut River Co. 52 Conn. 570, it was held that a suit would lie in Connecticut, at the instance of the owner of riparian property in Massachusetts, to enjoin the raising of a dam in Connecticut.

And in Burk v. Simonson, 104 Ind. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 304, 2 N. E. 309, 3 N. E. 826, it was declared that a court of Indiana may restrain an upper proprietor in that state from doing an act on his land which will injure the land of a lower riparian owner in Ohio.

Hawley, D. J., in Miller & Lux v. Rickey, 127 Fed. 573, while upholding the jurisdiction of a Federal court sitting in Nevada, at the instance of owners of land in that state, to enjoin defendant from wrongfully diverting in California waters of a stream which flowed through the complainants' lands in Nevada, did not imply that the jurisdiction of the Nevada court was exclusive of the jurisdiction of the courts of California. He apparently distinguishes Stillman v. White Rock Mfg. Co. supra, upon the ground that that was a proceeding quasi in rem to abate a nuisance, whereas in the case at bar the suit was in personam.

The general rule, which with a few exceptions has been reluctantly adopted and followed in this country, that an action for damages for a tort in relation to real property is local, and cannot be maintained in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) a state other than that in which the property is located if the act complained of was not committed in the state where the action is brought, has been applied to the diversion of water from an interstate stream (Watts v. Kinney, 6 Hill, 82); and to the flooding of lands (Eachus v. Illinois & M. Canal, 17 Ill. 534 and Howard v. Ingersoll, 23 Ala. 673).

The exception to that rule, that the action may also be maintained in the state in which the act complained of is committed, has also been applied in actions for the diversion of water from an interstate stream, so as to uphold the jurisdiction of the courts of a state in which water is wrongfully diverted of an action in tort for damages for injury to riparian property in another state. Foot v. Edwards, 3 Blatchf. 310, Fed. Cas. No. 4,908; Mannville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 89, 52 Am. Rep. 261.

Upon the authority of the last case, it was held in Bannigan v. Worcester, 30 Fed. 392, that a Federal court sitting in Massachusetts has jurisdiction, at the instance of the owner of mill property in Connecticut, to entertain proceedings under the Massachusetts statute for the appointment of commissioners and the assessment of damages from the diversion in Massachusetts of water from a brook which was tributary to a stream on which the mill in Connecticut was situated.

In Thayer v. Brooks, 17 Ohio, 489, 49 Am. Dec. 474, the court, while holding that an action may be maintained in Ohio for an injury to property in that state by the diversion of water in Pennsylvania, conceded that the action would also lie in Pennsylvania.

plaint, except defendant Hulett, who filed an answer. Thereafter a motion was made to dismiss the action on the grounds that the defendants were residents and citizens of the state of Wyoming, and that all the waters that they diverted or used from Spring (or Seymour) creek was diverted from the stream at a point within the state of Wyoming, and was used on lands within that state. The motion was sustained, and the action dismissed, and this appeal is taken from the judgment.

No point is made as to the question of practice or manner of presenting the jurisdictional question to the lower court. Any irregularity as to that is apparently waived here. The question to be determined here is as to whether the court of this state has jurisdiction to quiet plaintiff's title to his water right and appropriation in this case as against defendants, and to enjoin and restrain defendants from interfering with that right. In this case appellant's appropriation, diversion, and place of use are all within Idaho. The respondents are up the stream, above appellant, and their diversion and place of use are all within the state of Wyoming. Under these circumstances, can the Idaho courts, after personal service of process on the respondents and their appearance in court, determine the priorities between the parties, and adjudicate and decree appellant's rights, and enjoin respondents from interfering with such rights?

Appellant's water right is real property appurtenant to the land to be irrigated thereby. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 2825; Ada County Farmers' Irrig. Co. v. Farmers' Canal Co. 5 Idaho, 793, 40 L.R.A. 485, 51 Pac. 990; McGinness v. Stanfield, 6 Idaho, 372, 55 Pac. 1020; Hall v. Blackman, 8 Idaho, 272, 68 Pac. 19. An action to ascertain, determine, and decree the extent and priority of that right partakes of the nature of an action to quiet title to real estate. Conant v. Deep Creek & C. Valley Irrig. Co. 23 Utah, 627, 90 Am. St. Rep. 721, 66 Pac. 188; Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Miller & Lux, 81 C. C. A. 207, 152 Fed. 11. This action, therefore, to quiet appellant's title, should be maintained in the jurisdiction in which the res or subject-matter is situated. Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960; Nelson v. Potter, 50 N. J. L. 324, 15 Atl. 375; Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 636, 1 L.R.A. 79, 7 Am. St. Rep. 802, 15 Atl. 379. If, however, in ascertaining and determining appellant's rights, it becomes necessary to also inquire into and ascertain the rights and priorities of the respondents on the same stream as a defensive issue, that certainly can and will be done by a court of equity, although the res or subject-matter involved in the issue and constituting the defense be situated beyond the state line and in another jurisdiction. Willey v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939, 73 Pac. 210; Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Miller & Lux, supra.

In the case last cited the action was instituted in the state of Nevada for the purpose of determining and adjudicating the complainant's right and priority in and to a quantity of the water of Walker river, a stream flowing from the state of California into the state of Nevada. The defendant pleaded an appropriation and prior right in and to the same stream, and that its diversion and use were within the state of California. The case went to the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit on the question of jurisdiction, and Judge Wolverton, in a very lucid and well-considered opinion, says: "The defendant will not be permitted, by thus setting up a cause of suit in the state of California, to defeat the jurisdiction of the court in the state of Nevada. The complainant must be permitted to proceed upon the case made by its pleadings, and the defendant cannot defeat the jurisdiction by alleging that it has rights elsewhere which may conflict with the rights of the complainant. It may be said that the court in Nevada has not the power to quiet the title of the defendant in the state of California. But the defendant has the right to set up its conflicting interests, which arose in California, as a defense against the attempt of the complainant to have its title in Nevada quieted, because the complainant's title must depend upon whether it has the better right as against the defendant,—the rights of the parties arising in the states in which their respective interests are found. So that the answer and cross complaint of the defendant can only operate defensively in the original suit, and not to give the defendant a right to have its title also quieted in the state of California. Though the Nevada court is not authorized or empowered to settle the rights of the parties in the state of California, it may look, nevertheless, under the defensive answer, to the appropriation in the state of California, to ascertain and determine whether such appropriation is prior and paramount to the complainant's appropriation, and, if not, then to settle and quiet complainant's title and rights thereto." In Willey v. Decker the supreme court of Wyoming, in considering a kindred proposition to that here involved, said: "The district court of Wyoming has jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights of the owners of land in Montana to the water of the stream, so far as may be necessary to protect their rights, though the court may not have jujurisdiction to enter a decree for quieting the title of such owners to the water claimed."

It would seem, upon both reason and authority, that the courts of this state, in ascertaining, decreeing, and protecting property rights in water appropriations within the jurisdiction of the state, may at the same time and for that purpose inquire into and determine rights and priorities on the same stream that are located and situated beyond the state line, in order to fairly and finally judicially determine the relative rights of the parties and decree the extent of the title and right of possession of the thing or subject-matter within this jurisdiction. This proposition ought to be accorded a special recognition and application by the courts in water and irrigation litigation. Streams rise in one state and flow into another, irrespective of boundary lines, and still the rules and doctrines of priority of appropriation and use are the same in most of the arid states. This is particularly true with respect to this case. Here the riparian doctrine of the common law has been abrogated in both Idaho and Wyoming, and the rule of "first in time is first in right" is recognized and enforced in both states. Drake v. Earhart, 2 Idaho, 750, 23 Pac. 541; Moyer v. Preston, 6 Wyo. 308, 71 Am. St. Rep. 914, 44 Pac. 845; Farm Invest. Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110, 50 L.R.A. 747, 87 Am. St. Rep. 918, 61 Pac. 258; Willey v. Decker, supra. The relative rights, therefore, of appropriators of the water of an interstate stream are the same, whether the appropriations are all in the same state, or some in one state and the balance in another state. This proposition is accentuated in a case like this, where the court not only has jurisdiction of the res or subject-matter, but also obtains jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. In the case at bar the diversion by the defendants, being the act that causes the injury, takes place in Wyoming; but the injury itself that flows from the wrongful act takes place in this state. It has long been recognized as a general rule that, where an act is committed in one jurisdiction that occasions injury or damage in another jurisdiction, the injured person may elect to bring his action in either jurisdiction. See discussion and authorities cited in Rickey Land & Cattle Case above cited.

This brings us to a consideration of the injunctive relief asked by the appellant against respondents. The injunction would only be ancillary to and in aid of a decree establishing and quieting plaintiff's title. It would merely command and enforce obedience to the decree. That would be a remedy in personam, and would act only upon the person of the parties enjoined. 1 High, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Inj. 803; 1 Spelling, Inj. §§ 1, 8. The court, having jurisdiction of both the subject-matter and person of the defendants, has the right and authority to hear and determine all questions that occur in the case and are essential to a decision of the merits of the issues; and it likewise has authority and jurisdiction to make such orders and issue such writs as may be necessary and essential to carry the decree into effect and render it binding and operative. Root v. Woolworth, 150 U. S. 401, 37 L. ed. 1123, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612, 12 L. ed. 841; Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190; French v. Hay (French v. Stewart) 22 Wall. 250, 22 L. ed. 857.

The injunction prayed for in this case is merely in aid of any decree that may be entered, and would operate against the person of any defendant who might undertake or attempt to divert the water of Spring creek, so as to injure or damage plaintiff and thereby interfere with plaintiff's right as settled and established by the decree.

But it is argued that the respondents live beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and cannot be reached by the Idaho courts to punish them for contempt in the event they disobey the injunction. There would be no trouble about this if they should come within reach of the process of the Idaho court; for in that case the court could lay hold on them and deal with them as in any other case. On the other hand, if they should remain beyond the jurisdiction of this state, and there commit acts in violation of the decree and injunction, then and in that case we apprehend that appellant could go into the Wyoming court with his decree, and there obtain a like injunction from a court where personal service could be had, and the respondents would be held amenable to the orders and process of that court. The decree and injunction from the Idaho court would undoubtedly be accorded full faith and credit by the Wyoming court. Caldwell v. Carrington, 9 Pet. 86, 9 L. ed. 60; Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960. On this question the Wyoming court evidently entertains the same view we here express, as will be seen from an examination of Willey v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939, 73 Pac. 210. The judgment and order dismissing appellant's action was erroneous, and must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to reinstate the action and proceed with the case in accordance with the views herein expressed. Costs awarded in favor of appellant.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM A. BOND et al., Appts.,
v.
SALLY PALMER CURTIS MOORE et al.
LESTER CURTIS, Appt.,
v.
SAME.

(236 Ill. 576, 86 N. E. 386.)

Will — implied devise.

1. A devise to the children of the life tenant will not be implied from a gift to one for life, "but, should he die without children, then" to others.

Same — fee.

2. Under a devise to testator's only child for life, and, should he die without children, to testator's next of kin, the remainder being contingent during the lifetime of the life tenant, the reversion in fee descends to such child as heir.

Remainder — merger of life estate in fee — effect.

3. The conveyance by a life tenant, in whom the reversion in fee has vested as heir, of the life estate and the reversion, will merge the life estate in the fee and cut off contingent remainders limited upon the life estate.

(Carter, Hand, and Farmer, JJ., dissent.)

(October 26, 1908.)

CONSOLIDATED APPEALS by petitioners from several judgments of the Circuit Court for Cook County dismissing applications to have certain land titles registered. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Horace K. Tenney, with Mr. Albert M. Kales, for appellants:

By the will no estate in fee in remainder was created in favor of the children of the life tenant by the gift over if he should die without children.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Sarah Walker died testate in 1883, seised of the west quarter of lot 2, in block 32, known as No. 205 Lake street, and of the west quarter of lot 3, in block 16, known as No. 103 South Water street, both in the original town of Chicago. The second clause of her will, which was executed September 25, 1876, was as follows: "I give, bequeath and devise all of my estate, real and personal, unto my son, Lester Curtis, during his lifetime, and authorize him to sell or exchange any or all of my real estate, and to invest the proceeds thereof as in his judgment he may think best; but should he die without children, then the estate, or so much of it as may remain after his reasonable expenses for living, etc., shall go to my nearest relatives, in such proportions as the law in such cases does provide." Lester Curtis was the only heir of the testatrix. He was unmarried at the date of the will, but at the time of the death of the testatrix he was married and had two children. Immediately after his mother's death he entered into possession of the premises, and has ever since continued in possession of them. In February, 1908, he conveyed them to William A. Bond, by deeds reciting the second clause of the will of Sarah Walker that under it Lester Curtis took a life estate, and that he was also entitled, by descent, to a legal reversion of the fee pending the event of his dying without children, and the taking effect in possession, in that event, of the gift to the testatrix's nearest relatives, and that it was the intention of the grantor to convey the life estate and the reversion in fee, so that the life estate should merge in the fee and be extinguished and prematurely destroyed, and the grantee be vested at once with a legal estate in fee in possession, and that any contingent future interest in the nearest relatives should be destroyed. On February 13, 1908, William A. Bond executed a declaration of trust in favor of Lester Curtis for the premises at No. 103 South Water street in fee, and on February 24, 1908, together with his wife, by special warranty deed, conveyed the premises at No. 205 Lake street to Lester Curtis. On February 26, 1908, Bond, claiming the fee as trustee, filed his application to have the title to the premises at No. 103 South Water street registered under the Torrens act, and Curtis filed a separate application for the registration of the title to the premises at No. 205 Lake street. The two daughters of Curtis were made parties defendant, as were also various nieces and nephews of Sarah Walker, her next of kin. Mary Isabel Curtis, one of the daughters, assented to the petition, but the appellee Sally Palmer Curtis Moore, the other daughter, filed an answer, denying that Lester Curtis and Bond were the owners of the fee, and alleging that she and her sister were the owners of the fee in remainder, subject to the life estate. The answers of the nieces and nephews alleged that, next to the daughters, they were the nearest relatives of Sarah Walker, and in case of the death of the two daughters without issue before the death of their father, such of the nieces and nephews as should survive Lester Curtis would be entitled to the fee. The causes were referred to an examizer, who found that the petitioners were the owners of the fee and entitled to have their titles registered; but, upon objection, the reports were disapproved, and decrees were entered dismissing the applications, but without prejudice to the rights of the petitioners in an estate less than the fee. The appeals, prosecuted separately to this court, have been consolidated.

The principal question arising upon the construction of the second clause of Sarah Walker's will is whether or not there was a devise, by implication, of the remainder in fee to the children of Lester Curtis, by reason of the gift over to the nearest relatives of Sarah Walker should he die without children. The appellees contend that, under this clause, the daughters of Lester Curtis took a vested remainder in fee, subject to his life estate, while the appellants contend that no remainder was given, by implication, to the children of Lester Curtis, but that the reversion in fee descended to Lester Curtis, as sole heir at law of his mother, pending the happening of the events upon which the estate given over to the nearest relatives depended, and that, upon the conveyance of the life estate and the reversion to Bond, the life estate merged in the reversion, and the contingent remainder to the nearest relatives was destroyed because of this termination of the particular estate before the happening of the event upon which the contingent remainder depended. The object of the construction of wills is to ascertain the intention expressed by the testator. The intention sought is not that which, by inference, may be presumed to have existed in the mind of the testator, but that which, by the words used in the will, he has expressed. Engelthaler v. Engelthaler, 196 Ill. 230, 63 N. E. 669; Williams v. Williams, 189 Ill. 500, 59 N. E. 966; Bingel v. Volz, 142 Ill. 214, 16 L.R.A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64, 31 N. E. 13. It will be presumed that it was the intention of the testator to dispose of his entire estate, and not to die intestate as to any portion thereof. Any reasonable construction will be adopted, consistent with the terms of the will, so as to dispose of the entire estate; but, where no intention is shown by the will as to the disposition of a part of the testator's property, it must be regarded as intestate. Minkler v. Simons, 172 Ill. 323, 50 N. E. 176; Craw v. Craw, 210 Ill. 246, 71 N. E. 450. Devises by implication have been recognized, but they can only be given effect in cases of such clear necessity that from the will itself no reasonable doubt of the intention can exist. Probabilities as to the testator's intentions cannot be weighed, but the implication must be so strong that an intention contrary to that imputed to the testator cannot be supposed to have existed in his mind. Barlow v. Barnard, 51 N. J. Eq. 620, 28 Atl. 597; Brown v. Quintard, 177 N. Y. 75, 69 N. E. 225. It must be such as to leave no hesitation in the mind of the court, and permit no other reasonable inference. Connor v. Gardner, 230 Ill. 258, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 73, 82 N. E. 640. Moreover, a gift by implication must be founded upon some expression in the will. It cannot be inferred from an absolute silence on the subject. Re Reinhardt, 74 Cal. 365, 16 Pac. 13; Nickerson v. Bowly, 8 Met. 424; O'Hearn v. O'Hearn, 114 Wis. 428, 58 L.R.A. 105, 90 N. W. 450.

The estate given to Lester Curtis by the will is expressly limited to his life. Should he die without children, the remainder is disposed of. The will says nothing as to the disposition of the remainder should Lester Curtis have children. Appellees contend that the gift over, in default of children, implies a gift to the children should any be born. This question has arisen in the English courts, and a series of decisions has established the rule there that a devise to one for life, with a remainder over, if he dies without issue, does not, of itself give an estate, by implication, to his issue. Greene v. Ward, 1 Russ. Ch. 262; Sparks v. Restal, 24 Beav. 218; Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 12 Beav. 200; Neighbour v. Thurlow, 28 Beav. 33; Re Hayton, 4 New Reports, 55; Seymour v. Kilbee, 1r. L. R. 3 Eq. 33; Re Rawlins, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 299; Scale v. Rawlins [1892] A. C. 342. Such is stated to be the rule of law in Page on Wills, 554; and 2 Redfield on Wills, 3d ed. 204. In the case of Neighbour v. Thurlow, supra, it was said: "The court will give the most liberal construction to the words of a testator in order to carry out his intention; but it is contrary to every principle to introduce words into a distinct bequest in order to make the will more reasonable, or to supply a gift which is not to be found in the will. It is settled that, where there is a gift to A for life, and, if he die without leaving issue, to B, it does not create an implied gift to the children of A. Though it is natural enough to suppose that some words must have been omitted, still the answer is that the testator has not inserted them, and the court cannot do so for them." In Seymour v. Kilbee, supra, it was said that "no such gift [to children] can be implied from the gift over only, and it could only be supported by some other matters existing in the will raising an inference in favor of the issue. I can find nothing of the kind in this will. It does not contain a single word favoring the implication of any interest in the issue beyond the mere gifts over." Where in a will there is a gift to A for life.

with a gift over "on the death of A without leaving children," those words are not, by themselves, without assistance from other parts of the will, sufficient to create a gift, by implication, to the children. Re Rawlins, supra. The same principle was followed in the cases of Brown v. Quintard, and Barlow v. Barnard, supra. In the former case the testator directed the division of his residuary estate into four parts, one of which was to be given to one of his children, with certain deductions on account of advancements. The testator had four children but no disposition was made of the other three parts of the residuary estate. The court held that there was not a devise by implication, citing a number of cases illustrating the inflexibility of the rule that to uphold a devise by implication there must be so strong a probability of the testator's intention that the contrary cannot be supposed. Opposed to the English decisions above cited is the case of Ex parte Rogers, 2 Madd. Ch. 49, in deciding which the vice chancellor refers to Crowder v. Clowes, 2 Ves. Jr. 449, Wainwright v. Wainwright, 3 Ves. Jr. 558, and Harman v. Dickenson, 1 Bro. Ch. 91. The decision in Ex parte Rogers was, however, overruled by the court of appeals, and its authority is denied in Dowling v. Dowling, L. R. 1 Ch. 612, reversing the order of the vice chancellor in L. R. 1 Eq. 442. It was disregarded in the cases heretofore cited, all of which were decided subsequent to it.

We are referred to a number of cases as supporting the claim of appellees that a remainder is devised to the children of Lester Curtis by implication, and it is contended that the decision of all the American courts of last resort in which a like question was involved sustain appellees' position. The cases specially pressed upon our attention are Anderson v. Messenger, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929; Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. 75 Ga. 540. Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 227, Holton v. Den, 23 N. J. L. 330, and Carr v. Green, 2 M'Coord, L. 75. In each one of the first three of the cases above cited the language of the will which devises the property to the first taker imports a devise in fee simple, and not a life estate. It is expressly so stated in the opinion in Anderson v. Messenger. In that case, after the devise, of the fee to the testator's two sons, the qualifying clause provides: "If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor dies without lineal descendants," then the devise over follows. This devise of a fee, with the provision that, upon the death of the devisee without lineal descendants or without issue, the property shall go to another, created a fee, variously called a qualified, conditional, base, or determinable fee, in the first devisee, with an executory devise in favor of those who are to take upon the determination of such base fee by the happening of the condition by which it is limited. Friedman v. Steiner, 107 Ill. 125; Smith v. Kimbell, 153 Ill. 368, 38 N. E. 1029; Rifer v. Allen, 228 Ill. 507, 81 N. E. 1105. If the event marked out as a boundary to the time of the continuance of the estate becomes impossible, the estate then ceases to be determinable, and changes into a single and absolute fee; but until that time the estate is in the grantee. The case of Anderson v. Messenger arose in the state of Ohio, where the effect of such a devise has been held by the supreme court to be the same as in this state. Piatt v. Sinton, 37 Ohio St. 353; Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320; Collins v. Collins, 40 Ohio St. 353. In this case there was an express devise of the fee determinable upon the happening of the death of both of the sons without issue. There was, therefore, no room for application.

The court to a large extent founded its decision upon another of the cases cited by appellees,—Shaw v. Hoard, supra. In that case the language of the will was as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my said wife and daughter all the real estate of which I may be seised at the time of my death, to each one half. On the death of either my wife or daughter, then the survivor shall have all the property left them by me; and if both die without leaving any heirs of their body, then and in that case said property shall be given to my wife's brother, David Campbell." The first sentence would give a fee to the wife and daughter, to each one half, if it were not controlled by the first clause of the second sentence, which reduces the estate devised by the first to a life estate in the one dying first; but there is no limitation on the estate given to the survivor, and she therefore took a fee determinable upon the death of both the wife and daughter without issue. The wife died, leaving a daughter by a subsequent marriage. Thereupon the daughter, the other devisee, became the owner in fee of all the property, and upon her death the daughter of the second marriage, her half-sister and only heir, inherited the estate. The supreme court of Ohio arrived at the same result, but it was done by disregarding the express devise of the fee and implying a gift to the issue as a purchaser, thus reducing the fee to a life estate and giving a remainder to the daughter of the wife by implication. This case is inconsistent with the earlier case of Niles v. Gray, supra, and is, in effect, overruled by the later cases of Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1, Piatt v. Sinton and Collins v. Collins, supra.

In Piatt v. Sinton, just cited, the devise was to Lucinda Frances Piatt of all of the testator's property of every description; and it was further provided that, in case she should die without leaving any legitimate heir of her body, the property should go to certain nephews and nieces of the testator. It was held that Lucinda Frances Piatt took all the estate of the testator, subject to be defeated upon the happening of the contingency named in the will, and that until such contingency happened the fee was vested in her and her grantees. In the case of Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. supra, the devise was to the testatrix's daughter, "to have and to hold the same and her heirs forever." A subsequent clause provided that, if the daughter should depart this life leaving no issue or lineal heirs, the estate should go over. This, at common law, was a devise to the daughter in fee simple, and the subsequent clause merely added a condition upon which the estate should be terminated and the property pass to the subsequent takers. The court, however, disregarding the express devise of the fee, held that there was a gift, by implication, to the issue as purchasers, and that the daughter took only a life estate, with the remainder to her children in fee. We cannot follow these cases or regard them as authority. In each there is an express devise of the fee. In each a subsequent clause imposes a condition, upon the happening of which the estate in fee is to terminate and another is to take its place. This we have always held to constitute a determinable fee, subject to an executory devise to the subsequent takers. It leaves no room for implication. The fact that the event upon which the estate is to terminate is the death without issue of the first taker cannot affect the estate granted, or give the issue any interest in the devise.

The case of Holton v. Den, supra, appears to support appellees' contention, though the construction there was not based entirely on the gift over, but to some extent on the other provisions of the will. This case does not go into the authorities, and the court contents itself with a very brief statement of its conclusions. In Beilstein v. Beilstein, 194 Pa. 152, 75 Am. St. Rep. 692, 45 Atl. 73, it is held that in a devise over in case of the death of a devisee for life "without leaving a family" there is a necessary implication, in the contingency of her leaving a family, that the estate is to go to them. It is said that "this is practically assumed, without question, in the long line of cases on the subject which are carefully reviewed in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Seybert v. Hibbert, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 537." This is true. At a very early period this principle was assumed in Pennsylvania without discussion, and the courts have followed it down to the latest decisions, merely referring to their prior adjudications. In Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, the court, after distinguishing the words used there, "legitimate heirs," as not being the equivalent of "issue," or "issue of the body," as imputing an indefinite limitation, held that their use did not enlarge the life estate given to the first taker into a fee, but that such estate was limited to a life estate, and that upon the happening of the contingency the estate did not descend as an inheritance, but the remainder overtook effect. It is true that in argument the court said that the law would imply a devise to the children of the first taker if any had survived him; but no such decision was made or was involved in the case, and the implication seems less necessary there than in the later case of Brown v. Quintard, 177 N. Y. 75, 69 N. E. 225, where the court held there was no devise by implication.

The case of Carr v. Green, supra, sustains appellees' contention, but that case is not, and never was, the acknowledged law in South Carolina. It was decided by the court of appeals in equity in May, 1822. In May, 1821, the court of appeals at law, having this same will before it for consideration, had arrived at a precisely opposite result. Carr v. Jeannerett, 2 M'Cord, L. 66. Thus the rights of the parties depended upon the court in which the proceedings for their determination were brought. In 1824 these two courts were abolished, and a court of appeals was established, having final appellate jurisdiction in all cases. In 1825 a case involving the same will as the two former cases was brought to the court of appeals. The reasoning of the former cases and the decisions upon which they were based were carefully reviewed, and the court of appeals, after an elaborate examination of the authorities and consideration of the principles involved, held that, under the devise to the testator's grandsons, with a devise over in default of issue, there was no devise to the issue by implication, and that an estate is never implied to issue as purchasers. Carr v. Porter, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 60. This principle has since been recognized as the law by the courts of South Carolina. In Manigault v. Holmes, Bail. Eq. 298, it is held that issue cannot take as purchasers, by implication, from a valid limitation over in the event of the death without leaving issue, where there is no direct gift to the issue. So, also, it is held in M'Lure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq. 559, and Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 58.

In this state the cases of King v. King, 108 Ill. 273, 48 N. E. 582, and Orr v. Yates, 209 Ill. 222, 70 N. E. 731, are relied upon by appellees. In the former case the testator's scheme of distribution involved the division of his estate into five equal parts, and the giving of one portion to each living child, and one portion to the representatives of each deceased child. A trust was created as to one share, to be held for a grandson of the testator and his family, with a gift over in case of the death of the grandson's wife, and of his leaving no children surviving him. It was the clear intention of the testator, in setting apart the grandson's portion to him and his family, to provide for the children also, and that, if any part of the property held by the trustees remained after the death of the grandson and his wife, it should go to the children. It was held that such was the plain intention of the testator on the face of the will, and the court refers to the case of Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154, in which case, also, the remainder was sustained, and in which the rule of law was stated to be that, "if there is a bequest to the parent for life, and, if he die without having or leaving children, to be, if the parent dies leaving children, they are not entitled by implication." What was said in the case of Orr v. Yates as to the succession of the issue of Mary Maria Yates was beyond the question under consideration, and the question where the fee would go in case of her death leaving issue was expressly left undetermined. In the case of Stisser v. Stisser, 235 Ill. 207, 85 N. E. 240, the testator, after devising a life estate in separate tracts of land to each of three children, directed that, in case of the death of either without issue, the land should revert equally to the legal heirs of the other children. He then added the statement, "it being the will of the testator that the title to the properties under §§ Nos. 4, 5, and 6 herein shall rest and abide in the hands of the legal heirs of the lawful heirs of the testator" hereto. The context thus clearly indicated the intention of the testator that the title should pass to the issue of the children. A devise for life, with a gift over on the death of the life tenant without issue, is not, of itself, sufficient to create a gift, by implication, to the children of the life tenant. Such implication can only arise when supported by some other matter appearing in the will raising an inference in favor of the children.

When we undertake by construction to arrive at Mrs. Walker's intention in regard to the disposition of her property at her son's death in case he should happen to leave children, we are left entirely without aid from the will itself. It is a case for which she has not provided, whether unintentionally or purposely we have no means of determining. We may speculate or conjecture as to what may have been in her mind, but we can find no indication in the will itself to enable us to say that she intended her son's children to take the remainder. It is clear that the testatrix intended her son to have the use and benefit of the property during his lifetime, with a certain power of disposition. It is clear that she intended, if he died without children, that her nearest relatives at the time of his death should have what was left of the property. It is equally clear that it is impossible to determine her intention as to the disposition of the property if he had children. She had confidence in him, and did not refuse to give him the fee, and limit his interest to a life estate, because she feared he would squander the property; for she made him executor of her will without bond, and authorized him alone, and not in conjunction with his co-executor, to sell the real estate. She is presumed to have known that her son was her only heir, and that, as such, the property would all descend to him after the termination of the life estate, unless she disposed of it by her will. She may have believed that he would use the property for the benefit of his children, should he have any. She knew the property would naturally descend to them as his heirs. The children yet to be born might be deserving or not deserving. Circumstances, as developed by the future, might make an unequal division of the property among the children just and proper, or a diversion of a part of it in another direction desirable. It may be that, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the situation, the testatrix wished to leave to the discretion of her son the disposition of her property, except in the one event of his dying without children. The will shows that in such contingency she wished to control the disposition of such part of the property as might remain after his reasonable expenses for living were satisfied, and she did so by directing it to go to her nearest relatives. There is no word in the will indicating a desire to interfere with the statutory disposition of the property in the alternative of her son's death having children. She may have desired him to have the use of the property during his life, and, in case of his having children, the power to dispose of it as he might in his own discretion think best for the interest of his family, but have also wished the property, in case he had no children, to go to her relatives. It is possible that the testatrix, in case of her son's death having children, desired them to take the property directly from her, but the will expresses no such wish. It is equally consistent with the will that she desired her son to inherit the fee in such event. Being content with the statutory rule of descent, she made no provision to the contrary.

It may be said that it will be presumed that the testatrix intended to dispose of her entire estate, and that the will should be so construed, unless this presumption is rebutted by its provisions. It is true that any reasonable construction of a will, consistent with its terms, will be adopted so as to give it effect to dispose of all the testator's property, and not to leave a part intestate, but this rule cannot be carried to the extent of inserting provisions in the will which the testator failed to insert. Clear words are necessary to disinherit an heir; and, even where the intention is clearly manifested, the heir will take, unless the testator devises the property to someone else. Parsons v. Millar, 189 Ill. 107, 59 N. E. 606; Lawrence v. Smith, 163 Ill. 149, 45 N. E. 259. The court cannot presume a will for a testatrix on mere speculation as to what might have been her intention. It is the intention of the testatrix only so far as she has communicated that intention by her will which is to govern the descent of her estate. The omission to make any gift, in the one case, may have been the intention of the testator as fully as the gift over in the alternative.

The limitation of the estate to the nearest relatives of the testatrix should Lester Curtis die without children is a contingent remainder. Since Lester Curtis was himself the nearest relative of the testatrix at the time of her death, the devise comes within the rule that, where there is a gift to one for life, with remainder to the testator's next of kin, and the life tenant is the sole next of kin at the death of the testator, the remainder will be considered as given to the persons answering the description at the termination of the estate for life. Johnson v. Askey, 190 Ill. 58, 60 N. E. 76. Both the event upon which the estate in remainder is to come into possession, the death without children of Lester Curtis, and the persons who may at that time be entitled, as the nearest relatives of Sarah Walker, to take the estate, are uncertain, and the remainder is therefore contingent. Until its vesting, or the determination of the impossibility of its vesting, the reversion in fee descended to Lester Curtis as the heir. Peterson v. Jackson, 196 Ill. 40, 63 N. E. 643; Harrison v. Weatherby, 180 Ill. 418, 54 N. E. 237; Pinkney v. Weaver, 216 Ill. 185, 74 N. E. 714.

It is contended by appellants that, by the conveyance to William A. Bond of the life estate devised to Lester Curtis, and of the remainder in fee inherited by him, the life estate became merged in the fee, and the contingent remainder to the nearest relatives was destroyed. The effect of a conveyance of his estate, by a life tenant, to the remainderman, is to cause the destruction of the particular estate, which becomes merged in the fee. Field v. Peeples, 180 Ill. 376, 54 N. E. 304; 2 Bl. Com. 177; 4 Kent, Com. 100. Every remainder requires a particular estate to support it, and a contingent remainder must vest during the continuance of the particular estate, or eo instanti that it determines. 2 Bl. Com. 168. If the particular estate comes to an end before the event upon the happening of which the contingent remainder is to take effect occurs, the remainder is defeated; and this is so whether the preceding estate reaches its natural termination or is brought to a premature end by merger, forfeiture, or otherwise. "Unless a contingent remainder becomes vested on or before the determination of the preceding vested estate, it can never come into possession, it has perished. It makes no difference whether the preceding estates have ended by reaching the limit originally imposed upon them, or whether they have been cut short by merger, forfeiture, or otherwise. Gray, Rule against Perpetuities, § 10." Madison v. Larmon, 170 Ill. 65, 62 Am. St. Rep. 356, 48 N. E. 556. "Contingent remainders may be defeated by destroying or determining the particular estate upon which they depend before the contingency happens whereby they become vested. Therefore, when there is tenant for life, with divers remainders in contingency, he may, not only by his death, but by alienation, surrender, or other methods, destroy and determine his own life estate before any of those remainders vest, the consequence of which is that he utterly defeats them all." 2 Bl. Com. 171. So a tenant for life, with subsequent contingent remainders, might make a tortious conveyance by deed of feoffment with livery of seisin, and thus forfeit his life estate for the express purpose of destroying the contingent remainders, and, upon reconveyance of the tortious title, would hold it free from the contingent remainders. It was to prevent contingent remainders from being defeated by such premature determination or destruction of the preceding estate that the device was invented of interposing trustees to preserve contingent remainders having a legal estate to support the remainders until the happening of the contingency. When the estate for life and the next vested estate in remainder or reversion meet in the same person, notwithstanding intervening contingent remainders, the particular estate will merge in the reversion or remainder, and the contingent remainders will be destroyed. A qualification of this rule exists where the creation of the particular estate and the remainder or reversion occur at the same time and by the same instrument. Fearne, Contingent Remainders, §§ 316-324; 3 Preston, Conv. 3d ed. 399; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. 553, ¶¶ 1597, 1598; Williams, Real Prop. 233.

In Egerton v. Massey, 3 C. B. N. S. 338, the devise was to Eunice Highfield for life, remainder, in default of issue of Eunice, to Peter Highfield in fee, residuary devise to Eunice in fee. After the death of the testatrix, Eunice, by lease and release, conveyed to Peter Jackson in fee, and after her death without issue, the question of title arose between those claiming under Peter Jackson and those claiming under Peter Highfield. It was held that, under the residuary devise, the reversion in fee went to Eunice Highfield; that the life estate did not merge in it so long as both remained in the devisee, but that, upon her conveyance of both estates to Peter Jackson, the life estate merged in the fee, and that the contingent remainder of Peter Highfield was destroyed. The same question arose in Bennett v. Morris, 5 Rawle, 9, and a similar question in Craig v. Warner, 5 Mackey, 460, 60 Am. Rep. 381, and were similarly decided. In Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 376, and McElwee v. Wheeler, 10 S. C. 392, the devise was for life, with contingent remainders over, the life tenant being the sole heir of the testator. The devisees made deeds of feoffment with livery of seisin, and their grantees reconveyed to the grantors. It was held that, the common law not having been modified in South Carolina at the time, the effect of the deeds was to destroy the life estates and perfect the absolute title in the life tenants. Redfern v. Middleton, Rice L. 459. The case of Frazer v. Peoria County, 74 Ill. 282, is cited as sustaining the proposition that the court will not permit a contingent remainder to be destroyed contrary to the will of a testator or grantor. A deed was made to an unmarried woman and the heirs of her body. She reconveyed before having issue, and it was held that the contingent remainder to her children was not thereby destroyed. The question there discussed was the effect of § 6 of the statute of conveyances, which modifies estates tail so as to give the first taker a life estate, with the remainder in fee simple absolute to the next. The doctrine of merger, which has just been considered, did not apply to estates tail under the statute de donis, which were an exception to the rule. Such estates were protected and preserved from merger by the operation and construction given to the statute de donis for the express purpose of preventing the particular tenant from thus barring and destroying the estate tail. 2 Bl. Com. 177, 178. It was held in Frazer v. Peoria County that the general assembly did not intend to restore the common law as it stood before the adoption of the statute de donis, and leave the donee with power to alien the estate and repurchase, and thus cut off both the remainder and reversion, but did intend that the person who should first take from the tenant in tail should take a fee simple absolute, without any power in the donee to dock the remainder, or any reversion in the donor except on failure of issue. The case deals with an estate tail only under our statute, and is a case of statutory construction only, having nothing to do with the general question of the destruction of contingent remainders.

Our conclusion is that the language of the will does not warrant the implication of a devise of the remainder to the children of Lester Curtis; that the reversion descended to Lester Curtis, as heir at law; that, by his deed to William A. Bond, the life estate merged in the reversion, and the contingent remainder to the nearest relatives of the testatrix was destroyed; and that the appellants hold the title to the premises involved in the respective causes in fee simple.

The decrees are reversed, and the causes remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Carter, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the foregoing opinion. The conclusion reached is manifestly contrary to the plain intent of the testatrix as expressed in the will. The paramount rule in construing wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator and to give to such intent effect, if consistent with the rules of law. Bradsby v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 239, 66 N. E. 1088. This is the first and great rule in the interpretation of wills, and to it all other rules must bend. Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. ed. 322; Wardner v. Seventh Day Baptist Memorial Board, 232 Ill. 606, 122 Am. St. Rep. 138, 83 N. E. 1077. This will provides that the son shall have a life estate, with the right to control, manage, sell, or exchange the property and to reinvest the proceeds as he may think best; but he can only use of the proceeds that which is required for his reasonable expenses for living. It is further provided that if the son should die "without children" the remainder shall go to testatrix's nearest relatives. When she was disposing of her property she had these grandchildren in mind, and must have intended them to take something or nothing. Clearly she intended them to take something. And what could this be but the intermediate estate? Dowl- ing v. Dowling, L. R. 1 Eq. 442. If reasonably possible, a will will be so construed as to dispose of the entire estate of the testator. Scofield v. Olcott, 120 Ill. 362, 11 N. E. 351; Craw v. Craw, 210 Ill. 246, 71 N. E. 450. By this will the testatrix intended to dispose of all her property, the son taking a life interest in the entire estate. She did not mean to give the remainder to the residuary legatees unless her son died without children. The phrases "die without children" and "die without issue" have been construed by this court to mean without having had children or issue. Field v. Peeples, 180 Ill. 376, 54 N. E. 304. If the son had children, to whom did the testatrix mean that the remainder should go? Why did she mention these grandchildren, if she did not mean them to take this remainder? Ex parte Rogers, 2 Madd. Ch. 576. By necessary implication, the children of the son of testatrix should be considered as entitled thereto.

An estate may pass by mere implication without any express words, "and in general, where any implications are allowed, they must be such as are necessary (or at least highly probable). . . . The will . . . is construed . . . and expounded rather on its own particular circumstances than by any general rules of positive law." 2 Bl. Com. 381. If the testator's meaning cannot be clearly ascertained, we are at liberty, and for the sake of certainty in the possession and transmission of estates generally required, to apply such rules of construction as have by long usage been approved and used. Anderson v. Messinger, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 170, 146 Fed. 929. The doctrine that the intent of a testator must be the guiding and controlling rule of interpretation requires, not unfrequently, as was said in Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, "a disregard of the usual technical meaning of words and phrases, and, when necessary, such technical meaning must yield to the evident intent of the testator." It was further said in that case: "Rules of construction are resorted to as helps or aids in arriving at the intent of a testator, and ought not to be followed when they lead to results subversive of such intent. There is no rigid rule of law to the effect that words shall only be used in one certain sense, or requiring courts to give language the same interpretation and effect under all circumstances and in every connection. The infinite variety of circumstances that may occur, distinguishing one case from another, in the use of the same words and phrases, renders it impossible to give an absolute and unbending rule for the interpretation of language applicable to all cases." The rule that the intention of the testator must govern is so strong that in seeking for such intention courts are not restrained by unbending technical rules, but may adopt the most liberal construction without much regard to the grammatical structure of the sentences or the precise definition of the words used. These instruments are sometimes made in extremis and often drawn by unskillful persons. They are therefore entitled to great indulgence, and are treated with greater liberality than any other legal instruments. It frequently happens, in reading a loose and carelessly written will, that the meaning of the testator is perfectly obvious, and yet it may be difficult to explain such meaning by any strict rules of interpretation. Ferson v. Dodge, 23 Pick. 287. The implication that can be followed in construing a will must rest upon a legal inference, and not upon bare conjecture. Ibid.; O'Hara, Interpretation of Wills, chap. 14, p. 166. An estate by implication must be apparent on the face of the will and for the purpose of carrying into effect the manifest intention of the testator. Carr v. Porter, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 61.

The devise to these grandchildren of the testatrix arises by implication, founded upon expressions in the will from which such an intention on the part of the testatrix is inferred. Connor v. Gardner, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 73, and note (230 Ill. 258, 82 N. E. 640). The common understanding of the language of the will would convey the meaning that, if the son died without children, the remainder must go to the other relatives of the testatrix; but just as plainly the meaning is conveyed that in the other alternative—that is, if the son should leave children—it was intended that these children should take this remainder. The familiar rule of construction that the inclusion of one alternative is the exclusion of another, or vice versa, would tend to confirm this conclusion. Anderson v. Messinger, supra. Not only would this be the meaning given to these words by the ordinary layman, but the lawyer would almost certainly say, as a matter of first impression, that such a construction of the will carried out the plain intent of the testatrix. The construction placed upon this will by the majority opinion of the court would not readily suggest itself on the first reading of the will, and certainly was not intended by the testatrix. It is a construction that must be searched for. Does it not require a strained and unnatural meaning to be placed upon the words of the will? Rules of law should not be permitted to thus defeat the intention of the testatrix, unless they have been long established and upheld by the great weight of authority. It may be admitted that it is "essential to the security of property that a rule should be adhered to when settled, whatever doubt there may be as to the grounds upon which it originally stood" (Ram, Legal Judgment, p. 230); that it is extremely dangerous to shake the authority of decided cases. Beal, Cardinal Rules of Legal Interpretation, p. 20). I find no such settled rule, however, upholding the construction placed upon this will by the majority opinion of the court. The precise question here under consideration has never been passed upon by this court; but, as will be shown hereafter, cases have been decided by this court in which this question has been discussed, and the reasoning in those cases fairly tends to uphold the construction contended for in this dissent. It is conceded that the decisions in the English courts tend to uphold the conclusion of the opinion; but it is evident, from a study of the English authorities, that they are not all in harmony on this question, and that the rule on this subject has been changed by the modern decisions of those courts. Anderson v. Messenger, supra. The great weight of authority in this country is opposed to the rule of construction laid down in the majority opinion of the court.

It has been held in the English courts that, while American decisions will be entitled to great respect, yet they cannot be treated as controlling or placed on the same footing as the decisions of their own courts. Beal, Cardinal Rules of Legal Interpretation, p. 47. It has been rightly said that the English decisions are only "quasi authority" in this country. Ram, Legal Judgment, p. 293. The law of this state requires that the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, shall be the rule of decision in this state unless repealed by legislative authority. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1908, p. 485. The English cases since the Revolution are not regarded as authority. Upon disputed doctrines in our courts, they are entitled to respectful consideration; but, where the question relates to the construction or effect of written documents, they have no greater weight than may be due to the reasons given in their support. Andrews v. Durant, 11 N. Y. 35, 62 Am. Dec. 55. To the same effect are Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 264, 8 L. ed. 120, and Koontz v. Nabb, 16 Md. 549. No decisions have been cited in the opinion of the court that were decided previous to the American Revolution. The earliest of the English decisions cited is Green v. Ward, 1 Russ. Ch. 262, which was decided in 1826, and the latest, Scale v. Rawlins [1892] A. C. 342. One of the earliest decisions in this country is Carr 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Green, 2 M'Cord, L. 75, in which the highest chancery court of that state decided, in 1822, after a review of many of the English authorities, that the words of the will, "The rest and residue of my estate . . . to be equally divided between my two grandsons . . . at the age of twenty-one years, but should they die leaving no lawful issue" then the whole to go to others, manifested a plain intention of the testator to provide distinctly "for the issue of his grandsons, if they should leave any. And, if the common sense of the community could be consulted on it, there would not, probably, be found one mind which would hesitate in deciding that this must have been the intention of the testator." It appears that the court, in deciding this, was in conflict with some of the other courts of that state, and, when a law was passed creating a new court of appeals, that court, in 1825, reviewed the same facts in the case of Carr v. Porter, supra, reversing, in effect, the earlier decision in Carr v. Green, supra. From that day to this the American courts, so far as my attention has been called to them, have given to similar words in wills the construction contended for in Carr v. Green, supra.

In Holton v. Den, 23 N. J. L. 330, the will provided that, in case "of the decease of my son Eli before the expiration of said lease, then the house and lot called Oak Island, together with its appurtenances, shall descend to my son Andrew and his heirs and assigns forever." In discussing that provision of the will that court said (p. 334): "In the present case the devise over is to Andrew, one of the six children of the testator, on the contingency of Eli's dying before the expiration of the lease referred to in the former part of the will. It is not a limitation over to the heir at law, but to one of the heirs at law. If Eli cannot take this property by implication in case he lived beyond the expiration of the lease, the question is, What was to become of it, according to the intention of the testator? He did not mean to die intestate in regard to it, for in addition to his declaration, in the introductory part of the will, that he means to dispose of such things as God has blessed him with, he makes distinct mention of these very premises. He did not mean that his heirs general should take it, for he gave it in distinct terms to his son Andrew on a certain contingency which did not happen. And, for the same reason, it is clear to my mind he did not mean that it should be sold by his executors. I cannot resist the conviction that the intention of the testator, as gathered from the whole will, was to devise these premises to Eli in case he survived the lease, and that he takes an estate in them by necessary implication."

In Anderson v. Messenger, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929, the United States court of appeals had under consideration the words in a will, "If either of my sons die without lineal descendants the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then one half, both of the decedent's original portion as well as one half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to my brother Peter, the other half to such of my brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such surviving son;" and decided that, in case there were lineal descendants, the testator intended to prefer them, rather than the collateral branches of his family,—that this was clear by implication.

In Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 227, in construing the following words in a will: "On the death of either my wife or daughter then the survivor shall have all the property left them by me, and, if both die without leaving any heirs of their body, then and in that case said property shall be given to my wife's brother David Campbell,"—that court held that, by fair implication, the testator intended to give the property to the issue of his wife and daughter after their decease, if they left issue surviving them.

In Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, the court of appeals of New York, in construing in a will the following: "I allow my son Joseph to possess by devise of will the farm I now live on . . . [describing it], with all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging, as fully and freely as if I had made him lawful conveyance by full covenant during his natural life, but if he leaves no legitimate heirs, then in that case the property according to my will I allow to revert back to my son David, his heirs or assigns forever, without hindrance of any person whatsoever, as freely and fully as if I had given him a lawful conveyance,"—stated that from the above-quoted words the law would imply a devise in fee to the children of Joseph living at the time of his death, and thus give effect to the intent to provide for them in case there should be any such children.

In Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. 75 Ga. 540, a will gave to a daughter, after she arrived at the age of twenty-one, the estate of the testatrix, but provided that, "if my said daughter should depart this life leaving no issue or lineal heirs, that the whole of the estate herein bequeathed should go and belong to my mother and my sister, as tenants in common, and their heirs forever," etc. The court, in construing the will, said that nothing was expressly said as to what effect the existence of the children of the daughter was to have on the course of the property, but the only contingency upon which other persons—in the one case the mother and sister, and in the other the next of kin to testatrix—can take was the death of the daughter "without issue or lineal heirs," and continued: "The inference or implication seems to us plainly to be that, if there were such issue lineal or heirs left by the daughter, the property should go to them."

Practically to the same effect as the American decisions just referred to are Re Stafford, 11 Misc. 436, 33 N. Y. Supp. 419, Bentley v. Kaufman, 12 Phila. 435, and McAlpin's Estate, 211 Pa. 26, 60 Atl. 321. Rood on Wills, § 495, also tends to support the same conclusion, where certain English authorities are cited supporting the text, as does also 1 Spence's Equitable Jurisdiction, p. 530.

It will be noted that in most, if not all, of the cases just cited, there was in the first instance, by the terms of the will, a devise in fee to a certain person, which devise in fee was cut down to a life estate by later provisions of the will. The reasoning of the majority opinion would necessarily be much stronger in support of the construction that is contended for in that opinion as to such a wording than it would where the will plainly states, as it does here, that in the first instance the first taker is only to have a life estate. In discussing this question, Jarman, in his work on Wills (vol. 1, Bigelow's 6th Am. ed. *525), says: "And even where the language of the will necessarily confines the interest of the parent to his life, the children will not generally be held to take by implication. It is extremely probable that the testator intended a benefit to them. But si voluit non dixit. But it seems that in such a case the court will lay hold of slight circumstances to raise a gift in the children, and thereby avoid imputing to the testator so extraordinary an intention as that the devisee or legatee over is to become entitled if the first taker have no child, but that the property is not to go to the child, if there be one, or its parent." Evidently this eminent author thought the English courts had gone further than they ought in holding that a devise by implication should not arise by words similar to those contained in this will. It will be noted that he said it is extremely probable that the testator intended a benefit to them, and that the construction contended for in the majority opinion imputes to the testator an extraordinary intention.

The latest authority that has been called to my attention is Beilstein v. Beilstein, 194

Pa. 152, 75 Am. St. Rep. 692, 45 Atl. 73, and decided in 1899. That decision is precisely in point. In construing the following language of a will: "It is my desire that my daughter, Gertie Beilstein, shall receive the income of my property . . . as long as she lives, but should she die without leaving a family," then the remainder to the testator's brothers and sisters, that court held (page 154 of 194 Pa.): "The devise over in case Gertie should die 'without leaving a family' is an implied devise to her family if she should leave one. It is only if she does not that the devise over is to take effect, and there is a necessary implication that in the other unexpected contingency of her leaving a family the estate is to go to them. This is practically assumed without question in the long line of cases on the subject,"—citing authorities. That the construction here contended for was generally understood to be proper by the courts of this country is very clear from Washburn on Real Property, vol. 1, 6th ed. § 192, where that author says: "An instance of an estate tail by construction, where there is no direct limitation to the heirs of the donee's body, would be an estate to A, with a proviso that if he shall die without heirs of his body the estate shall revert to the donor or go over to one in remainder. Here, it will be perceived, there was no direct limitation to the heirs of A, and it is too plain for doubt that the donor intended the heirs of his body should take it at his decease; for he gives it over, or reserves it, in case he has no such heirs, and only in that contingency."

It may be conceded, as stated in the majority opinion, that some of the decisions of the American courts just cited did not all have under consideration the exact question in this case, and it may also be conceded, as suggested, that, on some other questions as to the construction of wills, rules of law are laid down in some of those decisions not in harmony with the decisions of this court; but the reasoning in these cases, whether the question under consideration was the exact one in this case or a kindred question, tends strongly to uphold the construction contended for in this dissent. Moreover, as I have stated, the decisions in our own court, while not decisive, are strongly persuasive, and the profession, in reading them, would naturally conclude that this court was inclined to follow the American rather than the English authorities on this subject.

In Schaefer v. Schaefer, 141 Ill. 337, 31 N. E. 136, the will under consideration provided: "I do bequeath to my beloved daughter, . . . the following property [describing it] in trust for her sole use and benefit and of her children, and their children thereafter. But in the event that my daughter . . . should die and leave no children as heirs to the within-mentioned property, then it is my will and desire that all of said property shall go to my brother, Jeremiah Coughly, . . . and to his heirs and assigns." This court, through the late Justice Baker, in construing this will, stated (page 344 of 141 Ill.): "Further evidence of the intention to give said children the remainder in fee is amply afforded by the provision that, if appellee 'should die and leave no children, . . . then . . . said property shall go to my brother, Jeremiah Coughly, . . . and his heirs and assigns forever.' The necessary implication from this language is that, if there were children of appellee, then primarily the property should go to them and to their heirs and assigns, forever." The holding in that case that the children were entitled to the remainder did not rest alone upon the clause of the will last quoted; but it is manifest, from the last sentence quoted from Judge Baker's opinion, that the court then had no doubt that a devise would necessarily be implied from language such as is contained in the will here in question.

In King v. King, 168 Ill. 273, 43 N. E. 582, where the question as to devises by implication was exhaustively presented in the briefs, the will there under consideration provided: "It is my will that in the event of the death of the wife of said William Jones King, and of his leaving no children surviving him, that then, and in such case, the said trustees, after the death of said William Jones King, shall convey and transfer to my children and their descendants all the estate, both real and personal, then in their hands or remaining undisposed of," etc. In construing this will this court stated (page 286 of 168 Ill.): "We think the intention of the testator was that the estate should go to the issue of William Jones King, if he left any." It is true that in that case there were other provisions of the will which tended to uphold the same conclusion, and the court did not rest its opinion solely upon the intention of the testator as drawn from the words quoted.

In Orr v. Yates, 209 Ill. 222, 70 N. E. 731, the will provided that the testatrix devised to Jefferson Orr, trustee, certain described land, "constituting what is commonly known and called the 'Putz farm,' to have and to hold in trust for the sole use and benefit of Mary Maria Yates, for and during her natural life, and in the event of the death of the said Mary Maria Yates without child or children or descendants of child, then to have and to hold for the sole use and benefit of Lydia Yates, my wife, if she shall be living during her natural life, and at the death of Lydia Yates, my wife, and Mary Maria Yates, my daughter (if said Mary Maria Yates dies without child or descendants of child), the fee to the said last-described tract of land known as the Putz place shall be equally divided between my brothers and sisters and their heirs and assigns," etc. In discussing the will this court said, speaking by Mr. Justice Wilkin (page 238 of 209 Ill.): "The only uncertainty is as to what shall be done with the trust property in case Mary Maria Yates dies leaving issue. Will it go to such issue in fee, or will it fall back into the estate as intestate property and descend to the heirs of William H. Yates? Our opinion is that it will vest in the issue of Mary Maria Yates. That seems to be the fair inference from the language used. If she dies without issue, then the trust continues during the life of Lydia Yates, and the fee vests in the brothers and sisters. If Mary Maria Yates dies leaving issue, that is clearly the end of the trust, and it seems to be the intention of the testator that the fee shall vest in her issue. This construction is in harmony with the rule of law that, where a party disposes of his estate, the presumption is that he intended to dispose of all of it, and courts will so construe the will as to leave no part of the estate as intestate property."

While it is conceded that in none of these three cases did the decision turn upon wording precisely like the one in the will here under consideration, yet I am confident that the profession generally adopted the view that in those decisions (and others of a similar nature where the reasoning is not quite so strong or clear) the construction insisted upon in this dissent was intended to be laid down. In note 2 to § 207 of Kales on Future Interests that author says: "Gift to issue of first taker raised by implication from gift over if life tenant leaves no issue,"—citing Orr v. Yates, supra, and other Illinois cases.

In the recent case of Stisser v. Stisser, 235 Ill. 207, 85 N. E. 240, this court construed the following words of the will: "It is my will that, should either of the above-named children [naming them] die without issue," then and in that case the property shall be disposed of in a certain way; and stated (page 210 of 235 Ill.): "We think under said clause the remainder, after the death of either of said life tenants, in the property described in said clauses 4, 5, and 6, was devised, by necessary implication, to the issue of the respective life tenants, if they had issue." This statement may be considered dictum, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) as the question was not necessary for the decision of the case or exhaustively discussed in the briefs; still the reasoning there, in connection with the former decisions of this court, might almost be held judicial dictum, as distinguished from mere obiter dictum, and as that rule was laid down by this court, speaking by the late Justice Wilkin, in Law v. Grommes, 158 Ill. 492, 41 N. E. 1080.

The decided weight of American authority is against the construction of the will upheld by the majority opinion of the court. If the English and American authorities are in conflict, surely the American courts ought to follow the American decisions rather than the English. unless sound reasoning and principle require the following of the English authorities; but, when not only the American authorities are substantially, if not entirely, unanimous on the question, but also the reasoning in the decisions of our own court tends to support the construction given to this will by the chancellor in the court below, then, before this court should hold to the contrary, we ought to be convinced that the rule of the American decisions is not sound in principle and is manifestly mischievous in its results. This court has time and again laid down the doctrine that the intention of the testator as stated in the will must control when not against public policy or public law. It is the courts' duty to construe wills as they find them, and not to make them. Illinois Land & Loan Co. v. Bonner, 75 Ill. 315. But courts may, in effect, make wills for parties by giving them a mistaken interpretation. While the doctrine of implication must be resorted to cautiously in the construction of wills, the court should not hesitate to resort to that doctrine when thus only can the manifest intention of the testator be carried out. Does not the construction given to the words by the majority opinion rest to a far greater extent on conjecture than does the construction given by the trial court? The testatrix, without question, intended that her son should only have a life estate in her property, with the right to control and manage it and with the right to use sufficient of the proceeds for his support and comfort; but is it not a most violent inference that she intended that if he had children he should have a fee-simple title instead of a life interest? The intention of a testator "is to be collected from the whole will taken together. Every word is to have its effect and every word is to be taken according to the natural and common import." Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. Jr. 329. The rule just quoted from this early English authority has always been followed in this court. Applying it in this case, and giving to the words of this will their natural and common meaning, it should be held that the intermediate estate in remainder was intended to go to the grandchildren of the testatrix, if any such were born to her son. To give the estate to such issue leaves none of it intestate and will do no violence to the language of the will, but will carry into effect the purpose of the testatrix clearly implied from the language she has used in that instrument.

The only justification, it seems to me, for construing the will in accordance with the rule laid down in the opinion of the court is the decisions of the English courts during the past century. Those courts seem to apply fixed rules to the construction of devises to an extent not generally adopted in this country. Anderson v. Messinger, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929. In following their decisions on this question, are we not adopting an arbitrary rule for its own sake, rather than to carry out the intent of the will, thus defeating, instead of promoting, justice? By so doing are we not imputing to the testatrix the "extraordinary intention" (1 Jarman, supra) that other and more distant relatives are to become entitled to the remainder if the son has no children, but that the remainder is not to go to these children, if any there be? Is it not "too plain for doubt" (1 Washburn, supra) that the testatrix intended these grandchildren to take this remainder?

Hand and Farmer, JJ., dissenting:

We concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Carter.

Petition for rehearing denied December 8, 1908.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

CLYDE WILSON, Admr., etc., of Charles P. Dewey, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HARTFORD FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 104 Fed. 817.)

Executor — different states — privity between.

1. There is no privity between the executors of the will of a decedent appointed in one state and an administrator with the same will annexed appointed in another state, nor between the administrators of the estate of an intestate appointed in different states.

Same — estoppels in one state — conclusiveness in other.

2. Estoppels in favor of or against such executors or administrators in one state, by judgments or by the administration statutes of limitation of that state, do not bind or affect an administrator with the will annexed, or an administrator of an intestate appointed in another state, or a claimant against such representatives.

Same — domiciliary administrator — rights in foreign jurisdiction.

3. Administration in the state of the domicile of the decedent does not govern the administration of the property of a decedent in any other state.

Same — claims barred by statute — estoppel in foreign jurisdiction.

4. A claim against the estate of a decedent in the hands of an administrator with the will annexed in one state is not barred because it was not presented and has become barred against the estate of the decedent in the hands of the domiciliary executors of the same will in another state.

(November 2, 1908.)

Case Note. — Effect of failure to present claim within the time allowed by the administration statute of the domicile as a bar to its allowance in the state of the ancillary administration, or vice versa.

Although there are a goodly number of cases similar to those on which the court, in WILSON v. HARTFORD F. INS. CO., depended for its decision, passing on the question whether or not a judgment against the executors of a will of a decedent appointed in one state is binding on an administrator with the will annexed appointed in another, or vice versa, very few cases have been found presenting the specific question involved in that case, whether a failure to present a claim against one within the required time is a bar to its presentation against the other; and it will be noted that those found, with the exception of Borer v. Chapman, 119 U. S. 587, 30 L. ed. 532, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, which is sufficiently set out in the WILSON CASE, do not seem to be in accord with that case.

In Durston v. Pollock, 91 Iowa, 608, 60 N. W. 221, a person died in Illinois leaving property there, and land in Iowa, the last being devised to a daughter; an administrator with the will annexed was appointed in Illinois, who subsequently, owing to a peculiar statute, was also appointed administrator in Iowa; it appeared that in his lifetime the deceased had become liable on a note as surety for a son; the claim on this note was not filed in Illinois until more than two years after the appointment of the administrator, and consequently was barred by the statute; subsequently the claim was filed against the estate in Iowa. The court, however, in denying this claim, iciliary executors of the will of a deceased person and the administrator with the will annexed of the property of such a person in another state that a bar of a claim against the former bars it against the latter? Section 4450 of the General Statutes of Kansas of 1901 reads: "Where the cause of action has arisen in another state or country, between nonresidents of this state, and by the laws of the state or country where the cause of action arose an action cannot be maintained thereon by reason of lapse of time, no action maintained thereon in this state."

But has the cause of action which the insurance company here presses arisen in another state or country? A proceeding in a probate court to administer upon the estate of a deceased person is a proceeding in rem, not in personam. The property within the jurisdiction of the court is the defendant, the executor or administrator is its representative, and all claiming any interest in that property under the deceased are parties to the proceeding. Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319, 337, 11 L. ed. 283, 290; Sheldon v. Newton, 3 Ohio St. 494, 503. The probate court of Illinois and the executors which it appointed had no jurisdiction to administer or to distribute any property beyond the limits of that state, because the statutes which gave them their authority were ineffective beyond its boundaries. The property of the estate of the deceased in that state, and that alone, therefore, was the defendant, and the executors represented no other. In the proceeding in Kansas the real defendant is the property of the estate of the decedent in that state, and the administrator with the will annexed is the representative of that property and of no other. In other words, the defendant in the administration in Illinois was the property of the deceased in that state, which alone the executors represented, and not the property of the estate in Kansas; and the defendant in the administration in Kansas is the property of the deceased in that state, which alone the administrator with the will annexed represents. Now, no cause of action against the deceased arose in his lifetime, because his obligations to the insurance company did not mature until after his death. No cause of action against his property in Kansas, the only defendant in the instant suit, arose after his death either in the state of Illinois or in any other jurisdiction outside of the state of Kansas, because no court or officer beyond the limits of Kansas ever had any jurisdiction to adjudge or enforce any such cause. The only cause of action, therefore, which was barred by the failure of the insurance company to present its claim in due time in Illinois was its cause of action against the property of the deceased in that state. That cause of action never existed, and never was judicable in Kansas, so that in the state of Kansas the bar of the Illinois administration statutes in no way affected it. The insurance company's cause of action against the property of the estate of the deceased in Kansas never existed and never was judicable in the state of Illinois, and the bar of its cause of action against the property of the estate of the deceased in Illinois by the administration statutes of that state in no way limited or affected its cause of action against the property of the estate of the deceased in Kansas.

But counsel say that the administrator with the will annexed appointed in Kansas is in privity with the executors appointed in Illinois, and, as the insurance company is estopped by the statute of limitations of Illinois from enforcing its claim against the former, it is also estopped from enforcing it against the latter. "The term 'privity' denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property." Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 189. Lord Coke divides privies into three classes,—privies in estate, privies in law, and privies in blood. The only principle upon which the doctrine of estoppel applies to one party because of his privity with another is that the party claiming through another is estopped by that which estopped that other respecting the same subject-matter. Thus the executors and the administrator with the will annexed are in privity with the testator, and are estopped by judgments and prescriptions that prevail for or against him, because they each derived the property they are respectively administering from him. But there is no privity between the Illinois executors and the Kansas administrator, because none of the property which the latter is administering was derived from the former, and none of the property which the former is administering was derived from the latter, so that an estoppel against or in favor of the latter does not relate to the same subject-matter with which the former is dealing, and they are not privies in estate. They received their authority from different sovereignties over different property, they are accountable to different courts which are acting under different laws, the authority of the executors is paramount and that of the administrator is nothing in Illinois, the authority of the administrator is paramount and the executors are without authority in Kansas, hence they are not privies in law. They are certainly not privies in blood, and the result is that they are not privies at all. The suggestion that in some incomprehensible way the domiciliary administration in Illinois is so primary and that in Kansas so ancillary that an estoppel of a claimant to urge his demand in the former proceeding estops him in the latter is not tenable. Under the statutes of Kansas, to which we have adverted, the administration in that state can never become ancillary to that in Illinois until the probate court in Kansas has fully paid out of the property of the estate in that state all the claims there presented and allowed, and has ordered the residue to be sent to the executors in Illinois under § 2980, Kan. Stat. 1901, and then it will become ancillary only to the extent of that residue. Until that order is made the administration in Kansas is independent of and co-ordinate with that in Illinois, and estoppels between the creditors and the representatives of the property of the estate in one jurisdiction are ineffectual for or against the representatives of the property of the estate in the other.

In Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. 467, 468, 497, 498, 11 L. ed. 1059, 1060, 1073, 1074, Henry Nixon, one of the executors named in the will of Matthias Aspden, a resident of England, proved the will and qualified as executor in England and in the state of Pennsylvania. He died, and successive executors were appointed, one in England and one in Pennsylvania. Administrators of the estate of John Aspden sued the executor in England for the property of the estate of Matthias, and the High Court of Chancery dismissed their bill. The Pennsylvania administrator of the estate of John then sued the Pennsylvania executor of the estate of Matthias for the property of the estate upon the same ground of action. The executor pleaded res judicata, but the Supreme Court overruled the plea on the ground that the property involved and the representatives of the estates in the two jurisdictions differed and there was no privity between them.

In Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. 458, 461, 467, 14 L. ed. 223, 224, 226, the testator, a resident of Virginia, named three executors in his will, two of whom qualified in Virginia and one in Louisiana. A claimant against his estate recovered a judgment against the Virginia executors as such, and relied upon it to sustain an action in Louisiana against the executor in that state. The Supreme Court said: "Notwithstanding the privity that there is between executors of a testator, we do not think that a judgment obtained against one of several executors would be conclusive of the demand against another executor, qualified in a different state from that in which the judgment was rendered;" but added that, under the rule in the state courts of Louisiana (Jackson v. Tiernan, 15 La. 485), such a judgment was admissible in evidence to meet the plea of prescription. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Borer v. Chapman, 119 U. S. 587, 590, 591, 598, 599, 30 L. ed. 532-534, 536, 537, a testator who resided in Minnesota, but the bulk of whose property was situated in California, named two executors in his will, one a resident of Minnesota, the other a resident of California. The will was proved in each state. The Minnesota executor accepted the trust in that state, but notice to creditors was not published and claims against the estate in Minnesota were not barred in accordance with its administration statutes. The California executor qualified in his state, notice to creditors was there published, all claims not presented were barred under the provisions of the statutes of California, the estate in that state was fully administered, and the executor was discharged. An action at law was brought in the state of Minnesota against the Minnesota executor upon a claim which had not been presented in California and which was barred under the administration statutes of that state, and the defendant pleaded that the cause of action was barred in Minnesota by virtue of the administration in California, but the Supreme Court sustained a judgment for the claimant, and said: "If he had chosen, he could have proved his claim there and obtained payment; but he had the right to await the result of the settlement of that administration, and look to such assets of Gordon as he could subsequently find in Minnesota, whether originally found there or brought there from California by the executors or legatees of Gordon's estate."

In Brown v. Fletcher, 210 U. S. 82, 52 L. ed. 966, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702, 704, 705, Fletcher, a resident of Michigan, died testate, leaving a suit pending against him in Massachusetts and property in that state worth $300. His will was proved and the executors qualified in Michigan, and an administrator with the will annexed was appointed in Massachusetts. The suit was revived against this administrator, and resulted in a decree against him for more than $400,000. This decree of the Massachusetts court was filed in the probate court in Michigan as evidence of a claim against the estate of Fletcher in that state, upon the ground that the executors in Michigan were in such privity with the administrator with the will annexed in Massachusetts that a decree against the latter was conclusive evidence of the debt against the former; but the Supreme Court held that there was no privity between them, and that an estoppel of the administrator with the will annexed in one jurisdiction constituted no estoppel of the executors of the will in another state. The converse of this proposition is equally true, and our conclusions are: There is no privity between the executors of the will of a decedent appointed in one state and an administrator with the same will annexed appointed in another state, nor between administrators of the estate of the same decedent appointed in different states. Estoppels in favor of or against such executors or administrators in one state by judgments or by the administration statutes of limitation of that state do not bind or affect an administrator with the will annexed, or an administrator appointed in another state, or a claimant against such representatives. Administration in the state of the domicile of the decedent does not govern the administration of the property of the decedent in any other state, and a claim against the estate of the decedent in the hands of an administrator with the will annexed in one state is not barred because it was not presented and has become barred against the estate of the decedent in the hands of the domiciliary executors of the same will in another state. Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. 1, 5, 10 L. ed. 639, 640; Aspden v. Nixon, supra; Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. 44, 58, 60, 12 L. ed. 337, 342, 343; Hill v. Tucker, supra; *McLean v. Counsel for the plaintiff in error have cited opinions of courts of eminent ability that are not in accord with these propositions. Sanborn v. Perry, 86 Wis. 361, 56 N. W. 337; Latine v. Clements, 3 Ga. 426; Hunt v. Fay, 7 Vt. 170; Baldwin v. Rice, 44 Misc. 64, 89 N. Y. Supp. 738; Durston v. Pollock, 91 Iowa, 668, 60 N. W. 221; Harrison v. Stacy, 6 Rob. (La.) 15. These decisions have been thoughtfully considered, but the more cogent reasons and the supreme authority sustain the views which have been expressed, and they must prevail.

The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CHINA BRACKETT'S ADMINISTRATOR,
Appt.,
v.
LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD

(33 Ky. L. Rep. 921, 111 S. W. 710.)

Railroad — standing cars — negligent closing.

One undertaking to cross between freight cars standing on a switch track with only a narrow opening between them, to reach a railroad station as a passenger train is arriving, assumes the risk of injury from the opening being closed in the operation of the road, although the track is between the postoffice and depot, where persons may be expected to cross, if the opening is not a continuation of any traveled path; and the railroad company cannot be held liable for injury due to his being caught between the cars if his danger was not known to the railroad employees in time to avoid the injury.

Case Note. — Liability of railroad for injuries to one not an employee, by closing gap between standing cars at point other than a highway crossing.

The question of the defendant's negligence is for the jury where a nine-year old child, while attempting to cross a public street through a gap in cars standing upon a side track maintained by it lengthwise of the street, was injured by the sudden closing of the gap, by reason of other cars being kicked or shunted against the standing cars by defendant's servants,—the plaintiff not noticing any engine or moving cars as he started to cross the track. Lehman v. Eureka Iron & Steel Works, 114 Mich. 260, 72 N. W. 187. The court observed that the plaintiff was not a trespasser in crossing the track, and, the track being upon a public highway, the defendant was bound to take some precaution to guard the public from danger in placing its cars thereon, and the shunting or kicking of cars across a public highway is actionable negligence.

And, under such circumstances, the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was for the jury, as the same rule would not be applicable to a mere child that would apply to an adult. Ibid.

So, it is not negligence per se for one, on his way to a railway station to meet an incoming passenger, in following a path to the station habitually used for that purpose, to attempt to pass through a gap between cars standing upon a side track at a point where it was customary to leave openings therefor; and the defendant will be liable for his death caused by the sudden closing of the gap without warning. Nichols v. Washington, O. & W. R. Co. 83 Va. 99, 5 Am. St. Rep. 257, 5 S. E. 171. The court said that the deceased went upon the premises over this route in pursuance of an invitation held out by the defendant, and, therefore, it was the latter's duty to notify persons entitled or invited to use such way, in some unmistakable manner before the gap was closed; and all that would be required of the deceased, under such circumstances, would be the exercise of reasonable care.

But it was contributory negligence for a person in possession of his faculties—traveling a footpath across a railway yard, which, with the defendant's acquiescence,

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Bell County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. N. J. Weller, for appellant:

At such a place and such a time, the company, in the movement of the cars, owed a lookout duty to the persons reasonably expected on the premises about the depot.

Davis v. Louisville, H. & St. L. R. Co. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 172, 97 S. W. 1122; Illinois C.

was generally traveled in going to and from the station, where cars were frequently separated for this purpose—to attempt to pass through a gap between standing cars, when, had he looked as he approached the gap, he might have seen a train backing toward the standing cars and bystanders shouted a warning to him, before he entered the gap, to which he paid no attention. Bertelson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 Dak. 313, 40 N. W. 531.

And, under such circumstances, the fact that the bell or whistle of the approaching train was not sounded, and the servants in charge thereof were negligent in not observing the opening between the standing cars and the decedent's approach thereto, will not render the railway company liable. Ibid.

So, the negligence of a parent, who permits an eight or nine year old girl to pass between the cabooses of two standing trains, at a point near a public crossing, in a space but a few inches wide, will be imputed to the child, so as to prevent a recovery for injuries sustained by the closing of the gap, either by the movement of the engine attached to one of the trains, or by its gradual slacking back down an incline. Stillson v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 67 Mo. 671.

And the fact that neither the bell nor the whistle of the locomotive was sounded does not disclose negligence, as this is not required except when the engine is approaching a public crossing. Ibid.

So, it was contributory negligence for one to attempt to pass through a gap between cars in a switch yard, which was always more or less obstructed with trains and standing cars, passageways for travelers not ordinarily being left therein, where, had he looked before entering the gap, he would have seen cars moving of their own momentum toward the gap. Flynn v. Eastern R. Co. 83 Wis. 238, 53 N. W. 494.

So, no recovery can be had where a pedestrian attempted to pass through a gap in a freight train near a station, where switching of cars was in progress, and was killed by the sudden closing of the gap, although the railway track ran lengthwise of the principal business street of the town, it appearing that the deceased was not observed by the trainmen; as, under such circumstances, the deceased was a trespasser, to 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

R. Co. v. Murphy, 123 Ky. 787, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 352, 97 S. W. 729; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Popp, 96 Ky. 90, 27 S. W. 992; Perkins v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 123 Ky. 229, 94 S. W. 636.

Messrs. Benjamin D. Warfield, C. W. Metcalf, and J. W. Alcorn for appellee.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. China Brackett was killed by being mashed between two cars at Four Mile, a station on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, whom the only duty owed was not wilfully or negligently to injure him after his presence was discovered or known. Southern R. Co. v. Mouchet, 3 Ga. App. 266, 59 S. E. 927. This doctrine was applied in Grady v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 112 Ga. 668, 37 S. E. 861.

There can be no recovery under a complaint alleging the sudden closing up of a gap between cars at a point where a walk leads from a railway station across the railway company's yards, by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servants, whereby the plaintiff, who was on his way to the station to mail a letter, was injured, where the evidence discloses that no engine or servant of the defendant was near the cars at the time the gap was closed, and the cause of the closing thereof was unexplainable. Gurley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 93 Mo. 445, 6 S. W. 218.

So, one who may be regarded as a licensee cannot recover for injury sustained by the closing of a gap between cars standing upon a railway side track while he is passing through the same, where he is aware of the approach of an engine toward the cars, but believes he has time to pass through the gap, as he is guilty of contributory negligence. Nichols v. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. 83 Miss. 126, 36 So. 192.

So, it was contributory negligence for one aiding in carrying goods from a district in which a large fire was raging to attempt to cross a railroad track through a gap between cars in a railway yard, in spite of warnings of the approach of a switch engine with bell ringing, although the engineer and fireman, who were on the lookout, failed to observe him. Springer v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 161 Fed. 801.

As to contributory negligence in attempting to cross or pass through a train standing upon a public crossing, see case note to Jones v. Illinois C. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1066.

As to the liability of a railway company for acts of employee in inviting pedestrian to cross train obstructing highway, see case note to Southern R. Co. v. Clark, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1071.

As to the duty of a railway company toward persons attempting to cross train obstructing highway, see case note to Texas v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1074.

road between Pineville and Corbin, Kentucky. It is a small place. The depot is on the west side of the main track, and the storage track is east of the main track. East of the storage track is the postoffice and two restaurants. There are coal mines in the neighborhood, at which the coal cars are loaded. They are then brought to Four Mile, and put on the storage track until some train comes along to take them out. On the day on which Mrs. Brackett was killed the storage track was pretty well filled with loaded coal cars, although there were, at different places along the track, spaces between the cars. About midway between the two restaurants there was a short space between two coal cars. One witness stated that the space between the cars was 6 feet; another witness says 3 feet. Perhaps one meant that the space was 6 feet from one car to the other, while the other meant that the space was 3 feet from one of the bumpers to the other. As the passenger train was pulling in from the south, Mrs. Brackett, who had been at the postoffice, and wished to go over to the platform, thinking that her husband might come in on the train, walked from the postoffice down the track until she got to this space between the two cars. There she was joined by three other ladies, who were also going over to the platform. Just at this time a freight train, going in the opposite direction, was at the north end of the switch, and pulling in on the side track to get out of the way of the passenger train. To do this it pushed the cars standing on that track ahead of it; and, just as Mrs. Brackett was between the two cars, as she was going across the track, the cars closed in on her catching her between the two bumpers, and so injuring her that she died. The situation is shown on the following map, the point A indicating where she was caught between the two cars:

There is a walk way from the postoffice out to the track, made of plank, and a similar walk way from the Spurling restaurant out to the track. She did not follow these walks, as there was no opening in the cars at the end of either of them. The space between the two tracks was filled with cinders, so that it was a good place for walking. There was some proof offered by the plaintiff to the effect that no signal for the movement of the cars was heard just at the time they came together, and it is very evident that none of the four ladies who were crossing the track had any idea that the cars were about to be moved. It is also evident from the proof that those in charge of the freight train could not see the ladies on account of the cars obstructing the view, and that they had no idea that anybody was between the cars or would be endangered by their moving them. The freight train had whistled for the station, and was ringing its bell as it pushed in on the side track; but the noise of the incoming passenger train, which was then just rolling past, prevented the ladies from hearing the noise or the signals of the freight train. At the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

It is manifest from the proof that the space between the two cars, at the point A, was not left as a pass way for persons. There was no crossing at that point, and the space was so narrow that manifestly it simply was left there by the cars rolling apart when they bumped together, as they were not coupled. It is insisted for the plaintiff that, inasmuch as it was train time, and persons were expected to be passing about these tracks, going to and from the station, the company should have anticipated the presence of persons between these cars, and therefore is liable to Mrs. Brackett. To so hold would be, in effect, to say that, before moving cars situated like these, the company should send a man along the cars and warn everybody to get out of the way; for it is manifest that nothing short of this would have done Mrs. Brackett any good. All that occurred was that the short space between these two cars was closed up when the freight train came in at the switch and pushed the other cars down in front of it, closing up the other spaces between them until they ran back against the cars next to Mrs. Brackett. Where the space between cars has not been left as a pass way for people, especially where it is as narrow as the one shown here, the company is not ordinarily required to anticipate that persons will be in the space, and persons who thus go between cars take the risk of the space being closed up. The freight train at the other end of the switch could have plainly been seen by these ladies before they undertook to pass across the track, and, if they had considered at all, they would have known that the train had to come in on the side track to get out of the way of the passenger train. If there had been a public crossing there, or even a private crossing, at which the cars had been opened to allow people to pass, the case would be different. But it would be a hard rule to hold the railroad responsible for an accident like this, where the person injured had no right to be where she was, and where the railroad company was not required to anticipate that anyone might be between the cars. The movement of the cars was made with as little force as it could reasonably have been done. They were simply forced back out of the way of the freight train; and in a number of cases it has been held that people who go between cars which are liable to be moved take the risk, and cannot recover where the danger to them was not known to the servants of the railroad company in time to avert it.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wade, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 549, 36 S. W. 1125, Wade was standing or walking between the rails of the side track in Woodburn, Kentucky, at a place very much like that here shown in evidence, and was struck by a piece of timber that was on one of the cars and extended out beyond the car. It was held that he could not recover. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 638, 65 S. W. 119, Hocker, finding the path that he wished to walk along obstructed by cars, stepped in between two cars, and, while standing there, was seriously injured by the cars being moved without a signal. It was held that he could not recover. In Southern R. Co. v. Thomas, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 79, 92 S. W. 578, Thomas was a laborer in the service of the railroad company, and was sent to the office for a rake. When he got opposite the office, he found there were some cars between him and the office. He thereupon climbed between the cars, and went over to the office, and, as he was returning in the same way, a car bumped against the cars which he was on and seriously injured him. It was held that he could not recover, although no signal or notice of the movement of the car was given. To same effect are the authorities in other states. In 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 764, the rule is thus stated: "To pass under or between the cars of a train, which one knows, or ought to know, is liable to move at any moment, or between cars, to one of which a train in full view is about to couple, is an act of gross negligence, unless the person attempting it is assured by someone in authority that it is safe to do so."

We recognize the rule that it is the duty of the railroad company to anticipate the presence of persons about its stations when a train is arriving, and that it is its duty to exercise ordinary care for their safety; but we do not think that this duty extends to persons passing between cars, or under them, or over them, where no invitation, express or implied, has been held out to them to do so. The space between the two cars before us was too narrow for a person to understand that it was left there as a pass way; and, when anyone undertook to go between the cars at this place without the knowledge of the railroad company, they took the risk. See Stillson v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 67 Mo. 671.

WILLIAM J. MCGURK, Appt.,
v.

GEORGE J. CRONENWETT.

(199 Mass. 457, 85 N. E. 576.)

Contract — inducing breach — corporate officer.

1. An officer of a corporation may be liable for maliciously inducing it to break its Case Note. — Civil liability for inducing discharge of servant.

The foregoing question, confined to labor unions, is considered in a note to Berry v. Donovan, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899. And the general question as above stated is discussed in a note to State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 62 L.R.A. 714. It is not intended herein to include the cases gathered in the foregoing notes.

The question of one's liability for inage." There is no averment that the defendant knew of the existence of this agreement, unless that is implied in the word "maliciously." We do not doubt that there is a right of action for purposely and maliciously preventing the performance of a contract, whether of employment or otherwise. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Beekman v. Marsters, 195 Mass. 205, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, 122 Am. St. Rep. 232, 80 N. E. 817, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 332. But where, as in the case at bar, this is the sole cause of action relied on, it is essential both to aver and prove the defendant's knowledge of the contract in question. This was the doctrine of both Walker v. Cronin and Beekman v. Marsters, ubi supra, and of Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216. And justice requires this doctrine to be upheld. A defendant who has not been guilty of conduct otherwise actionable ought not to be held liable for having brought about, though wrongfully and without cause, the breach of a contract of which he had no knowledge. It follows accordingly that this count is insufficient unless it can be said that the charge that the defendant "maliciously" prevented the plaintiff from performing his obligations under his agreement necessarily imports an allegation that the defendant knew of the agreement of which he prevented the performance.

In the opinion of a majority of the court this cannot be said. The natural meaning of the word "maliciously" is "wilfully and intentionally." Com. v. Goodwin, 122 Mass. 19, 35, cited and followed in Com. v. Jones, 174 Mass. 401, 54 N. E. 869. In a capital case tried before two justices of this court the jury were told that the malice necessary to constitute the crime of murder meant simply that the act was "wilfully done for the purpose of carrying out the defendant's own ends, regardless of the rights of others;" and this was sustained by the full court. Com. v. Pemberton, 118 Mass. 36, 37, 39, 40, 43. It means an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another, according to the language of Bowen, L. J., in Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 612, quoted by Lord Watson in Allen v. Flood [1898] A. C. 1, 93, 94. And see South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. [1905] A. C. 239. So it was held by Bayley, J., in Bromage v. Prosser, 4 Barn. & C. 247, 255, that "malice in common acceptation means ill will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse." And it was said by this court, speaking through the present chief justice of the right to dispose of one's labor as he will, that "an intentional interference with such a right, without lawful justification, is malicious in law, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) even if it is from good motives and without express malice." Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 356, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 409, 74 N. E. 603, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 738. And see the cases there cited; also those collected in 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1667. But we have been referred to no case, nor have we found any, in which an averment that the act complained of was done maliciously has been held to include an averment of knowledge of specific facts, when the right of action depended upon such knowledge.

It follows that in the first count of this declaration there is no averment that the defendant had knowledge of the agreement between the plaintiff and the plate glass company; and the count sets out no cause of action.

The judgment entered for the defendant must be reversed; the demurrer to the first count must be sustained; and that to the second count must be overruled.

So ordered.

Damages — mental anguish — breach of contract.

1. Damages for mental anguish can be recovered in an action for breach of contract only in those exceptional cases where the breach amounts, in substance, to an independent, wilful tort.

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Case Note. — Mental anguish as element of damages in action for breach of contract relative to corpse.

Cases involving the question of right of property in a corpse and of the right of action for tort in relation to the corpse are, of course, without the scope of this note, as indicated in the title.

In the foregoing opinion it will be noticed that the court said that generally mental anguish could not be considered as an element of damages in an action for the breach of a contract, but that, in exceptional cases, such anguish might be considered, and the ligence of the company's agents and servants in carrying the corpse beyond the connecting point, thus causing a delay of twenty-four hours in the funeral arrangements, it is held that, in the absence of wilful or malicious misconduct on the part of the company or its agents, damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered.

Pleading — nominal damages.

3. The complaint construed, and held not to state a cause of action within this rule, though it does state a cause of action for nominal damages.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Red Lake County decision in reality turned upon the question whether or not a contract relative to a dead body came within any of the exceptions to the general rule. The cases generally do not recognize that the rule as to the allowance of damages for mental anguish has the exceptions suggested, and an action for such damages will succeed or fail according as the "mental-anguish doctrine" does or does not prevail in the state. Consequently the cases involving the question to be discussed in this note will be practically limited to those jurisdictions in which the mental-anguish doctrine prevails.

The majority of the cases upon this subject hold that mental anguish is a proper element of damages in such an action.

Thus, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Long, 148 Ala. 202, 41 So. 965, where a telegraph company was negligent in the transmission and delivery of a telegram announcing the death of a child, and requesting that a conveyance meet the sender and the body at a station, the court said: "Instead of being met at the train with a conveyance and by friends and relatives, and of having his people informed when he expected to bury his child, he alighted from the train a dreary, cloudy night, with no one to meet him or assist him, and to hear that no one had been apprised of his child's death, and that no arrangements had been made for the funeral the next day. Can it be thought for a moment that this man did not suffer mental anguish not measurable by dollars and cents, and that said anguish and suffering were not the proximate consequence of a nondelivery of his telegram, and that the very telegram itself was not sufficient to suggest to the defendant the result of a nondelivery? We think not. We do not mean to hold that, in all cases and under all conditions, the sender can recover for mental suffering growing out of a failure to meet him at the train, etc. But the telegram in this case contemplated more than the bare presence of the sendee. It called for the arrangements of preliminaries of a most sacred character." And to the same effect Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMorris (Ala.) 48 So. 349.

overruling a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's negligence in the transportation of a corpse, causing a delay of twenty-four hours in the funeral arrangements. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. L. Countryman for appellant.

Messrs. W. E. Dodge and William A. Tautges for respondent.

Brown J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint in this action, and appealed from an order overruling the same.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that plaintiff's child, aged three and one-half

(Tex. Civ. App.) 21 S. W. 688, where a father telegraphed to a friend of the death of his son, requesting him to send a coffin, and because of nondelivery of the telegram the funeral was delayed until the body began to decompose, the court said: "The doctrine that damage of this character may be considered the natural and direct consequences of a failure to transmit a telegraphic message such as the one in question has become so firmly fixed in our jurisprudence that the action of the appellant seems scarcely to be justified in requiring us to reannounce it."

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crowley (Ala.) 48 So. 381, in an action for failure to deliver a telegram announcing the death of a child, and requesting that preparations be made for the burial, it was held not error to refuse to charge that the plaintiff could not recover damages for mental pain and anguish in finding, upon his arrival at the destination, that no arrangements had been made for the burial.

So, in Lyles v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 77 S. C. 174, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 534, 57 S. E. 725, it was held that a telegraph company which fails to deliver a telegram directing preparation for a funeral is liable for mental suffering caused by the exposure of the corpse for several hours to the rays of the sun, and the delay of the burial to a very late hour of the night.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Giffin, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 306, 65 S. W. 661, it was held that the plaintiff could recover for injuries because of mental anguish caused by failure to send promptly a telegram announcing the death of a child, and the purpose to transport the corpse for burial, where such delay resulted in the sendee's being obliged to leave the body alone in a freight house for several hours while he sought for relatives.

So, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 654, 13 Am. St. Rep. 843, 10 S. W. 734, it was held that mental anguish and suffering were proper elements of damages in an action for failure promptly to deliver a telegram announcing a death and the forwarding of the corpse.

years, died at Cass lake, and plaintiff decried that the body should be buried at Ogahmah. The body was accordingly prepared for burial, and delivered to defendant for shipment to that place. The shipment required a transfer of the casket containing the body at Erskine, where the defendant's road connects with the Soo Line, over which the plaintiff and the corpse were to reach Ogahmah. The complaint further alleges that it was the duty of defendant to put the corpse off its train at said Erskine, to the end that it might be transferred to the Soo train, but that, instead of doing so, its servants and agents wrongfully and unlawfully retained possession thereof, and "negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and with utter disregard of the rights and feelings of this plaintiff," carried the corpse beyond that station, and to the city of Crookston, thus delaying the funeral arrangements for twenty-four hours; that, by reason of this delay, the corpse became badly "decayed, mutilated, and damaged." As to the nature and character of the injury and damage to plaintiff, it alleges: "That said funeral was to take place at White Earth on the 21st day of July, 1906, at 3 o'clock P. M., as stated, and at said time and place the plaintiff had her priest and mourners in attendance, but, by reason of the premises, said funeral and burial could not take place at said time, causing this plaintiff great annoyance and damage. That, by reason of the said neglect, wrongful, and unlawful acts of said defendant, this plaintiff has been greatly damaged, and has been greatly outraged in her feelings, and has suffered great distress of mind and great mental pain and anguish, and has become sick and nervous, and will continue to suffer great mental pain and anguish in the future, all to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $3,000." The complaint charges no wilful or intentional misconduct on defendant's part, or on the part of its agents, no claim is made for actual damages, and the allegations thereof, taken as a whole, show only a failure to transport the corpse of plaintiff's child to Erskine, leaving it there

C. 432, 62 S. E. 833, a recovery was allowed for negligence in failing to deliver a telegram announcing a death, through which failure the body was delivered to the state anatomical society.

Mental anguish suffered by the next of kin by reason of a breach by a third person of his contract with them to keep safely a corpse until they should desire to inter the same was held, in Renihan v. Wright, 125 Ind. 536, 9 L.R.A. 514, 21 Am. St. Rep. 249, 25 N. E. 822, to be a proper consideration in the assessment of damages for such a breach. (In connection with this case attention should be called to the later case, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson, 157 Ind. 64, 54 L.R.A. 846, 60 N. E. 674, 1080, which expressly repudiated the mental-anguish doctrine, and overruled the earlier cases which recognized it.)

And in Wright v. Beardsley, 46 Wash. 16, 89 Pac. 172, it was held, in an action by parents against a firm of undertakers for the improper burial of their child, that mental suffering and injury to feelings would ordinarily be the natural and proximate result of such improper burial, and therefore the court did not err in instructing the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover actual damages for the injury to the feelings.

Damages for mental anguish are recoverable for the negligent and brutal handling of a corpse by the undertaker to whom the body was delivered for interment. Dunn v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 74 S. W. 576.

So also a recovery was sustained in Wells, F. & Co's Express v. Fuller, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 610, 35 S. W. 824, in an action for damages for mental anguish suffered because of the negligent delay in forwarding the corpse for interment, which delay prevented church services, and compelled a burial by night.

And in the following cases it was held 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that mental suffering might be considered in assessing damages against a carrier for breach of its contract to transport a corpse: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hull, 113 Ky. 561, 57 L.R.A. 771, 68 S. W. 433; Hale v. Bonner, 82 Tex. 33, 14 L.R.A. 336, 27 Am. St. Rep. 850, 17 S. W. 605; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. French, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 511, 57 S. W. 56; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Linton (Tex. Civ. App.) 109 S. W. 942.

In a number of cases a recovery has been denied, but, in these cases, for the most part, the decision really turns upon some other question.

Thus, in Hockenhammer v. Lexington & E. R. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2383, 74 S. W. 222, it was held that there could be no recovery for mental anguish caused by the negligence of a railroad company, through which a corpse delivered to it for transportation was thrown upon the ground, where the corpse itself was in no wise mutilated.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Turner (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 302, in an action for damages against a telegraph company for failure promptly to send a telegram announcing the death of a child, and requesting that the sender be met at a station, it was held error to admit evidence of the fact that, because of the delay in the delivery of the telegram, the sender was obliged to place the body for a period of about ten minutes upon the platform.

So, in an action for failure promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram announcing the sending of a body, it was held error, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burch, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 237, 81 S. W. 552, to refuse to give an instruction to the effect that the plaintiff could not recover for mental anguish because of the fact that neighbors who had been secured to take the body to its destination permitted the wagon to stand for reshipment over the other line to the place of destination, in accordance with its contract. The principal question for consideration, therefore, is whether, on the facts stated, a recovery may be had for the mental suffering endured by plaintiff in consequence of defendant's neglect.

The question whether mental anguish is a proper element of damage, either in actions in tort or for a breach of contract, has been presented to the courts in numerous cases, and there is much conflict of opinion upon the subject. According to the weight of authority, such damages may be recovered in all actions in tort where the plaintiff has suffered physical injury at the hands of the defendant, whether from malice or mere negligence (6 Current Law, 631, 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 658); also in that class of torts where the plaintiff is subjected to some indignity, as in libel, slander, malicious prosecution, or seduction (8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 668; 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 44); and, again, in those wilful wrongs where some legal right has been invaded, though no physical injury is inflicted or character or reputation assailed (Leach v. Great Northern R. Co. 97 Minn. 503, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 93, 106 N. W. 955; Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L.R.A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034; Sander-son v. Northern P. R. Co. 88 Minn. 162, 60 L.R.A. 403, 97 Am. St. Rep. 509, 92 N. W. 542). But such damages are not recoverable in all actions in tort. Broadley stated, their allowance is limited to actions where the plaintiff has received some injury to his person, or some legal right has been invaded of a nature naturally to cause grief and distress of mind. None of the cases, as we read them, go beyond these limits. They are not recoverable in actions for death by the wrongful act of another. Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79; Blake v. Midland R. Co. 18 Q. B. 93; Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391; Munro v. Pacific Coast Dredging & Reclamation Co. 84 Cal. 515, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248, 24 Pac. 303. Nor in actions for libeling the dead. Bradt for some time in a public yard while the horses were being fed.

And in Nichols v. Eddy (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 316, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover for the negligence of the defendant in transporting the corpse of plaintiff's daughter, where the contract for transportation was made by an agent of plaintiff, and the existence and relationship of the plaintiff was wholly unknown to the defendant. And to the same general effect was the decision in Wells, F. & Co's Express v. Fuller, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 213, 23 S. W. 412, where it was held that a mother could not recover for the negligent delay in the shipment of the body of her child, where the contract for the shipment was made by another child.

So, in Hancock v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 142 N. C. 163, 55 S. E. 82, it was held that it could not have been within the contemplation of the parties to a telegram that it would rain two days thereafter, and that the employees of a railroad company would leave the body concerning the transportation of which the telegram was sent upon a station platform, where it would be exposed to the rain, and that this could not be deemed the proximate result of a failure promptly to transmit and deliver the telegram. When this case was before the court upon the first appeal (137 N. C. 497, 69 L.R.A. 403, 49 S. E. 952), it was held that one claiming damages for delay in the preparations for interment of his relative because of failure promptly to deliver a telegram has the burden of showing that the preparations would have been made had the telegram been promptly delivered; and such fact will not be presumed.

negligent delay in transporting a corpse, but a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on the ground that improper evidence had been admitted. And see Hart v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 638.

In Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238, it was held that, in an action for damages for the unlawful mutilation and dissection of the plaintiff's husband, a recovery might be had for injury to the feelings and mental suffering resulting directly and proximately from the unlawful act, although no pecuniary damage was alleged or proven. It does not appear, however, in what way the defendant came to be in possession of the corpse. And this case was cited with approval in Lindh v. Great Northern R. Co. 99 Minn. 408, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1018, 109 N. W. 823, where it was held that an action ex delicto to recover damages for injured feelings lies at the suit of the husband against a common carrier for soiling and ruining the casket containing the body of his dead wife, and for mutilating and disfiguring the corpse by negligently and wilfully exposing it to rain. The court held that there was no merit in the contention that there could be no recovery, as the action was based on a contract, for the complaint set forth a cause of action in quasi tort, at least, for which an action ex delicto lies.

Upon the question of the right to recover for mental anguish consequent upon the failure of a telegraph company to transmit money to prepare corpse for burial, see case note to Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Quigley, post, 575.

Upon the question of mental anguish as an element of damages for mutilation of corpse, see case note to Long v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 883.

v. New Nonpareil Co. 108 Iowa, 449, 45 L.R.A. 681, 79 N. W. 122; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 426. Nor in actions for injuries to a minor child. Sperier v. Ott, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 518, and cases cited in note (116 La. 1087, 114 Am. St. Rep. 587, 41 So. 323); Flemington v. Smithers, 2 Car. & P. 292; Bube v. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. 140 Ala. 276, 103 Am. St. Rep. 33, 37 So. 285; Black v. Carrollton R. Co. 10 La. Ann. 33, 63 Am. Dec. 586; Harford County v. Hamilton, 60 Md. 340, 45 Am. Rep. 739; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Barker, 33 Ark. 350, 34 Am. Rep. 44. In State use of Coughlan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 24 Md. 84, 87 Am. Dec. 600, an action by a mother for the wrongful death of her son, in which she claimed the right to recover for mental anguish in addition to compensatory damages, the court said: "According to the appellant's theory, the mother and son are supposed to live on together to an indefinite age; the one craving sympathy and support, the other rendering reverence, obedience, and protection. Such pictures of filial piety are inestimable moral examples, beautiful to contemplate, but the law has no standard by which to measure their loss." Loss of support or loss of services is the gist of actions last referred to, and compensatory damages only are recoverable, and it is immaterial whether the act complained of was wilful and malicious, or merely the result of negligence. There may be other exceptions to the general rule mentioned, as applied to action ex delicto, but we are not concerned with them at this time.

It is also a rule of general application that mental anguish is not a proper element of damage in actions for breach of contract, though there is a class of wrongs arising out of contractual relations in which this element is permitted to enter. Illustrations of this are found in wilful and unlawful injuries to passengers upon railroad trains. There is, in such cases, a contract by the railroad company to carry safely the passenger to his destination, and an implied legal obligation to protect him within certain limits while the relation of passenger and carrier exists, and the courts declare that wilful or malicious violation of that duty constitutes an independent tort, for which recovery may be had for the indignity to which the passenger is subjected. Mykleby v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 39 Minn. 54, 38 N. W. 763; Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 41, 11 N. W. 356, 911; Walsh v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Wis. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 376; Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504. An exception is also made of actions for breach of promise to marry. But such actions in all essential respects partake of the nature of torts, and are so treated by the courts. Johnson v. Travis, 33 Minn. 231, 22 N. W. 624; Thorn v. Knapp, 42 N. Y. 474, 1 Am. Rep. 561; Smith v. Woodfine, 1 C. B. N. S. 660; Coil v. Wallace, 24 N. J. L. 291; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1021. The rule that damages of this nature may be recovered in an action for a breach of contract properly to send and deliver a telegram has become the settled law in a number of the states, following the lead of Texas. But a majority of the courts do not concur in the doctrine. 63 Cent. L. J. 340; 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 355, note. This court declined to follow it in Francis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L.R.A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078, where the rule laid down in the leading English case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, was approved and followed. But it would be unprofitable to prolong this opinion by an extended discussion of the general subject. Summarizing, it may be said that mental anguish is a proper element of damages in all actions sounding in tort, where the plaintiff has received some physical injury, or his legal rights have been so wilfully invaded as naturally to cause mental distress. It is an element to be considered in actions for a breach of contract in exceptional cases only; the principal exception being the telegram cases already referred to. And we pass to a consideration of the question whether this case comes within any of the exceptions.

In respect to the wrongful interference with the rights of preservation and burial of the dead, the courts are again somewhat at variance. Though the common law recognizes no property in the bodies of deceased persons (Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; R. v. Sharpe, 7 Cox, C. C. 214), a right of possession and preservation for burial purposes is conceded by nearly all the authorities, which the law will protect (R. v. Fox, 2 Q. B. 246; Williams v. Williams, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 659; Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 132, note). And any wilful or wrongful interference with that right by the intentional mutilation or secretion of the body subjects the wrongdoer to an action on the case, in the determination of which mental anguish is a proper element for consideration in assessing damages. The law on the subject, so far as it relates to actions, in torts, is completely summed up by Mr. Justice Mitchell in Larson v. Chase, supra. It was said in that case: "But this whole subject is only obscured and confused by discussing the question whether a corpse is property in the ordinary commercial sense, or whether it has any value as an article of traffic. The important fact is that the custodian of it has a legal right to its possession for the purpose of preservation and burial, and that any interference with that right by mutilating or otherwise disturbing the body is an actionable wrong." That has become one of the leading cases on the subject in this country, and has been cited with approval and followed and applied in other states. Burney v. Children's Hospital, 169 Mass. 58, 38 L.R.A. 413, 61 Am. St. Rep. 273, 47 N. E. 401; Koerber v. Patek, 123 Wis. 453, 68 L.R.A. 956, 102 N. W. 40; Foley v. Phelps, 1 App. Div. 551, 37 N. Y. Supp. 471; Hackett v. Hackett, 18 R. I. 155, 19 L.R.A. 558, 49 Am. St. Rep. 762, 26 Atl. 42; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 123 Ga. 62, 51 S. E. 24, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 128. The contrary doctrine is upheld by plausible argument in Long v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 15 Okla. 512, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 883, 86 Pac. 289, in which the cases holding to the view that no action will lie in such cases, either in tort or for breach of contract, are cited. The rule laid down in the Larson Case expresses the modern view of the question, and extends a remedy where otherwise none would exist. There being no property in dead bodies, and the wrong complained of being only the invasion of an intangible legal right, no actual damages for the wrongful mutilation of the body can be recovered, and the courts award solatium for the bereavement of the next of kin as the only appropriate relief. Without the element of mental distress, the action would be impotent of results and of no significance or value as a remedy for the tortious violation of the legal right of possession and preservation. 7 Current Law, 9, 54. But that rule can, on principle, have no application to actions for breach of contract. A breach of contract involves only such consequences as directly result therefrom and were within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, and which may be measured and determined by some definite rule or standard of compensation. While the rule of compensation to the injured party controls the measure of damages, both in actions ex contractu and ex delicto, the elements proper to be considered are in some respects widely different in the two classes of cases. In actions sounding in tort, exemplary or punitive damages are, as a general rule, awarded, in the discretion of the jury. McCarthy v. Niskern, 22 Minn. 90; Peck v. Small, 35 Minn. 465, 29 N. W. 69; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 13. But they are compensatory in theory only. Such damages are not recoverable in actions for breach of contract, except, perhaps, in those exceptional cases where the breach amounts to an independent, wilful tort, in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) which event they may be recovered under proper allegations of malice, wantonness, or oppression. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 20; North v. Johnson, 58 Minn. 242, 59 N. W. 1012. They cannot be recovered in actions involving ordinary negligence, where no physical injury results. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Shanks, 94 Ind. 598; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Scurr, 59 Miss. 456, 42 Am. Rep. 373; Gibney v. Lewis, 68 Conn. 392, 36 Atl. 799; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374; Chicago v. Martin, 49 Ill. 241, 95 Am. Dec. 590. Exemplary damages are incapable of definite ascertainment; and, though classed theoretically as compensatory, they are, in fact, imposed in the nature of punishment for the wrong complained of, and the amount rests in the sound judgment of the jury. Mental grief, from a pecuniary standpoint, is just as incapable of definite calculation as exemplary damages. The law furnishes no standard by which it may be valued, the amount awarded in any particular case must necessarily rest in the discretion of the jury, and recovery therefor should, on principle, be confined to those cases where punitive damages are allowed. In Texas, Kentucky, North Carolina, and perhaps other states, where the so-called "Texas doctrine" in the telegraph cases has met with approval, it is held that, in an action for breach of contract concerning the burial of the dead, mental anguish may properly be considered by the jury in the assessment of damages to the aggrieved party. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hull, 113 Ky. 561, 57 L.R.A. 771, 68 S. W. 433; Hale v. Bonner, 82 Tex. 33, 14 L.R.A. 336, 27 Am. St. Rep. 850, 17 S. W. 605; Renihan v. Wright, 125 Ind. 536, 9 L.R.A. 514, 21 Am. St. Rep. 170, 25 N. E. 822. Those cases follow logically the Texas rule in the telegraph cases. But, wherever the Texas rule has been repudiated, as an innovation upon elementary principles of the common law, the courts have, in our view, consistently reached the opposite conclusion. The cases are collected and the subject discussed in 5 Columbia Law Rev. 179, and in 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 355. The extreme to which this rule leads is illustrated in two North Carolina cases. A father sent a telegram to a friend at a distant point, stating that his daughter, sixteen years of age, was on her way to visit at his home, and requesting the friend to meet her at the train, which arrived about 12 o'clock at night. Through the negligence of the company's agent, the message was not delivered, and no one met the daughter upon her arrival at the station. The conductor of the train placed her in charge of an employee of the railroad company, who procured a carriage, and she was taken to the friend's house, safe and sound, except for her mental anguish and worry. She brought an action for damages against the telegraph company, alleging, as ground of recovery, her mental distress. The father also sued for mental anguish which he suffered when told the next day of the failure to deliver the telegram. The court sustained the right of action in each case. Green v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 N. C. 489, 67 L.R.A. 985, 103 Am. St. Rep. 955, 49 S. E. 165, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 349; Green v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 N. C. 506, 49 S. E. 171, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 358. These cases are not open to criticism, except to the extent the doctrine upon which they are founded is subject to adverse comment. They follow logically and consistently the "Texas doctrine," and emphasize, in our opinion, the reductio ad absurdum of that rule. Efforts have been made to induce the courts of some jurisdictions to apply that doctrine in various forms of action for breach of contract. In Eller v. Carolina & N. W. R. Co. 140 N. C. 140, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 225, 52 S. E. 305, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 46, damages were sought for mental anguish for the breach of a contract to furnish a wedding trousseau, by reason of which plaintiff was subjected to mortification, humiliation, and mental distress. The court rejected the claim. Damages were sought in Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Dalton, 65 Kan. 661, 70 Pac. 645, for negligently carrying plaintiff by the station of his destination, but the court held that distress of mind was not subject of compensation for a breach of contract of that nature. See also Wilcox v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 17 L.R.A. 804, 3 C. C. A. 73, 8 U. S. App. 118, 52 Fed. 264; Hot Springs R. Co. v. Deloney, 65 Ark. 177, 67 Am. St. Rep. 913, 45 S. W. 351.

But, without further citation of authorities, or discussion of the subject from the standpoint of decisions of other courts, we turn to our own decisions, and find that the question has been definitely settled by this court in Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L.R.A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078, wherein we declined to follow the Texas rule. The question was fully considered in that case, and the conclusion reached that, in actions for breach of contract to transmit and deliver a telegram, mental anguish occasioned by the breach furnished no proper basis for the recovery of damages. The difference between actions in tort and those for breach of contract is pointed out with clearness by Mr. Justice Mitchell, who wrote the opinion. The rule therein announced and applied has the sanction of the elementary principles of the law of damages, and is approved by a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) majority of the courts of this country. In addition to the cases heretofore referred to, we cite Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L.R.A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, 15 S. E. 901; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 13 L.R.A. 859, 24 Am. St. Rep. 300, 9 So. 823; Connell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L.R.A. 172, 38 Am. St. Rep. 575, 22 S. W. 345. "The law looks," Judge Mitchell remarked, "only to the pecuniary value of a contract, and for its breach awards only pecuniary damages." And the court applied the general rule that, in such actions, damages must be limited to the actual pecuniary loss naturally and necessarily flowing from the breach. The logic of that decision applies to the case at bar. The complaint before us charges, at most, a negligent failure to perform the contract for the breach of which damages for mental anguish are demanded, and the case is not brought within those wherein such damages are awarded for the malicious and wanton breach, to which we have adverted. 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 44, 45. Of this class Lindh v. Great Northern R. Co. 99 Minn. 408, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018, 109 N. W. 823, is an example. In that case we did not intend to be understood as holding that mental anguish was a proper element of damages in an action for the failure of a common carrier safely to transport a corpse to its destination in accordance with its contract. The injuries there complained of were treated as a wilful tort, distinct from the contract, and the conclusion reached is in harmony with Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238. If damages for mental anguish may not be recovered in actions wholly in tort, where the parent suffers untold grief at the disfigurement of his minor child, or because of his death by the wrongful act of another, or in actions for libeling the dead, as indicated by the authorities cited, by what course of reasoning, from the view point of legal principles, uninfluenced by feelings of sentiment or resentment, can it be held that they may be recovered in an action like that at bar, for the mere negligence of a railroad company in carrying a corpse beyond the station of its destination, resulting in no injury to the body, save such as arises from its natural tendency to decomposition? We discover none.

It is urged that damages of this character in actions upon contract, as well as in tort, find support in the declaration of the fundamental law that there shall be a certain remedy for all wrongs, and that, if they be denied in breach of contract actions, the guaranteed remedy is denied. This is plausible, but not persuasive. The maxim, Ubi jus ibi remedium, has, like other principles of the law, its limitations. The guaranty of a remedy for all wrongs has more particular reference to wrongs of a substantial nature, where property or character is affected, rather than to those founded wholly in sentiment. It protects property and property rights, persons, domestic relations, character, and reputation, but not necessarily grief and mental distress occasioned by some unintentional act of wrongdoing. As remarked by the supreme court of Indiana in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson, 157 Ind. 69, 54 L.R.A. 846, 60 N. E. 674, 1080, the maxim that for every wrong there should be a remedy, as applied to actions for damages for breach of contract, was intended by the fathers of the common law to include such damages as the courts, "dealing practically with the practical affairs of life, can find to be certain and measurable from evidence the source of which is open to both parties, and the nature not transcendental." Other instances where the common law has not afforded a remedy in apparently meritorious cases are numerous, chief among which is the remedy for death by wrongful act, first given in England by Lord Campbell's act, and followed by statutory enactments in this country. Without a statute providing a remedy in that class of wrongs, no action could be maintained by the relatives of the deceased for compensatory or other damages. So, in cases like that at bar, the remedy should come from legislation, and not by judicial decisions out of harmony with established principles of the law. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson, 157 Ind. 64, 54 L.R.A. 846, 60 N. E. 674, 1080.

For these reasons, we conclude that plaintiff is not entitled to recover for her mental anguish. Her complaint, however, charges a breach of contract, and she would be entitled at least to nominal damages, and the court below properly overruled the demurrer.

Order affirmed.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the real major premises of the majority opinion, which concerns the distinction between actions on the contract and on the tort. According to that opinion, "the difference between actions in tort and those for breach of contract is pointed out with clearness" in Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 Minn. 252, 25 L.R.A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078. In the passage referred to Judge Mitchell said: "This action is not one of tort, but on contract; its gist and gravamen being the breach of the contract, the duties and obligations growing out of which 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) are regulated by the statute, which itself becomes a part of it. The best test of this is the fact that such an action could not be maintained without pleading and proving the contract." This amounts to defining a tort as a wrong independent of contract. The fallacy of that definition has been clearly and repeatedly demonstrated. It is elementary that the distinction between contracts and torts is not philosophical, but historical, and largely concerns the law adjective. Mr. Pollock accordingly defines a tort as "an act or omission giving rise, in virtue of the common-law jurisdiction of the court, to a civil remedy which is not an action of contract." Pollock, Torts, 4.

In point of actual number, nine tenths of the actions ex delicto heard by this court, and by most courts, involve causes of action "which could not be maintained without pleading and proving the contract." Most of them are in trespass on the case, and are brought for the violation of a contract duty or for a violation of a duty imposed by the common law or statute upon relations entered into by contract. The bulk of these are actions for negligence, arising, for example, between carriers and patrons, masters and servants. Actions of fraud in connection with a contract constitute another large group. There are also miscellaneous actions in which it is held that the action ex delicto may lie upon a state of facts of which a contract is a necessary part, although no injury to the person, nor impact upon property, nor damage consequent on fraud, is involved. This will be found especially clearly set forth in Rich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 382. It is not material whether this great branch of the law be called the law of quasi torts, as distinguished from other torts, or of impure as distinguished from pure torts. The use of the term "independent tort" in the majority opinion is, in so far as I know, peculiar to itself. It would seem a work of supererogation to cite in support of these views more than a few of the vast multitude of authorities sustaining them. The familiar principle is laid down in 1 Chitty, Pleadings, 135,—which has been approved times without number,—that, "if a common-law duty results from the facts, the party may be sued in tort for any negligence or misfeasance in the execution of the contract." In the leading case of Boorman v. Brown 3 Q. B. 511, Tindal, Ch. J., said: "That there is a large class of cases in which the foundation of the action springs out of privity of contract between the parties, but in which, nevertheless, the remedy for the breach or nonperformance is indifferently either assumpsit or case upon tort, is not disputed. Such are actions against attorneys, surgeons, and other professional men. . . . actions against common carriers, against shipbuilders on bills of lading, against bailees of different descriptions, and numerous other instances occur in which the action is brought in tort or contract, at the election of the plaintiff. . . . The principle in all these cases would seem to be that the contract creates a duty, and the neglect to perform that duty, or the nonfeasance, is a ground of action upon a tort." See also Green v. Greenbank, 2 Marsh. 485; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 Ad. & El. 963; Courtenay v. Earle, 10 C. B. 73; Legge v. Tucker, 1 Hurlst. & N. 500; Tattan v. Great Western R. Co. 2 El. & El. 844; Pontifex v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 23; Bryant v. Herbert, L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 389; Fleming v. Manchester S. & L. R. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 81; Cohen v. Foster, 66 L. T. N. S. 616. All these cases are in 2 Ames & Smith's Lead. Cases on Torts, at pages 719-742.

2. Nor am I able to agree with the minor premise of the majority opinion, that "plaintiff's complaint charges a breach of contract only," and that, therefore, the rule of damage applicable to cases of tort may not be invoked. I think that complaint charges a violation of a duty imposed by common law upon a relation which was entered into by contract, and constitutes a cause of action in form ex delicto. So far as the allegations of the particular complaint are concerned, there can be, and, as I understand, there is, no doubt that it contains all necessary allegations to set forth a cause of an action ex delicto, if such a thing may be. The present question is not the form of the complaint, but whether plaintiff has a right to sue ex delicto on the facts therein stated. It is elementary that, for breach of any duty imposed by law, the person making the contract with the carrier may sue ex contractu or ex delicto for the violation of the duty. From the great number of cases on the subject, reference is made to Orange Bank v. Brown, 3 Wend. 158; Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 619, 48 Am. Rep. 134; Wood v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 32 Wis. 398; Sheldon v. The Uncle Sam, 18 Cal. 526, 79 Am. Dec. 193. And see Boorman v. Brown, supra. It is clear that an ordinary action to recover from a common carrier damages for personal injury by its negligence "is in substance not an action of contract, but an action of tort against the company as carriers." Mr. Justice Williams in Marshall v. York, N. & B. R. Co. 11 C. B. 658. In that case, Jervis, Ch. J., said: "But upon what principle does the action lie at the suit of the servant for his personal suffering? Not by reason of any contract between him and the company, but by reason 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of a duty implied by law to carry him safely." The duty to carry safely is a part, and a part only, of the general duty imposed upon carriers by the law in the discharge of their public calling and in accordance with public arrangements. Exactly the same reasoning which entitles a proper party to sue in tort for negligent breach of the duty to carry safely either passengers or freight entitles him to so sue for failure to perform other allied duties. It is settled by reason and authority, beyond any possibility of controversy, that a carrier is bound by law to receive, for proper consideration, freight or passengers, and to carry them safely to their respective destinations, and to afford reasonable time and facilities for getting on and putting aboard, and departing from or removing from the train, respectively. When sued for any violation of that general duty, the action may be in form ex delicto or ex contractu, at the option of the plaintiff. In an action ex delicto, the allegation of the contract is mere matter of inducement. Its purpose is to show that the passenger was rightfully on the train. See New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hurst, 36 Miss. 660, 668, 74 Am. Dec. 785. The courts incline to resolve all doubts as to the form of the action in favor of the action in tort. See 2 Wood, Railways, § 296, p. 1197, and post. One essential difference resulting from the exercise of the option to sue ex delicto is that a larger measure of damages is applied to such actions than to actions ex contractu. See Murdoch v. Boston & A. R. Co. 133 Mass. 15, 43 Am. Dec. 480, and post. "To be more specific, 'the invitation to alight' cases" (See Webb's Pollock on Torts, 559; 9 Century Dig. "Carriers," §§ 1072 et seq.), the "overshooting station" cases (2 Wood, Railway Law, § 312, pp. 1353-1363), involve torts. To be still more specific, an action to recover damages for failure to stop for a passenger or to carry him to his destination and to enable him to alight there is a violation of a public duty, and gives rise to a cause of action in tort. Exemplary damages have been awarded in such cases, although no "independent tort" is shown. For failure to stop at the station for the passenger, see Heirn v. McCaughan, 32 Miss. 39, 66 Am. Dec. 588, 592; Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 12 L.R.A. 113 (and see notes), 108 N. C. 414, 12 S. E. 954, 956; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Siddons, 53 Ill. App. 607 (in which damages for mental anguish were allowed). For failure to stop at destination, and for carrying beyond, see New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hurst, supra; Alabama, G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 9, 30 Am. St. Rep. 17, 9 So. 375; Carter v. Illinois C. R. Co. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1352, 34

S. W. 907. That a passenger may recover damages in an action of tort for failure to stop a train at a given station, on allegation of a negligent wrong, as distinguished from a wilful wrong, is particularly well set forth in Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Hanes, 69 Miss. 160, 13 So. 246.

The general theory as to the form of action involved is well stated by Handy, J., in Heirn v. McCaughan, supra. The action in that case sought to recover damages for the failure of a common carrier to stop at a certain place and take passengers in accordance with its special advertisement, because, inter alia, of the requirements of the mail service. The court said, in part: "The character of the action must be determined by the nature of the grievance, rather than by the form of the declaration; but in this case they both indicate that the action is founded on the violation of a general duty, and not on a breach of a special contract. And, wherever the action, in cases of this kind, is against a common carrier, the courts are inclined to consider it as founded in tort, unless a special contract be very clearly shown by the declaration. Collyer, Partn. §§ 735, 736, 738; Ansell v. Waterhouse, 6 Maule & S. 385; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 Ad. & El. 963. It is manifest, therefore, that this action must be regarded as in the nature of an action on the case for the violation of the duty of the company arising from their engagements to the public. In such cases the carriers are bound by the rules of the common law to perform the work tendered them; and no consideration other than the general legal obligation resting upon them from the nature of their business need be shown by a party who has been injured by their acts of omission or commission, whether negligent, fraudulent, or deceitful. Story, Bailm. §§ 508, 591; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 486, 14 L. ed. 509. Their business as common carriers charges them with duties to the public, which, when violated, entitle the parties aggrieved to an action for the tort which is wholly distinct from a matter of individual contract." This subject and the measure of damages in tort and contract, respectively, is considered with especial clearness in Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 41, 11 N. W. 356, 911. The complaint sought a recovery for sickness and bodily and mental suffering of the plaintiff wife, and for mental suffering and expense and trouble on the part of the plaintiff husband, growing out of the sickness of the wife, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants in directing plaintiffs to leave a train of passenger cars before they had reached their destination. The 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

complaint charged that the defendant wholly neglected his duty in the premises. Taylor, J., said: "We see no reason for distinguishing this case from the class of cases which hold a railway company liable in tort for an injury done to a passenger while traveling on a train, caused by collision, the breaking down of a bridge, or any defect in the road or cars. All these matters are a breach of the contract to carry the passenger safely; yet the carrier is held liable in an action of tort for any injury sustained, based upon the allegation that it was incurred through the carelessness and negligence of the company. All the cases hold that the person injured . . . may proceed either upon contract, alleging the careless or negligent acts of the defendant as a breach of the contract, or he may proceed in tort, making the carelessness and negligence of the company the ground of his right of recovery; and, if he proceed for the tort, it becomes necessary on the part of the plaintiff to show that he stands in the relation of a passenger of the carrier, in order to show his right to recover damages for the negligence of the carrier in not discharging his duty in carrying him safely. Where the relation of passenger and carrier exists, the law fixes the duty of the carrier towards the passenger, and any violation of that duty is a wrong; and, if injury occurs to the passenger from such wrong, the carrier is responsible, and must make good the damage resulting therefrom. Wood v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 32 Wis. 398; Walsh v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Wis. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 376; Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 675, 17 Am. Rep. 504, and cases cited. In this case, we deem it material to determine whether the action is an action for a tort, or an action for a breach of the contract to carry the plaintiffs to their destination, because we think the rules of damages in the two actions are essentially different. We hold that the action in this case is based upon the tort of the defendant in negligently and carelessly directing the plaintiffs to leave the cars before they reached their destination." After stating the rule of damages which may be recovered in actions for a breach of contract, as set forth in the case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, and after reviewing and citing many cases, the court points out that the substance of the distinction is this: "While the rule in actions for breach of contract is that the damages recoverable are only such as the parties may reasonably be supposed to have contemplated as likely to result from such a breach, the general rule in actions for torts is that the wrongdoer is liable for all injuries resulting directly from the wrongful act, whether they could or could not have been foreseen by him." And see Alabama v. R. Co. v. Hanes, supra. The later course of opinion in Wisconsin is not material here, in view of the decisions in this state. That this court had adopted the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, in contract cases (for example, see Paine v. Sherwood, 21 Minn. 225), and the larger measure of recovery in tort cases, is clear beyond controversy. See, for example, Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. & M. O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640. It is equally certain that it has applied the tort measure of damages to cases in which a passenger was not carried to his destination, by the negligence of the company, and in which there was no independent tort committed by the master. Schumaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 46 Minn. 39, 12 L.R.A. 257, 48 N. W. 559.

3. I am unable to agree with the conclusion of the majority opinion that damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered in the present action. The gist of the previous discussion is not the academical one, as to the mere form of action, but the practical one, as to the measure of damages. Of course, the mere fact that the present action sounds in tort does not necessarily entitle plaintiff to recover damages for mental anguish. In some actions ex delicto such damages are awarded; in others they are denied. Their allowance or denial depends upon considerations peculiar to the particular action then under consideration, and not upon any general principle applying indifferently to all or most torts, except the obviously proper general disinclination to allow their assessment. The status of a dead body, it is familiar, is anomalous. It is neither a living passenger nor freight. None the less it is within the protection of the law. The carrier undertaking to ship it owes a duty for the violation of which its custodian may recover damages in an action in tort. There is no controversy as to these propositions. Whether or not the law recognizes a "kind of quasi property" in dead bodies, we need not stop to inquire. The only question here is whether that violation must be wilful or may be negligent. To my mind it follows, from the previous discussion, from principle, and from authority, that a cause of action in tort is here made out, justifying the recovery of sentimental damages, although the wrong is shown to have been merely negligent.

All pertinent analogies of the law unite in not requiring that the carrier should have done intentional wrong. Authorities as to exemplary damages seem to me out of place. No exemplary damages are here sought. Sentimental damages awarded for the violation of a custodian's right in the dead body are primarily not vindictive, but compensatory. Take two cases: Assume that in one case a dead body is injured by negligence only; there the award of compensatory damages would be the natural injury to the feelings. Assume that, in another case, the dead body has not only been negligently exposed, but has been the subject of indignity and outrage, as by the intentional deposit of filth upon it; there an enlarged measure of recovery in the nature of exemplary damages might be permitted in strict accordance with usual principles. Wilfulness is not a necessary part of the ordinary action on the case to recover damages for breach of duty by a common carrier. No reason suggests itself for making this class of cases an exception. Why should negligence be sufficient basis for an action in tort as to ordinary passengers and as to freight, and not as to a corpse? If a wreck had been caused by admitted negligence, for example, in misplacing a switch, and thereby living passengers, a corpse, and cattle were mutilated, why should not substantial damages be recoverable in each case? If in such wreck perishable fruit, or cattle killed by the accident, or a corpse, should, by virtue of negligence in subsequent unreasonable delay, become decomposed, why should not compensation be recoverable in each case? It shocks reason and the sense of propriety alike to hold that the dead body should not have the same protection as perishable fruit or dead cattle. "It would be discreditable to any system of laws not to provide some remedy in such a case." Mr. Justice Elliott in 16 Cent. L. J. 161, 163. That in other cases where there is a wrong the law has refused a remedy has no bearing on this class of cases, in which the law has expressly provided a remedy, viz., the award of sentimental damages. To permit such a remedy is not judicial legislation, but the application of admitted principles to a particular state of facts.

The discussion of the Texas doctrine as to sentimental damages is irrelevant, inasmuch as the only reason for allowing sentimental damages here is the fact that they are the only adequate damages appropriate. To permit their recovery in this case has no bearing on the ordinary cases in which other compensatory damages may be allowed. The converse of this proposition is equally true. The justice and cogency of the familiar and current objections to the award of such damages is as clear as the propriety of refusing in any wise to relax the rules which forbid their allowance. But to overrule the demurrer in this case involves neither an extension of the present law nor any modification of the principles set forth in the group of cases, of which Francis v.

Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R.A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078, is the leading one in this state.

The more nearly specific authorities appear to me to accord with this view. How complete an innovation is the requirement of wilfulness as an essential to the right to recover damages under such circumstances will appear from an examination of the authorities stated and discussed at length in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 123 Ga. 62, 51 S. E. 24, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 128. And see Medical College v. Rushing, 1 Ga. App. 468, 57 S. E. 1083. The whole reasoning of Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238, and the many cases which approve it, accord with this conclusion. To my mind that decision holds that the courts recognize and protect the right to preserve the corpse and to bury it, and that any violation of that right will give rise to an action for damages. See 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. note 1, p. 835, 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 280, 281. Lindh v. Great Northern R. Co. 99 Minn. 408, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018, 109 N. W. 823, is, as I view it, directly in point. It is true that the exposure of a dead body to rain was in that case alleged to have been negligent and also wilful. The opinion does not attempt to distinguish between negligence and wilfulness as a basis for the right to recover. The cause of action of the plaintiff was distinctly held to have been not on the contract, but in tort.

Under the circumstances here presented, it is unnecessary to consider whether some of the damages alleged in the complaint were or were not remote.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

RICHARD QUIGLEY.

Telegraph — delayed message — damages.

1. A telegraph company which fails promptly to transmit money sent by a father to secure the forwarding of the corpse of his daughter for burial is liable to him for mental pain and anguish by reason of the delay in shipment of the corpse, and for loss of time and expenditure of money thereby caused.

Same — contributory negligence — strangers.

2. A telegraph company cannot escape liability for damages for failure promptly to L.R.A.(N.S.)

to transmit money to secure the forwarding of a corpse for burial, on the theory that, had it performed its duty, a delay might have been caused by the one having charge of the corpse, or by the railroad company.

Same — delay in burial.

3. A telegraph company cannot escape liability for mental suffering because of its failure promptly to transmit a telegram to secure the forwarding of a corpse for burial on the theory that, the person being dead, mere delay in interment affords no cause of action.

Damages — loss of time — expenses.

4. Compensation for loss of time and for money expended in fruitlessly meeting trains to receive a corpse for burial may be recovered against a telegraph company whose negligence in failing to transmit a telegram was responsible therefor.

Appeal — erroneous argument — non-prejudicial error.

5. Statements by counsel in argument, of facts outside the record, will not require reversal if the admonition of the court was

Case Note. — Right to recover for mental anguish consequent upon failure of telegraph company to transmit money to prepare corpse for burial.

A search of the authorities reveals two other cases in which mental anguish as an element of damages in an action for failure to transmit money to prepare a corpse for burial is discussed, and these two cases are directly opposed in principle.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Simpson, 73 Tex. 422, 11 S. W. 385, it was held that mental anguish was a proper element of damages for breach of a contract in failing promptly to transmit money delivered to the defendant for transmission to plaintiff for the transportation of the body of the plaintiff's husband to its place of destination. This decision is in line with CUMBERLAND TELEPH. & TELEG. CO. v. QUIGLEY.

But in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McCaul, 115 Tenn. 99, 90 S. W. 856, in an action for failure to transmit money for the transportation of the body of plaintiff's son, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages for the mental anguish and grief sustained by him, if any, by the delay in receiving the money for which he wired to bring the body of his son to his home for burial, and in having to bury him from home and in a strange place; and the court said that the proper measure of damages in the case was the cost and expense of exhuming the body and its reinterment.

Upon the question of mental anguish as element of damages in action for breach of contract relative to corpse, see case note to Beaulieu v. Great Northern R. Co. ante, 564.

Upon the question of mental anguish as an element of damages for mutilation of corpse, see case note to Long v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 883.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Barren County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to transmit a telegram. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Baird & Richardson, for appellant:

A telephone company cannot be held liable for delay in delivery of a message where a "new agency" must act.

Lessing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Between 8 and 9 o'clock on the morning of Friday, July 12, 1907, Richard Quigley deposited with the agent of the appellant 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

company, the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company, at Glasgow, Kentucky, $25, to be transmitted and delivered to his daughter, Eddie Curd, in Louisville, Kentucky, for the purpose of having the body of the infant child of appellee, who had died at the home of Eddie Curd, her sister, in Louisville, Kentucky, prepared for burial, and shipped to their home in Barren county. All of the necessary charges were paid by the appellee, including the messenger fee for notifying Eddie Curd that the money had been telegraphed, and for her to call at the office of the appellant company in Louisville and get it. The money was not delivered to Eddie Curd until about noon on Saturday, and, because of its delay in transmission, appellee alleged that he was caused to lose time and expend money, and suffer great mental pain and anguish and humiliation, and he sued to recover of appellant damages therefor. This litigation resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for $200, and from the judgment predicated on that verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

The facts as alleged in the pleadings, and as gathered from the proof, are as follows: Appellee's daughter, a girl some eleven or twelve years old, while on a visit with her mother to her married sister, Eddie Curd, who lived in the city of Louisville, was taken sick and died. This was on Thursday, July 11th, about noon. Mrs. Curd telegraphed her father, who lived some 4 miles from Glasgow, notifying him of the death of his daughter, and also sent a special delivery letter to a friend living in Glasgow, with the instruction that he communicate with her father and apprise him of the fact that his daughter was dead. In both the telegram and the letter she notified her father to forward to her the money necessary to prepare the corpse for burial and shipment, as she was without funds herself. The telegram was received early Friday morning. Appellee at once went to Glasgow where, upon his arrival, he also received the special delivery letter. With the letter and the telegram he called upon the agent of appellant company in charge of its office in Glasgow, and notified him of the contents of the letter and of his purpose and desire to send the money at once to his daughter. Upon being assured that the money could and would be promptly forwarded, and that it would not take over thirty or forty minutes to complete the transaction, he paid to the agent the $25, together with all the necessary charges for telegraphing and transmitting the money, together with the messenger fee to notify his daughter that the money had been sent. This was about 9 o'clock in the morning. Appellee returned to his home, and, relying upon the assurances of the agent of appellant company that the money would be promptly transmitted to his daughter, he at once made arrangements for the necessary vehicle to meet the corpse at the 6 o'clock train in Glasgow, upon which train his daughter would have had ample time to ship the corpse had the money been promptly delivered, as he expected it to be. The corpse was not upon the train, and appellee, being at a loss to know what was the matter, or what he should do, called upon the agent of the company with whom he had the conversation that morning, and learned that the money had not yet been delivered to his daughter, but was assured that it would be delivered early Saturday morning, in time for the shipment of the corpse of his child on the morning train, which would stop at Cave City, some 3 or 4 miles away from appellee's home. Accordingly appellee went home, and again made preparation for meeting the corpse at Cave City. When the train arrived he was again disappointed, as the corpse was not on it. He then called up his daughter in Louisville, over the appellant company's line, and learned that the money had just then—about 11:30 A. M.—been paid to her. She did not have time, after receiving this money on Saturday at 11:30 A. M., to have the body prepared for shipment, secure the necessary permit, etc., to have it shipped on the 3 o'clock train, and hence was compelled to wait until Sunday morning, when the body was shipped to Cave City, arriving there at 11 o'clock Sunday, and was buried about 4 o'clock on the evening of the same day. At this time the body was badly discolored, and in an advanced state of decomposition.

Counsel for appellant offer quite a number of reasons why the judgment should be reversed. Their first complaint is that the petition was fatally defective, and that the demurrer should have been sustained thereto. In substance, it alleges that, by reason of the negligent acts of appellant in failing to transmit the money, the plaintiff was caused to suffer great mental pain and anguish by reason of the delay in the shipment of the corpse, loss of time, and expenditure of money. We are of opinion that these allegations constituted a cause of action, and, if true, appellant should be held answerable therefor.

Appellant's next complaint is that it was not liable, because of the intervention of a new agency, in the persons of Eddie Curd and the railroad company, and that it is uncertain, even though the money had been promptly delivered by appellant, whether or not Eddie Curd would have promptly, or sooner than she did, prepared the corpse for shipment, or that the railroad company, after receiving same, would have promptly shipped and delivered it to its destination in Barren county; and, therefore, under the rule announced in the cases of Taliferro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1290, 54 S. W. 825, Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880, and Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 84 Ky. 604, 2 S. W. 483, there can be no recovery. In the Taliferro Case no recovery was allowed "because," said the court, "his telegram was only an inquiry. It may be that if his telegram had been received in the confusion of the household, an answer might not have been sent, or if sent, by some miscarriage, without fault of appellee, it might never have reached appellant. Legal damages are such as directly and naturally result from the wrongful act complained of." In the Chapman Case Chapman sued for loss occasioned by not being able to attend his father before death, alleging that, had the telegram been delivered, he would have visited his father, and his father would have made him a present of a note which he held against him. The recovery in this case was denied, because the claim on which the damage was founded was entirely too remote, it being uncertain whether his father would have given him the note or not, and that there was nothing in the telegram to put the company upon notice of the purpose for which Chapman wanted to see his father before death. In the case of Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. appellant sought to recover damages because of the failure to deliver to him a message notifying him of the condition of the stock market, alleging that, had he received the message, he would have telegraphed certain instructions to his broker, and thereby saved himself several thousand dollars. Here, again, the damages were held to be too remote and speculative, and that the failure to deliver the telegram in the ordinary course of events could not be charged to have been the cause of pecuniary loss. It will be observed that in none of these cases was the company notified of the particular importance attached to the telegram, which was later made the basis of the claim for damages. But not so in the case at bar. The company knew that appellee's daughter had written to him that she was unable to ship the corpse because of the lack of funds, that it would take $25, and that it was to meet this very emergency that the money was sent. It is common knowledge that in warm weather a corpse cannot be kept long before decomposition becomes advanced. Hence appellant's agent and servants must have known that any delay on their part in the transmission of this money and the carrying out of their contract with appellee would delay the interment of his daughter, and it is but natural and human that he would suffer mental worry and anguish by having the burial of his child delayed until its body was in an advanced state of decomposition.

Appellee desired to give his daughter a decent and timely burial. With this end in view he sought the services of appellant, and appellant contracted with him to send the money necessary to enable him to have his daughter properly prepared for burial and promptly shipped. Had it carried out its contract, and delivered this money within a reasonable time, there is no question but what the body would have been promptly shipped, and the wish and desire of the father gratified. It failed, however, to carry out its contract, and scant excuse is offered in the record for its not having done so. An attempt is made to shift the responsibility for the delay in delivering the money to Eddie Curd, appellee's daughter, but the decided weight of the testimony and the circumstances surrounding the transaction are altogether in favor of the finding of the jury that the responsibility for this delay in the delivery of the money rested with appellant; hence, if by its negligence appellant added to the weight of sorrow then borne by appellee because of the loss of his child, it should be made answerable therefor; for, as said by this court in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Caldwell, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 497, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 748, 102 S. W. 840, appellant will not be permitted to escape responsibility for its acts upon the theory that what appellee's agent might have done was too remote to entitle him to compensation.

It is further insisted that, as the child was already dead, the mere delay in its shipment and interment affords no ground of complaint for appellee. To this we cannot agree. The delay in the delivery of the money and consequent shipment of the body denied to appellee the right to give his child a prompt burial; denied to him the right to look upon its features as they were in life, for, while it is true that before interment the casket was opened, it is equally true that at that time the body had become so discolored, and decomposition was so far advanced, that the father saw, instead of the features of his child, a badly discolored and decomposed corpse. If this condition was brought about by the negligence of appellant, and, in consequence thereof, appellee suffered mental anguish, humiliation, and pain, appellant company should likewise be held answerable therefor.

Appellant also complains that the court erred in instructing the jury that appellee might recover for loss of time and money expended, which were due to the negligence of appellant. The petition charged that there was a loss of time and expenditure of money in going to the trains for the purpose of meeting the corpse. If there was, and 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the delay in the shipment of the corpse was occasioned by the failure of appellant to carry out its contract promptly, then it should be held answerable therefor, and the court properly submitted this question to the jury.

Appellant also complains that the court erred in instructing the jury, but the record shows that the instructions were, if anything, more favorable to appellant than they were to appellee.

Appellant also charges that, because of misconduct on the part of counsel for appellee in addressing the jury, the case should be reversed. The language complained of is as follows: "I will tell you how you can know that the defendant did not notify Eddie Curd, and why you should believe her in preference to Clyde Harris. Eddie Curd went out and tried to mortgage her only furniture to get the money with which to buy a coffin and ship the corpse, and you know she would not have done this if she had been notified by the defendant." At the time these remarks were made counsel for appellant objected, and the court thereupon directed the jury that they must bear the evidence in mind, and, if counsel went outside of the evidence in his speech, they must disregard it. It was error for counsel to make a statement of fact which was not supported by the evidence in the case, and, upon his doing so, the trial court should have excluded it, and reprimanded him for having done so, and directed the jury to disregard the statement; but we are of opinion that the admonition of the court had this effect before an intelligent jury, and that appellant's case was not prejudiced thereby.

To the complaint that the verdict is excessive, we may say that larger verdicts have repeatedly been upheld in cases not more meritorious and under circumstances less aggravating.

On the whole case it is apparent that appellant had a fair trial, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NEBRASKA EX REL. WILLIAM T. THOMPSON, Attorney General,
v.

JOHN L. NEBLE.

SAME

v.

JOHN LATENSER.

(— Neb. —, 117 N.W. 723.)

Judiciary — appointment of commissioners.

Section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution

or the state provides: "The powers of the government of this state are divided into three distinct departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, and no person or collection of persons, being one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except as hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." The charter of cities of the metropolitan class provides that the mayor shall be the chief executive officer of the city, shall have power, by and with the consent of the city council, to appoint all officers deemed necessary for the good government of the city, unless otherwise provided in the charter, that he shall have the superintending of all officers and affairs of the city, except when otherwise provided. The charter also provides for a board of five park commissioners, whose duties are wholly executive and administrative, and who are responsible alone to the city, and whose reports and recommendations are made to the mayor and council exclusively. They perform no judicial functions or duties, have no connection with, and are in no sense responsible to, the district court or any of the judges thereof. Held, that that part of § 55 of the charter which provides for their appointment by the judges of the district court of the judicial district in which such cities shall be situated is unconstitutional and void, and that the appointing power is with the mayor and council.

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto to determine the legality of the Case Note. — May appointment of municipal officers be constitutionally delegated to courts or judges thereof?

So decided a conflict is there among the authorities on the foregoing proposition, it would be impracticable to do more than set out the cases which have considered the matter.

It is not intended to include cases involving the constitutionality of provisions delegating to a court or judge thereof power to appoint officials for the performance of a public duty which is in some way connected with the administration of justice, since as to such officials the power of appointment is clearly recognized.

The cases are about evenly balanced on the question here under consideration, those wherein the power to delegate to the judiciary the right to appoint officials of municipalities is denied reaching that conclusion upon variant theories.

Thus, in Beasley v. Ridout, 94 Md. 641, 52 Atl. 61, an act of the legislature imposing upon certain judges the duty of appointing a board of visitors of a jail was held to be unconstitutional on the ground that the duty thus sought to be imposed was not a judicial one, and that, in making these appointments, the judges were not performing a judicial function. This case is based upon the authority of prior decisions of the courts of that state to the effect that the judiciary cannot be compelled to perform services not of a judicial nature.

An act requiring the judges of a court created by the Constitution to appoint trustees of a waterworks belonging to a municipality which is a going concern was held, in State ex rel. White v. Barker, 116 Iowa, 96, 57 L.R.A. 244, 93 Am. St. Rep. 222, 89 N. W. 204, to be unconstitutional because conflicting with the constitutional provision by which the power of government was divided into three different departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial,—especially with that provision thereof, which declares that "no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any function appertaining to either of the others, except in cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." It is said that powers not in themselves judicial, and that are not to be exercised in the discharge of the functions of the judicial department, cannot be conferred on courts or judges designated by the Constitution as a part of the judicial department of the state. The case strikes the keynote, of the spirit at least, of the decisions which declare the unconstitutionality of laws attempting to impose on courts or judges thereof the power of appointment, where the office does not in some form relate to the administration of justice. The court said: "Judges of courts created by the Constitution should not be burdened with executive or administrative duties. They should as nearly as possible be freed from everything not judicial in character. Respect for the position has materially lessened whenever judges have attempted to discharge duties of an executive character. The judge should have no favors to grant, no patronage to dispose of, and no friends to reward. The spoils system should have no place in the selection of judicial officers."

Much the same reasoning was used in State ex rel. Young v. Brill, 100 Minn. 499, 111 N. W. 294, 639, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 425, in denying the right of the legislature to require judges of the district court, or a majority of them, to appoint the directors or members of the board of control of a county. The act was held unconstitutional because it attempted to impose upon the members of the judiciary powers and functions which were, by the Constitution of the state, assigned to another department of the government. In Minnesota the Constitution defining the power of a governor provides that he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint a state librarian and notaries public, and such other officers as may be provided by law.

One of the leading cases sustaining this doctrine is Re Election Supra, 114 Mass. 247, 19 Am. Rep. 341. The question there appointment of J. N. Neble and John Latenser by the judges of the district court as park commissioners. Judgment for the defendant in the first case, for the state in the second.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. T. Thompson and W. B. Rose, for relator.

Messrs. H. E. Burnam and John A. Rine for respondent Neble.

Mr. Francis A. Brogan, for respondent Latenser:

The separation of the powers of government into three distinct departments relates to the state government only, and is not applicable to municipal or other local bodies, whose governments are created and whose offices established by the legislature.

under consideration was the constitutionality of an act directing the justice of the supreme judicial court to appoint supervisors of elections. The statute was held unconstitutional, upon the ground that the power of appointing such officers could not be conferred upon a judiciary without violating the Constitution, since such an appointment did not in any way require the exercise of judicial functions. The Declaration of Rights of that state declares that, "in the government of this commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative or judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the executive or legislative powers, or either of them,—to the end it may be a government of laws, and not of men."

In State ex rel. Hadley v. Washburn, 167 Mo. 680, 90 Am. St. Rep. 430, 67 S. W. 592, 90 Am. St. Rep. 430, a constitutional declaration that "the powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments,—the legislative, executive, and judicial, each of which shall be confided to a separate magistracy; and no person, or collection of persons, charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances in this Constitution expressly directed or permitted," was construed to dispose of all the powers of the state government. An act providing for the appointment of election commissioners by one other than the executive power, was therefore held to be violative of this constitutional provision, and therefore unconstitutional, as the legislature could not appropriate to itself the power that the Constitution had conferred upon the executive, neither could it rob the executive of that power by conferring it on an outside official agency of its own appointment. There was another provision of the Constitution of that state which was that the appointment of all officers not otherwise directed by the Constitution should be made in such

The function of appointing to office does not inherently belong to the executive department, but is one which may properly and naturally, by the Constitution, or by statute not inconsistent with the Constitu-manner as may be prescribed by law. This section was construed not to confer any power of appointment upon a legislature, but simply conferred upon it the power to direct the manner of appointment.

The earlier New Jersey cases seemed also to recognize this doctrine. It was clearly declared in Re Cleveland, 51 N. J. L. 311, 17 Atl. 772; and also in Schwarz v. Dover, 68 N. J. L. 576, 53 Atl. 214.

In Ross v. Chosen Freeholders, 69 N. J. L. 291, 55 Atl. 310, however, the court of errors and appeals upheld the constitutionality of an act providing for the appointment of park commissioners by a justice of the supreme court, as against an objection based upon article 3 of the Constitution, declaring that "the powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments, the legislative, executive and judicial," and containing the prohibitive clause, "no person or persons belonging to or constituting one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others," and an excepting clause, "except as herein expressly provided." The court emphasized the fact that the force of the prohibitive clause is not to confine the legislature to powers which are legislative, the governor to powers which are executive, and the courts to powers which are judicial, but merely to forbid each department to encroach upon the powers properly belonging to another; and said that the question was whether the power of appointing to office can be said in "our" government to belong properly to the legislature, or to the governor, or to the courts, so that its exercise by any save one of these departments is prohibited. The court then proceeded to show historically that the power of appointment had been expressly distributed by the Constitution itself among all the departments of the government, and therefore did not properly belong to any one of those departments, as distinguished from the other, within the prohibitive clause already referred to. The court further said, however, that, if it had reached the conclusion that the power of appointing officers was, because of its nation, be vested in such persons or bodies as the legislature, when acting within its recognized powers, may see fit to designate.

ture, covered by the distributive or prohibitive clauses of article 3, it must nevertheless have conceded that—by force of the exception clause of that article, and of the unmistakable recognition of the authority of the lawmaking department to provide for the appointment of all officers (whose appointment is not definitely regulated by the Constitution itself) by the declaration in article 7 that "all other officers whose appointments are not otherwise provided for by law shall be nominated by the governor and appointed by him with the advice and consent of the senate" the legislature was authorized to make such different provisions for the exercise of that power as it deemed proper respecting the officers whose appointments were not otherwise provided for. It was further held that the act was not in violation of the provision of article 7 of the Constitution declaring that "the justices of the supreme court and chancellor . . . shall hold no other office under the government of this state or of the United States." The court said that it could not accept the view supported by Re Election Supra. supra, that, whenever a new duty is cast upon an officer, he receives a new office; and that, even if it should accept that view, it would be confronted with the clause already mentioned, which empowers the legislature to provide by law for the appointment of officers, and, reading the two clauses together there was no clear implication that the discretion confided to the legislature without express limitation was so restricted that it might not vest in the justices of the supreme court or the chancellor the appointment of officers unconnected with their judicial functions. The court added that the contrary view expressed in Re Cleveland, supra, was obiter, and that Schwarz v. Dover, supra, was largely influenced by the dicta in the earlier case.

This case was followed as authority in New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Sussex County Bd. of Equalization, 70 N. J. L. 186, 56 Atl. 138, wherein the constitutionality of an act providing for the appointment of tax equalization commissioners by the judge of the court of common pleas was sustained.

The case of Schwarz v. Dover was also again presented to the court in 70 N. J. L. 502, 57 Atl. 394, and, on the authority of the Ross Case, the former decision was held to have been overruled; and the Ross Case was followed as authority.

In Fox v. McDonald, 101 Ala. 51, 21 L.R.A. 529, 46 Am. St. Rep. 98, 13 So. 416, the Alabama supreme court, upon reasoning quite similar to that employed by the New Jersey court in the Ross Case, upheld a law providing for the appointment of police commissioners for a city by a probate judge of the county, against an objection based upon a provision of the Constitution that the powers of the government "shall be divided into three distinct departments, each of which shall be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: Those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive, to another; and those which are judicial, to another. § 2. No person or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." The court said, in effect, that the question whether a particular function of government pertains to one of the departments so as to forbid its exercise by either of the others is not necessarily determined by ascertaining whether that function partakes of a legislative, executive, or judicial nature, but must be determined in view of history and experience; and that by this test the power to appoint to office, or to fill vacancies, is not so inherently an executive function as to prevent the legislature from conferring the power to exercise it upon the judiciary.

The constitutionality of an act making it the duty of the judge of a superior court of the county to appoint freeholders to constitute a board of registration and election managers for a city in the county was upheld in Russell v. Cooley, 69 Ga. 215, as against an objection based on a constitutional provision that "the legislative, jujudicial, and executive powers shall forever remain separate and distinct, and no person discharging the duties of one shall, at the same time, exercise the functions of either of the others, except as herein provided." In reply to the objection that the appointment of the board of registration was not a judicial function, the court said that it was held in Beall v. Beall, 8 Ga. 211, that, whilst, the Constitution declares that the three powers of the government shall be distinct, still the separation is not, and from the nature of things cannot be, total; and the court, in the Russell Case, concludes that it could see no unconstitutionality in the act under the ruling in the Beall Case, and according to the uniform practice of the state government in each of its departments from Colonial times to the "present."

Reese, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two actions arise out of the following facts:

In Staude v. Election Comrs. 61 Cal. 313, the court, without regard to its own views as to the correctness or incorrectness of the doctrine, upheld the constitutionality of a statute imposing upon district judges the duty of appointing police commissioners for a city, as against an objection based on the constitutional provision that "the powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments,—the legislative, the executive, and judicial,—and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the charter of cities of the metropolitan class (chap. 12a, Comp. Stat. 1907) the authority is conferred upon the mayor of such cities, "by and with the consent of a majority of the entire council, to appoint all officers that may be deemed necessary for the good government of the city, unless otherwise provided for in this act," etc. § 26. By § 54 it is provided that in each city of the class named there shall be a board of park commissioners, who shall have charge of the parks and public grounds of the city, with power to establish rules for the management, care, and use of public parks, park ways, and boulevards, and, from time to time, devise, suggest, and recommend to the mayor and council a system of public parks, park ways, and boulevards or additions thereto within the city, or within 3 miles of the limits thereof, and to designate the lands, lots, or grounds necessary to be used, purchased, or appropriated for such purpose. Section 55 is as follows: "Said board of park commissioners shall be composed of five members, who shall be resident freeholders of such city, and who shall be appointed by the judges of the district court of the judicial district, in which such city shall be situated. It shall be the duty of said judges, a majority concurring, to appoint or reappoint one of said board the cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted;—upon the authority of previous decisions holding that the constitutional provision in question meant that the powers of the state government, not the local governments thereafter to be created by the legislature, shall be divided into three departments, and that the members of one department shall have no part or lot in the management of the affairs of either of the other departments.

The Illinois cases are along the same line. Indeed, it may be fairly said of the decisions of that court on this question that the legislature is not regarded as a co-ordinate branch of the government, but rather as a superior branch of the government; and that it has the inherent power, where not expressly limited by the Constitution, to impose upon the judicial branch of the government the duty of exercising nonjudicial functions, as the appointment of park commissioners of a municipality. People ex rel. Dunham v. Morgan, 90 Ill. 558. It is held in that case that imposing upon the judicial department of the government the duty of making appointments of officials for political and nonjudicial offices is within the power of the legislature, and does not come within the limitation which arises by the establishment of the other departments of the government, and the constitutional provisions relating thereto, which prohibits any of said departments from exercising the powers conferred upon the other.

each year on the second Tuesday of May, and to fill for the unexpired term any vacancies existing in the board. A majority of all the members of the board of park commissioners shall constitute a quorum." This section was enacted in 1889, and, in accordance with its provisions, the judges of the district court appointed the park commissioners and continued to do so until the decision of this court of the case of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Moores (State ex rel. Smyth v. Moores) 55 Neb. 480, 41 L.R.A. 624, 76 N. W. 175, which occurred June 23, 1898, and by which it was held that the law authorizing the governor to appoint the members of the board of fire and police commissioners was unconstitutional and void. The judges then declined to make further appointments, as it would naturally follow that the same rule would have to be applied in the matter of the appointment of park commissioners. On December 4, 1901, the case of Redell v. Moores, 63 Neb. 219, 55 L.R.A. 740, 93 Am. St. Rep. 431, 88 N. W. 243, was decided, and by which the conclusion reached in the former case was not sustained, and the holding was set aside and the decision overruled. For reasons which were, no doubt, well founded, the judges made no further appointments until May, 1908, when they made the appointment of defendant Latenser as required by the section above copied. In November, 1898, the city council of Omaha passed ordinance No. 4530, which authorized the mayor to appoint the park commissioners by and with the consent and approval of the council, and the membership of said commission has been supplied by his appointments until the present time, the defendant Neble being one of the mayor's appointees. These actions are brought in the name of the state upon the relation of the attorney general for the purpose of procuring an adjudication of the question as to who has the power of appointment under the Constitution and law of this state.

It is the contention of counsel for defendant Neble that that part of § 55, above quoted, which authorizes the judges of the district court to appoint the park commissioners, is unconstitutional and void as violative of § 1 of article 2 of the Constitution of this state, for the reason that it imposes the duty of appointment upon the judicial department of the state, while the duty of appointment calls into action an executive or administrative function which can, under the Constitution, be exercised only by executive or administrative officers. It is the contention of counsel for defendant Latenser that the provision objected to is

To the same effect is People ex rel. Grinnell v. Hoffman, 116 Ill. 587, 56 Am. Rep. 793, 5 N. E. 590, 8 N. E. 788, as to the power of the legislature to delegate to the judiciary power to appoint election commissioners of a municipality.

Dicta to the same effect may be found in Re Terrett, 34 Mont. 325, 86 Pac. 266.

In Seattle v. Seattle & M. R. Co. 50 Wash. 132, 96 Pac. 958, the validity of a law was sustained which provided that the superior court should pass upon special assessments for local improvements, and appoint commissioners.

To the same effect, also, is Re Westlake Ave. 40 Wash. 144, 82 Pac. 279.

In the following cases the power of the legislature to impose the duty upon the judiciary to make appointments was considered, but was not directly passed upon, as it was held that the appointments in question related to, or grew out of, the exercise by the judiciary of its judicial functions. The cases are therefore within the classes of cases that are excluded; but, as they are border-line cases and illustrate the distinction, it will not be unprofitable to refer to them:

In Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Greenburgh, 173 N. Y. 215, 65 N. E. 978, the delegation to the judiciary of the power to appoint commissioners of highways was held not to be unconstitutional because it conferred nonjudicial power upon the supreme court, as the power of appointment was in relation to the construction of highways by a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.), petition to that court, and after a hearing was had thereon as to the necessity of the highway; and the appointment of the commissioners was therefore the exercise of a judicial function,—that is, a carrying out of the orders of the court. The language used in this case would indicate that, if the power of appointment had related to a non-judicial function, it would have been declared invalid.

On the same theory, in Cahill v. Perrine, 105 Ky. 531, 49 S. W. 344, 50 S. W. 19, the validity of an act which provided for the appointment by the circuit judge of any county, under certain circumstances, of guards to protect property against mobs, was sustained on the ground that the appointment of such guards by the judge was the exercise of a judicial power, as the judge was a conservator of the peace throughout the commonwealth.

And in Foster v. Rowe, 128 Wis. 326, 107 N. W. 635, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 595, the constitutionality of an act authorizing the circuit judge of each circuit to appoint boards of equalization was sustained upon the theory that such appointment was the exercise of a power quasi judicial.

On the same theory, in Madison County v. Moore, 161 Ind. 426, 68 N. E. 905, the constitutionality of the law requiring justices of the peace, upon finding a person to be insane, to appoint a resident of the county to take charge of such insane person, was sustained.

valid for the reasons, first, that the section of the Constitution can refer only to the departments of the state government, and has no reference or application to the government of municipalities and the subordinate departments of local government; and, second, that, if the Constitution were to be so applied, the appointment by the judges would still be valid, as the mere act of appointment is neither an executive, administrative, or judicial act, nor in any degree subject to the usual classification of those functions. The two cases have been consolidated here, and are to be disposed of as one, each involving identically the same question, and are submitted on oral argument and exhaustive printed briefs. We may say at the outset that the principle of local self-government has not been invoked or discussed by counsel in this case, and the only question presented for our determination is the one first above stated.

In the investigation of this question we are confronted with the unusual and anomalous condition of meeting with many apparently well-considered cases sustaining every contention of either side, and it will be absolutely impossible for us to follow any line of decisions which will not be antagonized by holdings in many other cases, for there is a sharp conflict of authority upon every conceivable feature and phase of the case. It could serve no good purpose for us to discuss and attempt to harmonize the views of Montesquieu, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Stevens, Wilson, Goodnow, and others upon the question here involved, for the reasons that it would be impossible to bring harmony out of the chaos produced by their divergent opinions, and that such discussion would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length, ending where we begin, and for the further reason that the time at our disposal is not adequate to the task. We will, therefore, be content with a brief reference to some of the later decisions, and an effort to arrive at the spirit and meaning of our own Constitution as interpreted by the courts, the legislature, and the judicial and administrative history of the state. The provision of the Constitution that "the powers of the government of this state are divided into three distinct departments, the legislative, executive and judicial, and no person or collection of persons, being one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except as hereinafter expressly directed or permitted," is not a new one in the Constitutions of this country. It has been handed down from the best thinkers and greatest statesmen of the nation to nearly all state Constitutions in one form or another, and, even where not adopted in terms, it has 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been almost uniformly recognized as a part of our governmental system (State ex rel. Young v. Brill, 100 Minn. 499, 111 N. W. 294, 639, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 425), but has never been strictly applied, and, indeed, could not be, to all the ramifications of state or national government. The duties of the officers of the several departments have, to some extent at least, overlapped and interlaced until it is hard to say in some cases where the one leaves off and the other begins. Many times the courts have defined certain duties of the executive or administrative officers as "quasi judicial," and recognized and confirmed the validity of the acts of such officers. While this definition has been approved and sanctioned by all, yet the fact remains that the function of the act itself is either administrative or judicial, and there can in reality be no middle or halfway ground between them. This being true, we are brought to the conclusion that many executive or administrative acts performed by judicial officers, and many judicial acts performed by ministerial officers, are and must be held valid, notwithstanding the section of the Constitution above quoted. Thus, it often becomes necessary to the full and proper discharge of the duties imposed upon an official belonging to one class to perform an act the function of which, strictly speaking, belongs to another.

The performance of such duties being, to some degree at least, essential to the full discharge of the duties imposed and properly within the power of the actor, the power conferred must be held to be valid; otherwise a condition of chaos would arise. We therefore conclude, as all have done, that the Constitution must receive a liberal and general, rather than a strict, construction and application, and that every case must stand or fall relying upon its own merits. In theory the Constitution is accepted as stating the one inflexible and unbending rule; yet in practice it is found impossible to obey its every mandate. It is unnecessary to cite the statutory provisions conferring this "quasi" authority, which is, strictly speaking, an evasion of the rule, and which are sustained, for the statutes of all the states, as well as of the general government, are full of them. An apt illustration of this may be found in the office of the state superintendent of public instruction. By § 1 of article 5 of the Constitution it is declared that "the executive department shall consist of a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, auditor of public accounts, treasurer, superintendent of public instruction, attorney general, and commissioner of public lands and buildings,"—thus clearly classing the superintendent of public instruction with the officers of the executive department. Yet it is within common knowledge that he is clothed not only with executive, but judicial, and to some extent with legislative, powers, the judicial to perhaps as full extent as the executive. His decisions (judicial) upon all subjects determinable by him within his department are binding upon county superintendents, teachers, and school boards, unless reversed or overruled by a court having the required jurisdiction. Many other executive officers possess these same judicial powers, but in a less degree perhaps, among which might be mentioned the auditor of public accounts, sheriffs, coroners, county superintendents, and the various state, county, and other boards. The conferring and exercising of the powers prescribed are seldom, if ever, questioned, and are recognized as legal. Were such not the case, it would be practically impossible to execute and enforce the laws applicable to the various departments. If there is a limitation upon the authority of the legislature to confer these powers, it must be found in the well-known rule that an authority conferred carries with it all other powers necessary to the discharge of the general duty imposed, and that the power is limited to that extent. In other words, that the conferring of judicial powers upon an executive or administrative officer can extend to such acts as may be necessary to enable the proper discharge of the duty, or to set in motion such other agencies as may be necessary to the complete discharge of the duty required to be performed. The appointment of an officer might properly, we think, be classed as the exercise of an executive or administrative function, at least not judicial. Yet courts and judges frequently find it necessary to make such appointments in order that the judicial functions of the courts may be freely exercised. It often happens that courts or judges are clothed with this appointing power where the appointee may not be required to discharge any duty which could be in any way ancillary to the exercise of the judicial functions of the court or judge making the appointment, and yet the validity of the appointment could not be successfully questioned, for the reason that the person appointed would exercise judicial functions in the discharge of the duties imposed under the appointment. We think, however, that we may safely say that the appointment of park commissioners for cities of the metropolitan class is not the exercise of a judicial function. It may not belong to either class; but it is clearly not judicial. We think, also, that the duties imposed upon the park commissioners cannot be said to call for the exercise of judicial functions. Section 54, chap. 14, p. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

§ 92, Sess. Laws 1905, provides that such commissioners "shall have charge of all the parks and public grounds belonging to the city, with power to establish rules for the management, care, and use of public parks, park ways and boulevards; and it shall be the duty of said board from time to time to devise, suggest, and recommend to the mayor and council a system of public parks, park ways and boulevards or additions thereto within the city, or within 3 miles of the limits thereof, and to designate the lands, lots, or grounds necessary to be used, purchased, or appropriated for such purpose." By § 56 it is further declared that they shall "lay out, improve, and beautify all lands, lots, or grounds now owned, or hereafter acquired, for parks, park ways, or boulevards. They may employ a secretary and such landscape gardeners, superintendents, engineers, keepers, assistants, or laborers, as may be necessary for the proper care and maintenance of such parks, park ways or boulevards, or the improvement or beautifying thereof, to the extent that funds may be provided for such purpose." These duties are in the main, if not exclusively, administrative. We find nothing in the act conferring any power or jurisdiction over the board by the judges, whether advisory or otherwise; nor is the board required to report to them upon any part or in any particular as to any action proposed or performed by it. In so far as advice, recommendations, suggestions, or consultations go, they are with the mayor and council exclusively.

The question then arises: Is it competent for the legislature under the limitations of the Constitution, to confer the power of appointment alone upon the judges of the district court of the judicial district in which cities of the class named are located, some of whom reside within the city and some who do not? It is contended by counsel representing the appointee of the judges that the appointment by them is not the exercise of a judicial function; that no action is taken or to be taken as a court, but that a majority of the persons who are holding the officers join together in selecting the commissioners. There is nothing requiring any court record of the appointment to be made, and we think, if it be said that the term "judges" is nothing more than a description or method of designation of the persons who are to discharge that duty, it might occur that a majority or possibly all the persons designated might be not only nonresidents of the city, but of the county in which the city is situated; and a serious question might then arise as to the power of the legislature to transfer the government of the city in whole or in part to non-resident private citizens, if they are to be so treated, having no interest whatever in the care or management of city affairs. The adoption of the view that the judges would not act as judges by virtue of their several offices would lead us into devious paths from which it would be hard to find a way of escape. The mayor of a city of the class named is usually considered as the chief executive officer of such city, and the administration of the municipal affairs thereof is committed to him and the city council. The park commissioners become a part of this administrative force, and they are responsible to the city alone. As we have said, the duties to be discharged by them are in no sense judicial, and do not call into action any judicial function. They do not render any service which would assist the judges in the discharge of any judicial duties imposed upon them by law. They are clearly executive or administrative officers, owing no duty whatever to the judges from whom they receive their appointment. The naked power of appointment is the sole duty devolving upon the judges in connection with the commissioners, or the offices which they fill.

As we view the case, the first question demanding our attention is: "Is this power of appointment under these circumstances the exercise of a judicial function?" From the examination of the cases cited and others to which we have had access, we are led to the belief that it is not, but that it is executive or administrative in its essence. In the investigation of this question, as in all others arising in this case, we encounter a sharp conflict in the authorities, although it is claimed by some writers that the weight of authority is in favor of the negative of the proposition. In State ex rel. Young v. Brill, 100 Minn. 499, 111 N. W. 294, 639, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 425, it is said: "Although there are some decisions to the contrary, it is generally conceded that the power to appoint to a public office is in its nature an executive function." In State ex rel. Hadley v. Washburn, 167 Mo. 680, 90 Am. St. Rep. 430, 67 S. W. 592, it is said: "To provide by law the manner in which an appointment shall be made is one thing, to make the appointment is another. The one is in its nature legislative; the other is essentially executive. . . . The act of filling a public office by appointment is essentially an administrative or executive act, and, under the Constitution, can be exercised only by an officer charged with the duty of executing the laws." In Re Election Suprs. 114 Mass. 247, 19 Am. Rep. 341, the statute provided that "whenever, prior to an election, five legal voters of any ward of a city shall make known in writing to a justice of the supreme judicial court, in term time or vacation, their desire to have such election guarded and scrutinized, it shall be the duty of such justice, . . . to appoint two legal voters of such ward, who shall be of different political parties, and shall be known and designated as supervisors of election," etc. A petition was duly presented to Chief Justice Gray, asking that the appointments be made for a certain ward in the city of Boston. Instead of taking action upon the petition, the chief justice gave notice of a hearing and assembled four of the seven members of the court, when the subject was presented by able counsel. The result of the hearing was a unanimous opinion that the law imposing the duty of appointment upon the judges was unconstitutional and void. In the opinion it is said: "These supervisors, although intrusted with a certain discretion in the performance of their duties, are strictly executive officers. They make no report or return to the court or to any judge thereof. Their duties relate to no judicial suit or proceeding, but solely to the exercise by the citizens of political rights and privileges. We are unanimously of opinion that the power of appointing such officers cannot be conferred upon the justice of this court without violating the Constitution of the commonwealth. We cannot exercise this power as judges, because it is not a judicial function; nor as commissioners, because the Constitution does not allow us to hold any such office." The petition was denied. In Mechem on Public Officers, § 104, it is said: "So it is said that appointments to office, whether made by judicial, legislative, or executive officers or bodies, are in their nature intrinsically executive acts."

This being true, we next inquire whether, under the Constitution, it is competent for the legislature to impose the burden of appointing executive officers upon judicial officers. Our attention has been called to a number of cases which are thought to be in point upon the question, and which we will briefly notice. It is insisted by counsel for the mayor's appointee that the case of Tyson v. Washington County, 78 Neb. 211, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, 110 N. W. 634, is directly in point as sustaining the contention that the provision requiring the judges to make the appointment is violative of the Constitution. We cannot see that such is the case, as the question there was whether the district court could take jurisdiction of and entertain an appeal from the action of the county board in directing the construction of a drainage ditch. It was held that, as the order of the board was purely administrative in its character, the power to review their action could not be conferred upon the courts. While the logic and argument of the writer of the opinion seem to sustain the contention, yet the case itself is not similar to this, nor are the principles to be applied applicable to the question here. State ex rel. White v. Barker, 116 Iowa, 96, 57 L.R.A. 244, 93 Am. St. Rep. 222, 89 N. W. 204, is more clearly in line with the case, but in that case the act under consideration required the appointment of waterworks trustees by the district court, instead of the judges thereof. The holding was that such power could not be conferred upon the courts. The logic of the case is in support of the contention here that the power cannot be conferred upon officers of the judicial department of the government. But, in view of the contention of the state, the case is to some extent dissimilar. In State ex rel. Young v. Brill, supra, the legislature of Minnesota passed an act requiring the judges of the district court, or a majority of them, to appoint the members of the board of control of the county of Ramsey. After making a number of successive appointments, the judges became convinced that the act imposing the duty upon them was unconstitutional, and refused to make other appointments. The attorney general sought a writ of mandamus from the supreme court to compel action. The writ was denied; the court holding, after an exhaustive examination, that the part of the act which required the judges to make the appointment was unconstitutional and void because it assumed to impose upon the members of the judiciary powers and functions which, by the Constitution, were assigned to another department of the government.

The Constitution of the state of Ohio contains no provision similar to that contained in the Constitution of this state, dividing the powers of government into three distinct departments, and prohibiting persons of one of the departments from exercising the powers properly belonging to either of the others. The case of Fairview v. Giffey, 73 Ohio St. 183, 76 N. E. 865, was where an act authorizing the court of common pleas to detach unplatted farm lands from the corporate limits of cities or villages was called in question as being unconstitutional, for the reason that it imposed legislative power upon the judiciary. The court held that, as the powers were not divided and distributed by the Constitution, it was left for the legislature to do so, and, for that and other reasons, the act was held valid. We cannot see that that case is to be considered as authority in this one. It was also held that the act called into action no other than judicial functions and powers. The case of People ex rel. Dunham v. Morgan, 90 Ill. 558, is in many respects similar to the one under consideration, and in which an act authorized the judge of the circuit court to appoint the South park commissioners was held valid. This is perhaps one of the leading cases in support of the constitutionality of the law, and yet it is based to a considerable extent upon the legislative and judicial history of the state on the subject of appointments of subordinate officers or agencies. It is cited and followed, generally with approval, but with some limitations, in Cornell v. People, 107 Ill. 373; People ex rel. Grinnell v. Hoffman, 116 Ill. 587, 56 Am. Rep. 793, 5 N. E. 596, 8 N. E. 788; Wilson v. Genseal, 113 Ill. 403, 1 N. E. 905; People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L.R.A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315, 40 N. E. 454; People ex rel. Henderson v. Onahan, 170 Ill. 449, 48 N. E. 1003; People ex rel. Akin v. Kipley, 171 Ill. 44, 41 L.R.A. 775, 49 N. E. 229; People ex rel. Neil v. Knopf, 171 Ill. 191, 49 N. E. 424; People ex rel. Mooney v. Hutchinson, 172 Ill. 486, 40 L.R.A. 770, 50 N. E. 599; People ex rel. Akin v. Loeffler, 175 Ill. 585, 51 N. E. 785; Lasher v. People, 183 Ill. 226, 47 L.R.A. 802, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103, 55 N. E. 663; People ex rel. Kelly v. Raymond, 186 Ill. 407, 57 N. E. 1066; Morrison v. People, 196 Ill. 454, 63 N. E. 989; Sherman v. People, 210 Ill. 552, 71 N. E. 618; People ex rel. Stead v. Edgar County, 223 Ill. 187, 79 N. E. 123; Aurora v. Schoeberlein, 230 Ill. 496, 82 N. E. 860. We therefore conclude that the question is finally settled in that state. But it will also appear from an examination of these cases that the particular question involved in this was not considered in all the cases as a very material inquiry. Thus, in Cornell v. People, supra, it is shown that the charter conferring the power of appointment upon the judge of the circuit court was submitted to the people of the municipality at an election and adopted by them. The court says: "By the vote adopting the provisions of the act, the people of the park district gave their assent that the first board of corporate authorities should be appointed by the governor of the state, and that their successors should thereafter, as often as a vacancy occurred, be appointed by the judge of the circuit court of Cook county. This was the mode provided by the act. To this the people of the district gave their assent, and upon no other terms or conditions did they agree to assume the burden of taxation which the corporate authorities under the act had the power to impose. It may be that the governor is quite as competent to select honest and capable commissioners as the circuit judge of Cook county; but that does not affect the question. Had the people of the district seen proper to reject the act when it was submitted for their adoption or rejection, paid all dues, interest, and premiums up to and including those for the month of April, 1907, that being the date of liquidation stated in the petition; and, secondly, in cases called "class No. 2," where the borrowing shareholders, prior to such date of liquidation, had defaulted in the payment of said dues, interest, and premiums, so that, by the conditions of their mortgages and under the by-laws of the association, the principal sum of said mortgages had become due and payable. The petition further set out the facts of three concrete cases, one falling under class No. 1 and two falling under class No. 2, with respect to which latter cases the petition states that, "under the terms of said bonds and mortgages, the association has exercised its option of declaring the full principal sums of the said mortgages as due and payable." By a stipulation all of the facts stated in the petition are admitted to be true, which includes the date of liquidation. There is, furthermore, a general statement that a large part of the assets of the association consists of mortgages that fall within one or the other of the two classes, and the brief of counsel for the appellants contains the unchallenged statement that mortgages aggregating $125,000 fall within class No. 2, and that as to these mortgages the item of premium alone amount to $45,000. But whether the concrete facts respecting these mortgages are identical with those of the two specified cases set forth in the petition we are not informed, nor are the shareholding mortgagors other than those in the two specified cases brought into court as parties defendant.

It is evident, therefore, that, apart from the two specified cases, the direction sought by the petition was of a general character; and it is equally evident that what the petition sought to ascertain was whether the rule laid down in the court of chancery in the case of Weir v. Granite State Provident Asso. 56 N. J. Eq. 234, 38 Atl. 643, and approved by this court in Harris v. Nevins, 68 N. J. Eq. 684, 63 Atl. 172, was applicable to class No. 1, where liquidation other than by insolvency was being enforced, but chiefly whether this rule, if applicable to class No. 1, was also to be applied to class No. 2.

The first of these questions, which was answered by the court below to the effect that class No. 1 came within the rule laid down by Harris v. Nevins, is not now before us; the appellants having expressly abandoned their appeal as to that part of the order. Mortgages coming within this class are therefore to be allowed credits in conformity with the rule laid down by the cases that have been cited.

Upon the second question, which was the chief one, and is the only one before us on this appeal, the learned vice chancellor reached the conclusion that the rule applicable to class No. 1 should also be applied to class No. 2—that is, mortgages that by the nonpayment of dues, interest, and premiums had, before the date of liquidation, become due and payable according to the conditions of the said mortgages and the by-laws of the association; and the conclusion thus reached is embodied in the order appealed from, which, in its direction, makes no distinction between the two classes of mortgage debts. In reaching this conclusion we think that the learned vice chancellor fell into error, and that his error consists in his failure to observe that the two classes of mortgages were clearly to be distinguished upon the essential features that constituted the basis of the equitable rule laid down in Weir v. Granite State Provident Asso. and Harris v. Nevins. The equitable considerations that gave rise to the rule laid down in these cases were, as stated by Vice Chancellor Reed in the earlier decision, that the premiums had been paid by the borrowing shareholder in consideration of the complete execution of a contract that permitted him to pay his debts by the application of his matured shares, and, when the premature termination of the existence of the company prevented the borrower from thus liquidating his debt, the contract in consideration of which he had paid his premiums had failed. The gist of this equity of the borrowing shareholder, therefore, was that his debt had become not only prematurely collectable in invitum and by the effect of insolvency, but that it had thus become collectible in a way and at a time entirely different from that for which he had paid the consideration represented by his premiums. The contractual relations of the parties, as evidenced by their mortgages and by the by-laws of the association, affording no legal rule applicable to this juncture, recourse to some equitable mode of adjustment was manifestly proper, and the rule laid down in the two cases cited was the result. But in the case of a borrowing shareholder, whose debt has become due, not in invitum by the effect of insolvency, but according to its own terms and solely by the act of the borrower himself, there is nothing to call for the application of any rule other than that provided by the contract of the parties for, just such a contingency. In such cases the fact that enforced liquidation or insolvency supervened after the borrower's debt had, by its own terms and by his default, become due, no more gives him a standing in equity than would the breakdown of a train before reaching its destination create a legal right in a passenger who had voluntarily left the train before the breakdown occurred. The two classes of cases are therefore distinguishable upon the precise feature that invokes the equitable rule in class No. 1, while relegating class No. 2 to the terms of its legal contracts. As to mortgage debts, therefore, that were thus due by the default of the debtor and collectable by the association while it was a going concern, the appellants, as receivers, stand in precisely the same situation as the directors of the association stood when the debts fell due. As to such cases no equitable rule is to be applied, for the simple reason that the mere breach of a legal contract, nothing more appearing, gives rise to no equitable considerations of any sort. If circumstances other than those stated in the petition before us should call for equitable treatment, such cases must be dealt with as they arise, and upon their own peculiar facts, and when the parties in interest are before the court. Upon the only question now before us the receiver should be directed to proceed to the collection of all mortgage debts that were due from borrowers prior to the date of liquidation, precisely as if enforced liquidation or proceedings in insolvency had not supervened. Specific direction in such cases is not within the purview or prayer of the petition, and is not presented by this appeal. If foreclosure proceedings are defended, or if a mortgagor files his bill to redeem, as was done in the Weir Case, the facts constituting such defense or such suit to redeem may be dealt with as they arise; for, as was observed by Vice Chancellor Reed in the Weir Case, the right to foreclose and the right to redeem are so far reciprocal that questions material to the ascertainment of the debt due on the mortgage may be as well settled in one form of action as in the other.

The order of the Court of Chancery should therefore be reversed, to the end that it may be modified, so as to apply in its present form only to mortgages that had not, while the association was a going concern, become due and payable by the mortgagor's default in the payment of dues, interest, and premiums. As to mortgages that had thus become due by the default of the shareholder as aforesaid, the receivers should be directed that, in collecting or computing the amounts of such mortgages, they should proceed in like manner as the directors of the association might have done, if enforced liquidation or insolvency had not supervened.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

LILLIE JACKSON et al., Appts.,
v.

JOHN BAIRD et al.

(148 N. C. 29, 61 S. E. 632.)

Joint tenant — purchase at foreclosure.

One heir of a mortgagor may secure title through the foreclosure sale to the exclusion of his coheirs.

Case Note. — Right of one cotenant to purchase the property in his own right at a sale under an encumbrance created by one through whom the cotenants derive title.

There are undoubtedly many exceptions to be found in the books to the general rule that the purchase by one cotenant of an outstanding title to, or encumbrance upon, common property, inures to the benefit of all the owners. An extensive search, however, has failed to disclose any other case in which it was held that such general rule would not apply, merely because the encumbrance so purchased was created by a former owner of the property, through whom all the tenants claim title. There are, however, as will be seen hereafter, some cases in which a purchase of such an encumbrance by one cotenant was held not to inure to the benefit of all, but the decision in those cases was not based upon the fact that the encumbrance was created by a common predecessor in title, but was upon altogether different grounds, which would be equally applicable to the purchase by a cotenant of outstanding titles and encumbrances other than those created by one through whom they derived their title. The authorities, however, seem to be unanimous against the conclusion reached in JACKSON v. BAIRD, that the fact that the encumbrance was created by a former owner, through whom all the parties claim title, will, of itself alone, make an exception to the general rule.

Thus, it was specifically held in McPheeters v. Wright, 124 Ind. 560, 9 L.R.A. 176, 24 N. E. 734, that title could not be acquired by the owner of an undivided interest in land against his cotenant, at a sale under an encumbrance created by a former owner through whom both parties derived title.

And in Tisdale v. Tisdale, 2 Sneed, 590, 64 Am. Dec. 775, it was specifically held that, where an estate in lands which had descended to several heirs as tenants in common was sold to foreclose a mortgage given by the ancestor, and was purchased by one of the cotenants, the latter would be compelled in equity to account to the others as an express trustee, unless it appeared that they had in some manner waived or surrendered their rights. The

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in defendants' favor in an action brought to establish an interest in certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank Carter, H. C. Chodester, and R. V. Wolfe for appellants.

Mr. T. B. Womack for appellees.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is admitted that Robert Baird was the owner of the land in controversy, and that he executed a deed in trust to secure $150 to S. H. Reid, trustee. After Robert Baird's death the land was sold by the trustee, who conveyed it to Mrs. Julia D. Shuford for a consideration of $286 by deed dated May 26, 1898. George Shuford and his wife, the aforesaid Julia, conveyed the land to defendant Laura Baird, wife of defendant John Baird, by deed dated May 28, 1898. The trustee's deed to Mrs. Shuford, although dated May 26th, recites that the sale took place on May 28th. It appears that Laura Baird joined in the execution of the note and deed in trust along with Robert Baird. The plaintiffs allege that the debt was contracted for John Baird's benefit. The defendants deny this, and aver that John Baird signed as surety for his father, Robert Baird. The evidence offered upon this point is very meager and tends to prove that the money borrowed was used in building a house upon the tract of land in controversy, which belonged to Robert Baird.

This case was presented to this court up-court said that nothing was better settled in equity jurisprudence than that a cotenant, under such circumstances, could not take to himself individually the benefits of his purchase to the exclusion of his cotenants.

And in Ladd v. Kuhn, 27 Ind. App. 535, 61 N. E. 747, the court said that the general rule, though subject to many exceptions, was that one tenant in common could not, by purchasing an outstanding lien, acquire a title which would evict his cotenant; and that the rule obtained "in all its force" where the encumbrance was created by a former owner through whom both parties claimed title.

And in Oliver v. Hedderly, 32 Minn. 455, 21 N. W. 478, the court said that cotenancy created by descent from a common ancestor did not come within any recognized exception to the general rule that the relation was confidential in its nature, imposing an obligation upon each cotenant not to assail the common interest; that that obligation disabled each cotenant to buy in and secure to his own exclusive benefit, without the consent of the others. any outstanding encumbrance created by the ancestor through whom all derived title; and that, if a cotenant bought in such encumbrance, the others were entitled to share in the benefit of the purchase, unless they in some manner renounced or unreasonably neglected to assert their right in that respect.

So, in Moy v. Moy, 89 Iowa, 511, 56 N. W. 688, it was held that, upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon property held in common, even where the mortgage was executed by a former owner, one cotenant could not, by purchasing the property and acquiring a sheriff's deed under the foreclosure sale, claim absolute title to the exclusion of his cotenants, though he would have his interest therein increased to the extent of the amount necessary for the cotenant to redeem his undivided share.

in the equity of redemption in real estate purchased the interest of the mortgagee, together with all rights which the latter had acquired under foreclosure proceedings, the former was bound, before he could complete the foreclosure as against his coreversioners, to notify them of the peril to their interests, and give them an opportunity to come in and contribute with him towards the redemption from the mortgage; and, if he failed to do so, and procured title under his foreclosure proceedings, his coreversioners would be entitled to their proportions upon payment of their shares of the mortgage debt.

And in Montague v. Selb, 106 Ill. 49, it was held that a purchaser of land at administrator's sale, in which land the widow of the intestate had a homestead estate and equity of redemption, could not cut off the widow's right of homestead by subsequently acquiring a deed under a decree foreclosing a mortgage given by the intestate and his wife, in which the homestead was released, as such purchaser and the widow were tenants in common; and that, accordingly, the purchaser would hold such after-acquired title in trust for the common estate, and the widow would be entitled to avail herself of it upon making a ratable contribution of the amount paid out for it.

And the conclusion reached in JACKSON v. BAIRD, that an encumbrance upon property held in common, created by a former owner through whom all the cotenants derive their title, is not an outstanding title adverse to the title of the encumbrancer, would seem to be opposed by the following cases, which followed the general rule that, where a cotenant acquired an outstanding title, his purchase thereof must inure to the benefit of all the cotenants, although such outstanding title was an encumbrance created by a predecessor in title of all the cotenants: Savage v. Bradley, 149 Ala. 169, 123 Am. St. Rep. 30, 43 So. 20; Titworth v. Stout, 49 Ill. 78, 95 Am. Dec. 577; Smith v. Osborne, 86 Ill. 606; Jennings v. Moon, 135 Ind. 168, 34 N. E. 996; Ryason v. Dunten, 164 Ind. 85, 73 N. E. 74; Leach on the theory that there is evidence that Shuford bought in the property in trust for Baird, and that consequently, as Baird is a tenant in common with plaintiffs, the title he acquired, whether legal or equitable, must inure to the joint benefit of all. We do not think there is any evidence whatever of a fraudulent combination between Shuford and Baird to effect a secret sale of the property or to suppress bidding, although the testimony of George Shuford may possibly be susceptible of the construction that he intended the property for Baird, and that he was acting in his interest. The contention of plaintiffs that John Baird could not acquire the exclusive title at the sale is founded upon a misapprehension of the law. The general rule is well settled that one cotenant cannot purchase an outstanding title or encumbrance affecting the common estate for his own exclusive benefit and assert such right against his cotenants; but that rule does not apply under the facts of this case. The title which was acquired by Shuford, assuming that he acquired it for Baird, was not an outstanding title adverse to the title of Robert Baird. It was the title of Robert Baird himself, the common ancestor under whom all claimed, and the sale was being made under a deed executed by such ancestor and to pay his debts, which was an encumbrance on the land when it descended to plaintiffs and their coheir. It is held in the state that one cotenant lawfully may purchase his cotenants' share of the common property under execution sale to pay the debt of such cotenant. Likewise, it is held

v. Hall, 95 Iowa, 611, 64 N. W. 790; Richards v. Richards, 75 Mich. 408, 42 N. W. 954; Reed v. Reed, 122 Mich. 77, 80 Am. St. Rep. 541, 80 N. W. 996; Holterhoff v. Mead, 36 Minn. 42, 29 N. W. 675; Wyatt v. Wyatt, 81 Miss. 219, 32 So. 317; Dillinger v. Kelley, 84 Mo. 561; Hinters v. Hinters, 114 Mo. 26, 21 S. W. 456; Nalle v. Thompson, 173 Mo. 595, 73 S. W. 599; Nalle v. Parks, 173 Mo. 616, 73 S. W. 596; Morrison v. Roehl (Mo.) 114 S. W. 981; Knolls v. Barnhart, 71 N. Y. 474; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 131 N. Y. 101, 27 Am. St. Rep. 569, 29 N. E. 1013, reversing 35 N. Y. S. R. 512, 12 N. Y. Supp. 189; Collins v. Collins, 36 N. Y. S. R. 591, 13 N. Y. Supp. 28, affirmed without opinion in 131 N. Y. 648, 30 N. E. 863; Hite v. Hite, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 97.

In Johnson v. Brauch, 9 S. D. 116, 62 Am. St. Rep. 857, 68 N. W. 173, in which it appeared that one cotenant acquired a tax deed to the common property for taxes, which, considering the brevity of time (fifteen months) between the death of the former owner and the execution of the deed, must have been assessed against such former owner, the general rule was applied, and the purchase held to inure to the benefit of all the cotenants; while in the following cases, in which it is not shown whether the taxes for which the property in question was sold were assessed against the cotenants themselves, or against him from whom they derived title, it was also held that the purchase of a tax title by one cotenant inured to the benefit of all. Williams v. Clyatt, 53 Fla. 987, 43 So. 441; Conn v. Conn, 58 Iowa, 747, 13 N. W. 51; Clark v. Brown, 70 Iowa, 139, 30 N. W. 46; Field v. Farmers' & D. Bank, 110 Ky. 256, 61 S. W. 258; Hardy v. Gregg (Miss.) 2 So. 358; Barker v. Jones, 62 N. H. 497, 13 Am. St. Rep. 586; Re Brown, 2 Pa. St. 463; Clark v. Beard, 59 W. Va. 669, 53 S. E. 597.

So, in Lee v. Fox, 6 Dana, 172, and Perkins v. Smith, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 509, 37 S. W. 72, this rule was applied to a purchase by a husband of a cotenant, and his purchase held to inure to the benefit of his wife's cotenants; while in Beaman v. Beaman, 90 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Miss. 762, 44 So. 987, it was held to apply to the purchase by the wife of one of the cotenants.

The following decisions might seem at first glance to be some authority for the conclusion reached in JACKSON v. BAIRD, that an encumbrance given by a predecessor in title is not an outstanding adverse title, within the meaning of the rule that the purchase of such title by one cotenant will inure to the benefit of all, but, upon examination of these cases, it will be found that the fact that the encumbrance was given by the predecessor in title was not made the basis of any exception to the general rule, but that the decisions went off on other grounds.

Thus, in Elston v. Piggott, 94 Ind. 14, in which it appeared that one who had title to the undivided two thirds acquired by purchase from an assignee in bankruptcy, and also held by assignment a certificate of purchase of the whole tract, made to satisfy a decree against the bankrupt and his wife upon a mortgage executed by both, subsequently by reason of nonredemption acquired a deed upon the certificate, it was held that the certificate acquired while a tenant in common with the bankrupt's wife did not inure to the benefit of both, upon the ground that the title was not a common one, and the interests of the tenants were not reciprocal, and there was no fiduciary relationship between them, since the purchaser's title was by virtue of a judicial sale, and not by the same instrument nor from the same source as that from which the wife's claim was derived. The court said that there was "nothing in such a case to create relations of trust and confidence, and, therefore, the reason of the rule applicable to ordinary cases fails, and the time-honored doctrine is that, where the reason of the rule ceases, so does the rule itself.

. . . The reason of the rule is that the relationship is one imposing trust and confidence, and requiring the tenants not to assume positions of hostility." Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, § 155, is cited to the effect that, if the interests of the cotenants that one of the cotenants may purchase the entire property at a sale to pay the common ancestor's debt. Baird v. Baird, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 536, 31 Am. Dec. 399. In that case Chief Justice Ruffin says: "It is a very common case that one brother buys at sheriff's sale the undivided estate of another brother in descended lands, either for the debt of the ancestor, or that of the brother himself contracted after the father's death; and we believe the legality of such a purchase has never been questioned." Again: "It is not the duty of one heir, or of one tenant in common, as such, to pay the debts of another heir or tenant in common, . . . nor to refrain from buying it, to his own disadvantage, more than it is the duty of any other person wholly unconnected with them." So it is said by Judge Gaston that "a tenant in common, as such, is not a trustee for his companion." Saunders v. Gatlin, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 92. It is likewise held in England that there is no fiduciary relation existing between tenants in common, as such; and that a tenant in common of property previously mortgaged, who purchased the entire property at the mortgage sale, was entitled to hold it for his sole benefit. This is an interesting case, decided by the House of Lords and privy council, in which an elaborate opinion is delivered by Lord Herschell and concurred in by the other Lord Justices. [Kennedy v. de Trafford [1897] A. C. 180]. See also 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 676, and cases cited; also, Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, §§ 162-165; Blodgett v. Hildreth, 8 Allen, 186; Sutton v. Jenkins, 147 N. C. 11, 60 S. E. 643.

When the land in controversy descended upon these plaintiffs and upon their coheir, John Baird, it was encumbered with the mortgage to Reid made by their ancestor. When that mortgage was foreclosed in the manner allowed by law, any one of the heirs had a right to purchase the entire estate to protect his own interest, and he would acquire the title discharged of any trust to his coheirs. There is no evidence that John Baird agreed to purchase for the benefit of the other heirs, or endeavored to suppress bidding, or practised any other fraud upon his cotenants. So far as the record discloses, the sale appears to have been fairly made by the trustee, and it was open to the plaintiffs or any of them to attend and purchase if they so desired.

We think, therefore, the judgment of nonsuit should be affirmed.

accrued at different times and under different instruments, and neither had superior means of information respecting the state of the title, then either, unless he employed his cotenancy to secure an advantage, might acquire and assert a superior outstanding title,—especially where there was no joint possession of the premises. Indeed, this case is directly opposed to the conclusion reached in JACKSON v. BAIRD, since the court went on to say that the case before them was altogether different from one where the encumbrance was created by a former owner through whom both parties claimed title.

And in Boynton v. Veldman, 131 Mich. 555, 91 N. W. 1022, it was held that, where a cotenant purchased the entire property for taxes levied against a predecessor in title, such purchase did not inure to the benefit of a cotenant who had acquired his title at a different time and by a different instrument. In this case, however, the claim to share such benefit was not made by the other cotenant, who was not a party to the action, and who had always refused to contribute towards the payment of such taxes, and never asserted any title to the land.

And in Fielding v. White (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 1054, it was held that a cotenant might, by purchase at a foreclosure sale of a mortgage on the common property given by the one from whom all the common owners claimed title, acquire title for his own exclusive benefit, if there had never been any understanding between him and his fellow owners as to the payment of the mortgage debt or the title to, or possession or use of, the land, and neither had exclusive possession thereof. The court did not base its conclusion upon the fact that the encumbrance had been created by the former owner, but exclusively because the cotenants had acquired their individual titles by different instruments and at different times, which it deemed had been established as a rule of property by other Texas decisions (which are not in point in this note). Chief Justice Fisher, however, in delivering the opinion, said that, if the question were an open one, he would be inclined to rule differently in accord with what he conceived to be the decided weight of authority. To quote his language: "The unity of possession, or the right of joint possession, was the principal factor that created the relationship of tenants in common at common law. Their rights were acquired by several and distinct titles, or by the same title but at different periods; and the grand incident of such estates was the unity of possession, or the present right of possession, coextensive with the entire estate. And, in my view of the law, when such relationship is once ascertained, or such estates are found to exist, eo instanti there springs into existence a reciprocal and mutual obligation and duty resting upon each co-owner, in dealing with the common estate, to observe the right of each other, and to abstain from acts in which benefit and profit may result to one to the injury of the other, although there be an absence of facts tending to show special circumstances creating trust relationship."

In Watson v. Watson, 198 Pa. 234, 47 Atl. 1096, in which it appeared that the mortgage in question was executed by one from whom the cotenants derived title, the decision was not at all based upon that fact, the specific finding being that, if the cotenants joined in a letter directing the mortgagee, who was about to foreclose, to convey the land absolutely to one of their number on condition that the latter pay the mortgage, a deed subsequently made in accordance with this direction passed the title of the premises divested of any interest which the grantee's former cotenants might have had therein, in the absence of any fraud on his part.

In Blodgett v. Hildreth, 8 Allen, 186, one of the cases cited in JACKSON v. BAIRD, the court did hold that the principle that one tenant in common cannot purchase an outstanding title or encumbrance upon the joint estate for his exclusive benefit, and assert the same to the prejudice of his cotenant, could not be properly applied to a purchase by one cotenant of an outstanding mortgage upon the joint estate, and accordingly denied the right of the nonpurchasing tenant to maintain partition against the purchasing tenant. As a matter of fact the mortgage in this case was executed by one through whom both cotenants claimed; but the decision apparently does not rest upon that fact, but rather upon the fact that the purchase of the mortgage by one cotenant left the other in full enjoyment of the right of redemption from the mortgage that he previously enjoyed. The court said: "Such a title may temporarily inure to the benefit of a cotenant who elects to make such purchase. But it leaves the other party in the full enjoyment of the right of redemption that he previously enjoyed. He may, as he would have been required to do in the case of the mortgage title remaining in the hands of a third person, pay the whole amount of the encumbrance, and be put in possession of the whole premises unless the cotenant elects to contribute his share." In other words, the real reason for the denial of the equitable principle in this case seems to be that it is unnecessary since the nonpurchasing tenant is fully protected by the preservation to him of his pre-existing right to redeem from the mortgage, which is not cut off by the purchase of the mortgage by his cotenant any more than it would have been if the mortgage had been purchased by a third person. There is therefore an obvious distinction between such a case and one where the purchase by one cotenant under a foreclosure of a mortgage operates to cut off the equity of redemption and leaves the nonpurchasing tenant remediless unless the principle in question can be invoked by him.

In Sutton v. Jenkins, 147 N. C. 11, 60 S. E. 643, also cited in JACKSON v. BAIRD, it appeared that, not only had the alleged cotenants undertaken to divide the land by 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

running a division line and entering into possession of their respective parts, but the encumbrance in question had been foreclosed and a deed under the foreclosure proceedings executed almost four years before the alleged cotenant acquired any title from the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.

The quotations found in JACKSON v. BAIRD, from Saunders v. Gatlin, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 92, and from Baird v. Baird, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 536, 31 Am. Dec. 399, are dicta merely, as there was in neither case a purchase of an encumbrance created by a predecessor in title, while in Kennedy v. de Trafford [1897] A. C. 180, anonymously referred to by the North Carolina court, the purchase in question was of a mortgage executed by the cotenants themselves.

This note, of course, does not include cases where a purchase was made after the cotenancy had altogether ceased to exist, nor does it include cases such as Aubuchon v. Aubuchon, 133 Mo. 260, 34 S. W. 569, in which land ordered to be sold by the probate court for the payment of the decedent's debts was purchased by one of the heirs.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

A. D. BRADFORD et al., Plffs. in Certiorari,
v.
MRS. H. L. CALHOUN et al.

(— Tenn. —, 109 S. W. 502.)

Will — renunciation — effect.

A written renunciation of a devise of an interest in real estate, made the day the will is admitted to probate, defeats a levy upon the property under execution against the devisee.

(February 15, 1908.)

Case Note. — Mode and effect of renouncing benefit under will.

Judge Story said in Webster v. Gilman, 1 Story, 499, Fed. Cas. No. 17,335: "We know of no rule of law by which a mere naked nonpossession, or nonexercise of the right of entry and possession, of real estate under a devise, short of the period prescribed by the statute of limitations to bar a right of entry, is held to amount to a positive renunciation or disclaimer of a devise, or to proof thereof. It may be even doubtful whether, under our laws, any renunciation or disclaimer, not by deed or matter of record, would be an extinguishment of the right of the devisee. But, at all events, it should be evidenced by some solemn act or acknowledgment in writing, or by some open and positive act of renunciation or disclaimer, which will prevent all future cavil, and operate in point of evidence as a quasi estoppel."

The acceptance of a devise is essential to the vesting of title in the devisee.

Mr. Walter Stokes for defendants in certiorari.

Henderson, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was dismissed by the chancellor. On appeal to the court of civil appeals, his decree was affirmed; and the case is before this court on certiorari.

Mrs. Lou H. Sneed died January 13, 1906, leaving a will by which, among other provisions, she devised to her husband, Thomas H. Sneed, a life estate in certain land, with remainder to her sister and a niece. The will was admitted to probate January 17, 1906. On the same date Thomas H. Sneed, executed a paper which, after setting out the clause of the will making said devise to him, adds:

"It is my wish that the other members of the family who may be entitled to this property under the law may receive it. I therefore decline to accept anything under said will, and renounce the same in toto, so far as any interest coming to me is concerned, and leave it to descend under law to the parties entitled, free from any encumbrance on account of the provision in said will."

This paper was acknowledged before the county court clerk February 8, 1906, on which date it was registered. The parties had been married about five years, and had no children.

Prior to the death of Mrs. Sneed, and on January 11, 1906, defendant Mrs. H. L. Calhoun brought suit before a justice of the peace of Davidson County against Thomas H. Sneed, and, on January 27, 1906, recovered judgment against him for $445.50. Execution was issued from this judgment February 3, 1906, and was, on same day, levied on the life estate so devised by the will to Sneed. The papers before the justice of the peace in the case were filed in the circuit court for condemnation, and order of sale was entered therein July 6, 1906. The bill is filed by the remaindermen in said land and all of the surviving heirs of the testa-

Story, 327, Fed. Cas. No. 5,147, that, if an "estate is devised absolutely and without any trust or encumbrances, the law will presume it to be accepted by the devisee because it is for his benefit, and some solemn, notorious act is required to establish his renunciation or disclaimer of it."

It was held in Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. (Va.) 94, 39 Am. Dec. 246, that, in an action of ejectment brought by the heirs of the devisee of the fee, it could not be shown in defense that the latter had, by parol, renounced the devise, on the ground that a devise of a freehold estate can be renounced only by a written instrument executed with equal solemnity as the devise.

And in Doe ex dem. Smyth v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 112, it was questioned whether a devise of a freehold could be renounced by parol.

But the presumption of an acceptance of a beneficial devise of realty is rebuttable, and, when a renunciation is shown, the title under the devise does not vest, and a deed of renunciation is unnecessary, except where the title has already vested in the devisee by an acceptance. Defreese v. Lake, 109 Mich. 421, 32 L.R.A. 744, 63 Am. St. Rep. 584, 67 N. W. 505.

Whether the conduct of a devisee amounts to a revocation is a question for the jury where a second life tenant, during 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the lifetime of the first life tenant acquires a tax title to the freehold, and immediately records the same, and, after the termination of the first life estate, goes into possession and subsequently conveys the fee title to another, it appearing that the will was never placed upon record. Defreese v. Lake, supra. The court observed that, up to the time the tax title was acquired, the second life tenant, not being in possession, had done nothing tending to show whether he had accepted the devise prior thereto.

In Stebbins v. Lathrop, 4 Pick. 43, the court, in substance, said there seemed to be no good reason why a benefit under a will should not be renounced before the probate court in a proceeding to admit the will to probate, when all the parties were present, and the fact of renunciation could be verified by the records of the court.

So, a written renunciation filed in a probate court by one to whom land was devised, charged with a burden, is sufficient, a deed being unnecessary, even though the renunciation is filed fourteen years after the admission of the will to probate, during which time the testator's widow, and not the devisee, had been continuously in possession of the land devised. Ward v. Ward, 15 Pick. 511.

A written notice of an intention not to take a legacy of personalty, and a return trix, seeking to enjoin the sale of the property under said condemnation proceedings.

The court of civil appeals, in a learned opinion, one of the court dissenting, adopts what is said to be the old English common-law rule, which requires a renunciation of a beneficial devise of real estate to be by deed of record; and that court was of opinion that this is in accord with our system of registration, and would tend to the prevention of frauds. This is said to be so, especially when intervening rights of creditors are concerned. This can be so only on the assumption that the devise, without more, and independent of the assent, express or implied, of the devisee, vests the estate in him, so that it can be divested only by deed, and, in order to avail against creditors, the deed must be registered.

In 3 Washburn on Real Property, 402, it is said: "An heir at law is the only person who, by the common law, becomes the owner of land without his own agency or assent. A title by deed or devise requires the assent of the grantee or devisee before it can take effect." At page 700 of the same authority it is said: "It is hardly necessary to add that no one can make another the owner of an estate against his consent, by devising it to him, so that, if the devisee disclaims the devise, it becomes inoperative and goes to the heir."

On this subject the court says in Defreese v. Lake, 109 Mich. 421, 32 L.R.A. 744, 63 Am. St. Rep. 584, 67 N. W. 506: "It is said that a parol disclaimer will not prevent the devisee from subsequently claiming the devise, and that the reason of the necessity of a deed grows out of the presumptive vesting of the devised interest in the devisee before entry. See Perry v. Hale, 44 N. H. 365. It is, in our opinion, illogical to say that a deed is necessary because of the presumption that the title has vested, when the title does not vest by a devise unless there is an acceptance. It would seem that the deed would be necessary only where the title has actually vested, which appears to depend upon acceptance. If it be admitted that the law will presume an acceptance, it is not a conclusive presumption, and, when it is shown to have been renounced, it is shown that the title did not vest, and apparently there would be no occasion for divesting a title that had not vested."

In 4 Kent, Com. 533, it is said: "An estate vests, under a devise, on the death of the testator before entry; but a devisee is not bound to accept of a devise to him volens volens, and he may renounce the gift, by which act the estate will descend to the heir, or pass in some other direction under the will. The disclaimer and renunciation must be by some unequivocal act, and it is left undecided whether a verbal disclaimer will be sufficient. A disclaimer by deed is sufficient, and some judges have held that it may be by a verbal renunciation. Perhaps the case will be governed by circumstances."

thereof to the executor, is a sufficient renunciation to permit the devisee to assert an antagonistic title to real estate devised to others by the testator's will. Watson v. Watson, 128 Mass. 152.

It is not necessary that a renunciation of a devise of land be made in a court of record, a deed of renunciation being sufficient. Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31.

And, even though an acceptance is presumed, a devisee's refusal to accept land charged with certain payments will defeat a levy of execution thereon by his creditors during the period the land, by the terms of the will, remains in the possession of executors. Tarr v. Robinson, 158 Pa. 60, 27 Atl. 859.

A renunciation under the hand and seal of a devisee of slaves is sufficient to relieve him of a statutory liability of a devisee to the testator's creditors. Rogers v. Farrar, 6 T. B. Mon. 421.

A renunciation of a devise of corporate stock, charged with the payment of the testator's debts, is shown by the devisee's oral refusal to accept, and his subsequent offer to purchase the stock from those entitled thereto. Haebler v. John Eichler Brewing Co. 42 App. Div. 95, 58 N. Y. Supp. 894, affirming 25 Misc. 576, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1071.

The refusal of a devisee of land, during his lifetime, to permit the erection of a house of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) a certain value thereon, as provided by the will, will estop his representative, after his death, from claiming the value of the house from the testator's estate. Re Bryce, 194 Pa. 135, 44 Atl. 1076.

The renunciation by one of two joint devisees of a life estate vests the whole estate in the other. Pendleton v. Kinney, 65 Conn. 222, 32 Atl. 331.

It was said in Wonsetler v. Wonsetler, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 321, that the refusal to accept a bequest must be absolute and unqualified, not merely in word, but in deed; however positive the terms of refusal, they may be made ineffectual by conduct inconsistent with a refusal, such as acts of dominion over the subject of the devise; and a gift of it by the devisee to another is such an act.

It has been said that, if property is devised, subject to a condition or burdened with a charge, the devisee will be allowed a reasonable time and opportunity to judge of the value of the bequest, and the burden or condition, before he decides to accept or renounce it. Perry v. Hale, 44 N. H. 365; Wheeler v. Lester, 1 Bradf. 203.

As to the right of creditors or personal representatives to make or control election for or against a will, or between different provisions of a will or statute, see case note to Re Fleming, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 379.

A number of ancient authorities on the subject are discussed in the case of Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. (Va.) 94, 39 Am. Dec. 246, among them Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31, in which it is said: "The law presumes that . . . [the devisee] will assent until the contrary is proved. When the contrary, however, is proved, it shows that he never did assent to the devise, and consequently that the estate never was in him."

The same principle is held in Burritt v. Silliman, 13 N. Y. 96, 64 Am. Dec. 530, where it is said: "When it turns out that the estate has not been accepted, it remains in the original owner, precisely as if the conveyance had not been executed."

Quite a number of decisions of other states are cited by counsel; but it is not necessary to pursue the discussion of them. The tendency of our own decisions is along the line of those above referred to. In Hughes v. Brown, 88 Tenn. 582, 8 L.R.A. 480, 13 S. W. 286, Brown had been appointed trustee and required to execute bond. He failed to execute the bond. Some years afterwards he was sued as trustee, and in his answer disclaimed ever having accepted the appointment. It is held that his disclaimer, in the absence of acts indicating an acceptance, must be taken to relate back to the time of his appointment.

In Goss v. Singleton, 2 Head, 77, the question under consideration was with regard to the renunciation by persons named as trustees. The court, through McKinney, J., says: "It seems, in general, that every gift, by deed or will, or otherwise, is supposed prima facie, unless the contrary appears, to be beneficial to the donee. Consequently the law presumes, until there is proof to the contrary, that every estate is accepted by the person to whom it is expressed to be given. Hill, Tr. (1854 ed.) 304. But the law does not force anyone to accept the gift of an estate, whether made in trust, or otherwise; and therefore it is competent for the person appointed trustee to refuse both the estate and the office attached to it, provided he has done no act to deprive himself of that right. Id. 312. The gift is not perfect until ratified by the assent of the donee; and a disclaimer of the trust operates as evidence that such assent was never given. Id. 316. There is some difference of opinion as to what shall be a sufficient disclaimer. There are authorities which seem to maintain that a parol disclaimer of a gift, either by deed or will, of a freehold estate, is sufficient. But, however this may be, it is well settled that the renunciation may be by deed, by matter of record, or any written instrument, or by answer in chancery. Id. 316, 317. And such disclaimer or refusal to accept the trust, whenever made, will relate back, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) will be held to have been made at the time of the gift, if no act has been done to preclude the party. Id. 313."

While that case related to the renunciation of a trust, we think that the same principle applies with equal, if not greater, force to the beneficial devisee. The true rule, founded upon principle, is that it is optional with the devisee to accept the devise, however beneficial it may be to him; and when he elects to renounce, before any act on his part indicating an acceptance, his renunciation shall relate back, and will be held to have been made at the time of the gift, and will displace any levy of creditors that may in the meantime have been made. Surely that principle should apply to this case, since Sneed renounced the devise on the day that the will of his wife was admitted to probate.

It is insisted by learned counsel for defendant that this renunciation was made for the purpose of defeating the collection of the defendant's judgment, or, if not, it was in effect a voluntary conveyance and void as against existing creditors. As it was optional with Sneed to accept or renounce, it is immaterial what his motives were, so long as there is no collusion with the remaindermen or residuary devisees, by which he fraudulently receives a benefit for his renunciation; and there is no proof of this. The renunciation is not a voluntary conveyance, void as against existing creditors, because, when he has properly renounced, the renunciation relates back to the date of the gift, and, as he has never accepted the gift, he has had nothing that could be made the subject of a voluntary conveyance.

It results that the decree of the Court of Civil Appeals, affirming the decree of the chancellor, is reversed, and decree will be entered here making perpetual the injunction against the sale of the land in controversy under the order of condemnation in favor of the defendant against Sneed. Defendant will pay the costs of this and the chancery court.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

JOHN SCHOENMANN et al., Appts.,
v.

JOHN L. WHITT, Resp't.

(— Wis. —, 117 N. W. 851.)

Broker — exclusive authority — commissions.

A broker receiving exclusive authority to sell real estate by a writing which he does not sign cannot recover commissions in case the property is sold by the owner without aid from him, if he fails to show that, prior to the sale, he had used ordinary diligence in endeavoring to make a sale of the property, resulting in the expenditure of time, money, or effort under the contract.

(Timlin, J., dissents.)

(September 29, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Iowa County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover commissions alleged to be due for the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

This action is brought to recover a commission of $270 claimed to be due upon the sale of a farm. The alleged contract upon which recovery is sought was lost, but what purported to be a copy of at least the material portion of it was produced, and offered, and received in evidence, and is as follows:

Spring Green, Wis., Oct. 14, 1904.

I hereby grant unto Schoenmann & Son the exclusive right to sell and to enter into a contract for the conveyance of the property described on the opposite side of this card, and authorize them to list the same for sale upon the terms and conditions mentioned and agree to pay said Schoenmann & Son, in the event of a sale of said property, the regular commission of two and one half. I however reserve the right to Case Note. — Mutuality of contract giving real-estate broker exclusive authority to sell, or promising him commissions in case of sale by anyone else, but which does not in terms impose any obligation upon him.

This note is limited strictly to those cases which deal with the question whether a writing giving a real-estate broker exclusive authority to sell certain property, or promising him commissions in case the owner himself sells, without in express terms requiring him to do anything, is of sufficient mutuality or upon sufficient consideration so that, in case the property is sold by the owner himself or another agent, the broker may recover the stipulated commissions or sue for breach of contract. It therefore does not include those cases in which the broker seeks to recover his commission because, as he claims, the sale was in fact brought about through his efforts.

It seems to be a general rule that, although a writing purporting to give a real-estate broker the exclusive authority to sell certain property, or promising him commission in case anyone else sells, without in express terms requiring him to do anything, is not signed by such broker, if the latter enters upon the performance, and expends time, money, or effort under the contract, it cannot be said to be void for want of mutuality or lack of consideration, so as to prevent the broker from recovering his commissions in case the landowner himself, or someone aside from the broker, sells the land.

Thus, in Attix v. Pelan, 5 Iowa, 336, it was held that a writing granting a firm of real-estate brokers the exclusive right to sell certain property, with certain stipulations as to commissions, is not void for want of mutuality, so as to prevent a recovery of commissions in case the property is sold by the owners themselves, it appearing that, although it had not been signed by the brokers, the latter had acted upon it; the court saying that in such case it is the same as if they had put their names upon it.

involving a contract in which the owner promised to pay the commission also in event he himself sold the property, is Goward v. Waters, 98 Mass. 596, where the court took occasion to say: "The position of the defendant's counsel is undoubtedly true, that at the time the contract was signed it was a mere nudum pactum. The plaintiffs paid nothing, incurred no expense or loss, and entered into no obligation on their part. They were at liberty to act or not, as they pleased; and would incur no liability by failing to do anything. But it is also apparent that the writing contemplated services to be rendered and expenses to be incurred by the plaintiffs for the defendant; and that the promises were made in view of such future services and expenses. The writing is merely a stipulation, by the defendant, of the terms upon which compensation shall be made by him. Subsequent performance of services and expenditure of money, in prosecution of the employment thus authorized, furnish a sufficient consideration for the promises of the defendant."

In Lapham v. Flint, 86 Minn. 376, 90 N. W. 780, it was held that, even conceding an agreement signed by a real-estate owner to pay a broker certain commissions in the event either found a purchaser to be a unilateral contract, and invalid upon its face, yet the broker's partial performance was a sufficient acceptance so as to make the owner liable for commissions where he himself sold the property. The court, in distinguishing Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205, 44 N. W. 669, said: "The contract under consideration in Stensgaard v. Smith, supra, contained no express provision that the owner should pay the agent commission in case he should himself make the sale. The only question before the court in that case was whether the contract, upon its face, unaided by evidence or allegations in the complaint, expressed a mutuality of obligation; and it was properly held that it did not, because there was nothing in the contract to indicate any acceptance of the obligation, either in writing or by performance."

revoke this agreement by giving said Schoenmann & Son ninety days' notice in writing. [Signed] John L. Whitt.

The foregoing writing was not signed by the plaintiffs or either of them. The defendant asserted that the written memorandum did not express the entire agreement, and that it should be reformed so as to exempt him from the payment of any commission in the event of his making a sale of the farm himself. The court, on disputed testimony, refused to reform the instrument, and found that the agreement was fully expressed in the writing. Some three weeks after the signing of the written memorandum, the defendant sold the farm without any aid or assistance from the plaintiffs for a price in excess of what they were authorized to sell for. He refused to pay any commission because of such sale. A jury was waived, and the case was tried by the court. The trial court found that plaintiffs had not exhibited the farm in question to any purchaser, had not taken any steps to sell the same, and had not incurred any expense in reference thereto, except to talk with one person about it, to whom they expected to show it, but before doing so they learned it was sold, and that the contract lacked mutuality and therefore never had any binding force or effect; and award-

W. 1037, a written contract, signed by both parties, to be good until a certain date, by which the broker had the exclusive right to sell the property upon certain terms and conditions with the promise of certain commissions in case the property was sold during the pendency of the contract, or to a person whom the broker found, was construed as a mutual contract giving the broker the exclusive right to sell between the dates mentioned and entitling him to commissions on any sale which was made between those dates, even though made by the owner himself and without the aid of the broker. The court said that the consideration of the contract was that the plaintiff would find a purchaser, and that, by his efforts to find a purchaser, he performed his part of the contract.

In Kimmell v. Skelly, 130 Cal. 555, 62 Pac. 1067, a contract between the owner of real estate and a firm of brokers, making them, in consideration of their services, exclusive agents to sell, and agreeing to pay them a specified commission upon any sale made by them, or by anyone else including the owner, was held not to be invalid for want of consideration; and therefore the brokers, having attempted to find purchasers, were entitled to recover the stipulated commissions although the property was sold by the owner himself without the influence of the brokers. The court said: "If this contract had provided in terms that, 'in consideration of the brokers' efforts to secure a purchaser, whether or not those efforts were successful, defendant would pay the amount agreed upon as commissions in case she herself sold the property during the life of the contract,' I see no possible legal objection to the validity of that kind of a provision, and, in substance, that is this contract."

In Hoskins v. Fogg, 60 N. H. 402, a contract signed by the owner of land to pay a real-estate broker a certain sum if he procured a purchaser, and half the sum if the owner himself sold it outside the agent's influence; with the further agreement that no other party should have the selling of the same,—was held to be a contract upon a good consideration, entitling the agent who, while performing his part of the contract, was prevented from making a sale by the owner selling it outside his influence, to re- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) cover the half sum agreed in the contract to be paid.

In Stringfellow v. Powers, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 199, 23 S. W. 313, a contract on the part of a landowner, giving a real-estate broker the exclusive authority to sell and the promise of all he could get over a certain amount as remuneration, was held not to be void for want of consideration. The court said that the bringing about of a sale was a valid consideration, and therefore such broker, upon the property being sold by the owner himself, was entitled to a recovery of the stipulated commission. It appeared in this case, however, that the broker had advertised the property, and was doing all he could to sell the land, and in fact was negotiating with the very person to whom the property was afterward sold by the owner.

In Singleton v. O'Brien, 125 Ind. 151, 25 N. E. 154, an agreement with a broker on the part of a landowner, looking to the sale of certain land, but reserving the right to make a sale himself, and providing that, in case he did so, the agent was to receive the same fee, was held to rest upon a sufficient consideration, and to entitle the broker to the commission, where the owner, within a short time after its execution, sold the property, although the broker had taken no steps to negotiate a sale.

In Crane v. McCormick, 92 Cal. 176, 28 Pac. 222, an agreement on the part of a real-estate owner who had listed his property with a broker to give the latter, in consideration of his expenses and efforts in attracting settlers to the county, commissions in case the land was withdrawn from sale or sold through any means during the continuation of the agreement, was held to be a valid contract, entitling the broker to his commission in case of sale by the owner; it appearing that the broker had acted upon the contract, and sent out a large amount of advertising matter.

In Gregory v. Bonney, 135 Cal. 589, 67 Pac. 1038, it was held that an agreement signed by both parties, obligating the owner of land not to sell it except through the agency of a real estate broker within a time limited; and that, in case of a sale made by the owner within such time, or, within a further period, to one whom the broker had recommended the property, he would pay the bro-ed judgment dismissing complaint, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

Messrs. Richmond, Jackman, & Swansen, for respondent:

The contract was void for want of mutuality.

W. 1067.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is perfectly apparent that the signing of this paper by the defendant did not make a contract. It was not signed by the plainker his full commission,—though a hard contract, was valid, in the absence of fraud, and entitled the broker to recover his commission, upon the owner selling his property to one from whom the broker had obtained a larger offer, which was not accepted.

An interesting case on this question is Owens v. Wehrle, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 536, where it was held that, if an owner of real estate contracts under seal with a broker for the sale of his property,—which in that case was not exclusive, but provided for commissions in case a sale was made by either the broker or anyone else,—the owner cannot escape the payment of such commissions by pleading want of consideration, being prevented from doing so by the presence of the seal.

However, in Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205, 44 N. W. 669, it was held that a writing purporting, in consideration of a broker's agreeing to act as agent for the sale of certain property, to give him exclusive authority to sell for three months, and the promise of compensation in case of sale, which, however, was not signed by the broker, was not a valid contract, being void for want of mutuality and lacking any other consideration, but was effectual only as a present revocable grant of authority to sell; and, therefore, it appearing that the owner himself sold the property before the expiration of the three months, the broker could not recover damages for breach of contract. In this case the evidence showed that the broker immediately took steps to effect a sale of the land, posted notices upon it, published advertisements in newspapers, and individually solicited purchasers. The court, however, took occasion to say: "No express agreement was shown. The mere receiving and retaining this instrument did not import an agreement thus to act for the period named, for the reason that, whether the plaintiff should be willing to take upon himself that obligation or not, he might accept and act upon the revocable authority to sell, expressed in the writing; and, if he should succeed in effecting a sale before the power should be revoked, he would earn the commission specified. In other words, the instrument was presently effectual and of advantage to him, whether he chose to place himself under contract obligations or not. For the same reason L.R.A. (N.S.)

son, the fact that for a day or a month he availed himself of the right to sell, conferred by the defendant, by attempting to make a sale, does not justify the inference, in an action where the burden is on the plaintiff to prove a contract, that he had accepted the offer of the defendant to conclude a contract covering the period of three months, so that he could not have discontinued his efforts without rendering himself liable in damages. In brief, it was in the power of the plaintiff either to convert the defendant's offer and authorization into a complete contract, or to act upon it as a naked revocable power, or to do nothing at all. He appears to have simply availed himself, for about a month, of the naked present right to sell if he could do so. He cannot now complain that the landowner then revoked the authority, which was still unexecuted."

In several cases the mutuality or consideration of the contract was not raised, these cases merely holding that, where a broker is given the exclusive right to sell certain property within a certain time, he is entitled to his commissions if he finds a purchaser within that time who is ready and willing to accept the terms, although the owner has already sold the property. Among these cases are Schultz v. Griffin, 5 Misc. 499, 26 N. Y. Supp. 713, and Levy v. Rothe, 17 Misc. 402, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1057. And this would also seem to have been held in Black v. Snook, 204 Pa. 119, 53 Atl. 648.

In Waterman v. Boltinghouse, 82 Cal. 659, 23 Pac. 195, it was held that a real-estate broker who has a contract giving him the exclusive right to sell land within a certain time cannot recover his commissions of his employer who himself sells within the time without the agency of the broker, unless he has produced a purchaser ready and willing to buy according to the terms of the contract.

Effect upon right of real-estate broker to commission on fact that owner sells to broker's customer at reduced price, see case note to Ball v. Dolan, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272.

For cases dealing with the broker's right to commissions when sale is made by the owner in ignorance of the former's instrumentality in procuring the purchaser, see case note to Quist v. Goodfellow, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 153.

tiffs and contained no stipulation requiring them to do anything. At the time of its delivery to the plaintiffs it was entirely lacking in mutuality. The plaintiffs might have accepted the implied obligations of the writing on their part by doing the work and incurring the expense that such writing contemplated should be performed and incurred, and such acceptance, so made, would result in a binding contract. Arnold v. National Bank, 126 Wis. 362, 365, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580, 105 N. W. 828; Hooker v. Hyde, 61 Wis. 204, 207, 21 N. W. 52; Superior Consol. Land Co. v. Bickford, 93 Wis. 220, 67 N. W. 45; Goward v. Waters, 98 Mass. 596, 598; Lapham v. Flint, 86 Minn. 376, 90 N. W. 780, 781. The implied obligation contemplated by the writing required plaintiffs to use ordinary diligence in endeavoring to make a sale of the property; and the burden was upon them to show that such diligence had been exercised by them. The inherent weakness of the plaintiffs' case was their failure to show that they had in good faith assumed and carried out their part of the obligation before the defendant consummated a sale of the property without assistance of any kind from them.

There is no finding as to the time that elapsed between the signing of the memorandum by the defendant and the sale of the farm by him. There is no finding, and no evidence, that any expense was incurred by the plaintiffs in connection with the sale of the lands. There is no proof that any particular time was spent or effort was made by plaintiffs in endeavoring to effect a sale, except as appears in the findings of the court. There is an express finding by the court that plaintiffs "had not exhibited said farm to any purchaser or taken any steps to sell the same or incurred any expense therein, except that the plaintiff, John Schoenmann, had talked to one person with respect thereto, and expected to exhibit said farm to said person, but, before doing so, was notified by the defendant that the farm was already sold." How long this conversation took place after the writing was signed by the defendant does not appear. Neither does it appear whether the conversation was merely casual, or whether time and effort was consumed in looking up this particular person, or whether he had the ability or inclination to purchase the farm in question, or why he had not looked it over before the sale was made. The finding of the court negatives the idea that the plaintiffs had accepted their obligation by using any reasonable degree of diligence to make the sale of the farm. It is true the plaintiffs claim that the finding of the court in respect to efforts used by them to sell the farm is not a correct summary of, or conclusion to draw 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) from, the testimony in the case. The finding seems to embody every material thing that was testified to on the trial, with the possible exception of some evidence showing that one of the plaintiffs had communicated to the defendant the information that they expected to have a prospective purchaser look at the farm. It is very doubtful if this question is preserved by any proper exception to the findings of fact made by the court; but we do not deem the evidence of sufficient importance to change the result of our decision in any event.

Judgment affirmed.

Timlin, J., dissenting:

The contract was one for services in which the consideration necessary to support the contract is not the performance of the services, but the agreement to so perform. I think there was an acceptance of the written contract by the plaintiff; hence an agreement upon his part to perform. The opinion of the court seems to me to be in conflict with elementary principles of the law of contracts, and to confound failure to perform with lack of consideration.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

J. H. FULTON, Appt.

v.

A. P. LONGSHORE, Probate Judge.

(— Ala. —, 46 So. 989.)

Judge — disqualification — partisanship.

1. That a judge is an active partisan does not disqualify him to try a contested election one of the parties to which is a member of his political party.

Same — bias.

2. The mere fact that a judge expressed his opinion on election day that a challenged voter had a right to vote is not sufficient to show bias sufficient to disqualify him to sit in a contest between candidates at such election, as to which was entitled to the office.

(June 3, 1908.)

Case Note. — Political affiliations as ground for disqualification of judge.

Although there are many cases in which it has been sought to disqualify a judge by reason of personal interest, prejudice, bias, or hostility, having its source in political affairs, as, for example, where the matter in controversy is a protest against a list of nominees which includes the judge himself, or a contest over an election of another officer based upon the same ground as a contest pending against the election of the judge himself, there seems to be but APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County denying a writ of mandamus to compel the judge of the Probate Court to declare his disqualification to sit as judge in a contested election case. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McMillan & Hayne, Brown & Leeper, S. B. Weakley, and J. D. Weakley for appellant.

Messrs. Whitson & Dryer for appellee.

Tyson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was instituted for compelling the respondent thereto, by writ of mandamus, to certify his incompetency as judge of probate to hear and try a contested election case involving the title to the office of sheriff of his county. The contest over the right to the office is between the petitioner in this case, who is and was a Democrat, and one Norris, who is and was a Populist. It is shown by the petition, by the return thereto, and by the testimony that the respondent is, and was at the time of the election out of which the contest arose, a Populist. The grounds upon which it is sought to have him adjudged disqualified may be stated to be two: First, he had expressed the opinion, on the day of the election, to a proffered voter whose right to vote had been challenged, that he was qualified under the laws of the state to vote at the election; second, that he was an active and partisan supporter of the Populist candidate for sheriff, whose right to that office he is to hear and try as judge.

It is not contended that either of these asserted grounds would work a disqualification under the statute (Civil Code 1896, § 2637); but it is insisted that they show prejudice and bias to such an extent as that the petitioner may not have a fair and impartial trial. At the common law, as now administered in England and in the United States, bias or favor, not the result of interest or relationship, is not supposed to exist. Says Mr. Blackstone: "For the law will not suppose a possibility of bias or favor in a judge who is already sworn to administer impartial justice and whose authority greatly depends upon that presumption and idea." In Turner v. Com. 2 Met. (Ky.) 626, the court said: "At common law there were but two objections that went to the disqualification of a judge to try a cause, to wit, interest in his own behalf in the result or being of kin to others interested therein." In Re Peyton, 12 Kan. 407, the court said: "It will be admitted that at common law, prejudice did not disqualify a judge." In Conn v. Chadwick, 17 Fla. 439, this language was used: "In the time of Bracton and Fleta, a judge might be refused for good cause; but at the common law, as administered in England and the United States for centuries, judges and justices could not be challenged. There were disqualifying causes, such as interest and being of kin to the party." For a general statement of this principle, though it is, perhaps, not entirely accurate, see the text in 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 582, and 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. p. 738. In the note to these works will be found many adjudged cases, where the courts have applied this principle and held the judge not disqualified on account of bias or prejudice, where no relationship or personal interest was shown, even though there existed bitter feeling and animosity between him and one of the litigants to the cause pending in his court.

No case in this state has been cited where this court has ever held to the contrary of the common rule as announced above. In some of them it has been held—and properly so—that the disqualifying interest need not necessarily be a pecuniary one, but may be a personal one to the judge. An illustration of this may be found in the case of Medlin v. Taylor, 101 Ala. 239, 13 So. 310, where the judge was personally interested in a pending cause involving the same contestations that were being tried in Medlin's Case. In Ex parte Cornwell, 144 Ala. 497, 39 So. 354, the disqualification of the judge one case in addition to FULTON v. LONGSHORE which discusses the effect of party affiliations alone to disqualify a judge in the absence of any allegation of personal interest, prejudice, bias, or hostility except as it may be implied by the very fact of his party affiliations.

In Powers v. Com. 114 Ky. 237, 70 S. W. 644, 71 S. W. 494, 1050, in which the specific holding was that, if the judge had conceived and entertained such a feeling of hostility and prejudice against the accused, it was sufficient to disqualify him, the court went on to state that it did not mean to be understood as saying that a judge of one political faith might not properly try a case of a litigant of a different political faith, though the question involved was one purely political; or that the mere fact that a different political belief or affiliation was a legal ground for objecting to a trial judge. The court also said that it did not believe that the political views of judicial officers ever controlled their decisions upon matters of law before them for adjudication, though cases might arise where a judge would be disqualified in fact and in law from properly presiding at a trial by an undue bias growing out of a political controversy, as well as any other controversy.

was placed distinctly upon the point—as it was in the Medlin Case, supra—of personal interest in the subject-matter of the prosecution, in that, “by the alleged misconduct of the petitioner, he was made to suffer a loss in property,—money deposited in the bank,” whose assets the petitioner was charged with embezzling. Indeed, the disqualification might well have been placed distinctly upon the point of the pecuniary interest of the judge, since, under the statute, had the prosecution terminated in a conviction, a judgment in favor of the bank could well have been rendered against the petitioner for the sum shown to have been embezzled by him. Crim. Code 1896, § 5052. In Ex parte State Bar Asso. 92 Ala. 118, 12 L.R.A. 134, 8 So. 768, is an able and exhaustive opinion, reviewing many of the authorities, upon the question of the character of interest that will disqualify a judge. It is there said: “The interest which will disqualify must be a pecuniary one, or one affecting the individual rights of the judge.” In that case it was held that Judge Head was not disqualified, notwithstanding he was a member of the association (contributing to its maintenance and support) which instigated and instituted the prosecution which he was to try. That prosecution, it was held, involved no pecuniary or personal interest of the judge. Many opinions of other courts are cited, which clearly sustain the conclusion. Indeed, we regard that case, and those cited approvingly, as conclusive of the question that no pecuniary or personal interest is here shown which will disqualify the respondent. He can have no possible pecuniary interest in the result of the contest over the sheriff’s office, nor does the contestation in any possible way affect any of his individual or personal rights. It cannot be supposed that the interest he felt, as a party man, for the success of the Populist ticket, would influence him in the discharge of his sworn duty to try the case fairly and impartially. The law tolerates no such supposition or presumption, and therefore it can have no legal existence. Such a presumption could only be indulged upon legal grounds of disqualification. The interest which a judge may have as a citizen in a public question is not a personal one. This is fully illustrated in the cases cited and quoted from in the case last above cited.

It remains now only to dispose of the first ground above set forth, relied on for a disqualification. It was open to the trial judge, under the evidence in this case, to find that the opinion expressed by respondent was upon a statement of facts made to him which clearly showed that the voter was qualified to vote at the election, and that 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the opinion was expressed without knowing for whom the voter intended to cast his vote. Clearly no legal disqualification was shown here. The question of the propriety of the conduct of respondent as a citizen, in view of his judicial position, with respect to making partisan political speeches and the like, is not one for the courts, but for the electorate of his county.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

SIGMUND ROMAN, Appt.,

v.

MONTGOMERY IRON WORKS et al.

(— Ala. —, 47 So. 136.)

Judgment — garnishment — direct proceeding — effect.

A judgment discharging a subscriber to the stock of a corporation as garnishee for its debt upon failure of the plaintiff to contest his answer denying indebtedness is res judicata of the question of indebtedness in a subsequent direct proceeding by the creditor against him to apply his individual stock subscription to the payment of the corporate indebtedness.

(Dowdell and Denson, JJ., dissent.)

(February 20, 1908.)

Case Note. — Judgment in favor of garnishee as res judicata.

In most jurisdictions the principal debtor is not a party to a garnishment proceeding to such an extent that a judgment in favor of the garnishee in such a proceeding may be used by the garnishee as a bar to a proceeding by the debtor in which the same liability or right to property is in issue as was in issue in the garnishment proceeding.

In Illinois it is expressly provided by statute that, if a person is summoned as garnishee, a judgment shall be no bar to an action brought against him by the defendant (the judgment debtor), for the same demand. Finch v. Alexander County Nat. Bank, 65 Ill. App. 337.

A statute is also to be found in Vermont which provides that, if a trustee is discharged in the trusteeship proceedings, the trustee’s suit is no bar to an action by the principal debtor. Gen. Stat. p. 314, § 58; Laport v. Bacon, 48 Vt. 176.

A similar statute is also to be found in Maine. Webster v. Adams, 58 Me. 317.

In Pennsylvania it seems that the principal debtor is, by rule, excluded from taking interest or part in a proceeding by his creditor to reach his money or property in the hands of a third person. It is therefore

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the City Court of Montgomery in defendant's favor in a suit to apply unpaid subscriptions of stockholders of the Montgomery Iron Works in satisfaction of its debt to plaintiff. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was the holder of certain bonds of the Montgomery Iron Works. He secured judgment on them, and execution thereon was returned "No property." To aid in the collection of these judgments, plaintiff garnished Messrs. J. W. Dimmick, A. M. Baldwin, and G. W. Craik, stockholders in the corporation, alleging that their stock subscriptions were unpaid. The garnishment was not fruitful for reasons stated in the opinion, and plaintiff thereupon instituted this proceeding as a creditors' bill to reach the amount still remaining due on stock subscriptions.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Gunter & Gunter, for appellant:

That the garnishee moved for his discharge after a contest was filed, but, before trial, the plaintiff took a nonsuit, did not amount to a plea in bar as res judicata.

Sharpe v. Wharton, 85 Ala. 225, 3 So. 787; held in that state that judgment in favor of the garnishee cannot be used by him as a bar to an action by the principal debtor relating to the same subject-matter as that litigated in the garnishment proceeding. Ruff v. Ruff, 85 Pa. 333.

To the same effect are Lewis v. Tams, 4 Phila. 276 (action by another creditor), and Hukill v. Yoder, 29 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 94.

In Alexander v. Segee, 101 Me. 561, 64 Atl. 1049, it was said that, where no service of a writ had been made upon the principal defendant, and he had no opportunity to be heard upon the question of the jurisdiction of the court, or the liability of the trustee, he could not be concluded by any decisions adverse to him which might be made respecting either of these questions.

Where, however, the question of the effect of a judgment in favor of a garnishee defendant arises in another action by the same plaintiff, in which it is sought to relitigate the issues which were once decided in favor of the garnishee, being substantially the question passed upon in ROMAN v. MONTGOMERY IRON WORKS, it has been held, as it was in that case, that the judgment is a bar to any subsequent action.

Thus, in Nelke v. Boldridge, 43 Mo. App. 333, on a creditor's bill to reach property in the hands of a third person, which it was claimed had been fraudulently transferred by the debtor to such third person, the court held that judgment in favor of a garnishee defendant upon his answer in a prior garnishment proceeding relating to the same subject-matter, and by the same creditor, was a final judgment upon the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

American Mortg. Co. v. Inzer, 98 Ala. 608, 13 So. 507; 1 Freeman, Judgm. §§ 127, 257; 1 Black, Judgm. §§ 242, 593; Munday v. Vail, 34 N. J. L. 418; Griel v. Loftin, 65 Ala. 591; Wise v. Falkner, 45 Ala. 473; McAbee v. Parker, 83 Ala. 169, 3 So. 521; Baldwin v. Roman, 132 Ala. 323, 31 So. 596; Harrison v. Nixon, 9 Pet. 503, 9 L. ed. 208; Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 254, 35 L. ed. 464, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 773; Lincoln Nat. Bank v. Virgin, 36 Neb. 735, 38 Am. St. Rep. 747, 55 N. W. 218; Spoors v. Coen, 44 Ohio St. 497, 9 N. E. 132; Sheldon v. Newton, 3 Ohio St. 494.

The plea must conclusively show that the judgment pleaded as a bar, was rendered on the merits of the new suit.

Burgess v. Sugg, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 341; McCall v. Jones, 72 Ala. 371; 2 Black, Judgm. § 593; Griel v. Loftin and Baldwin v. Roman, supra; Jennings v. Pearce, 99 Ala. 303, 13 So. 605.

Mr. Massey Wilson for appellees.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this cause was here upon former appeal (147 Ala. 434, 41 So. 811) we held merits, and was therefore necessarily a bar to the creditors' bill.

Fulton v. Gesterding, 47 Fla. 150, 36 So. 56, also seems to recognize that, if the same subject-matter has once been litigated in a garnishment proceeding, it will be a bar to a subsequent action relating to the same matter by the same plaintiff. It was, however, held in this case that the garnishee, in pleading and using such former garnishment suit as a bar, had not sufficiently shown that it was precisely the same subject-matter that had been litigated in the former suit, and that, therefore, it would not operate as a bar to the second action.

But Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Horton, 68 N. H. 235, 44 Atl. 296, said that, after the discharge of a trustee in a trustee action, there is nothing to prevent the money in the hands of the trustee from being paid over to the principal defendant, and therefore a third party could attach it and have it applied on his claim; and, this being true, it was held that there was no reason why the plaintiff in the original action could not again bring trusteeship proceedings in a new suit on another cause of action to reach the same property, and that the former discharge would not be a bar to the action. The proceedings in this action related to wages due the principal defendant, and which he claimed to be exempt from garnishment or attachment.

In Hilliard v. Burlington Shoe Co. 76 Vt. 57, 56 Atl. 283, it was held that a verdict in favor of the garnishee in a proceeding in which the principal defendant was not served with process was not binding and res judicata as between the principal defendant and the plaintiff as to any issues tried therein.

that the plea of res judicata interposed by Dimmick was sufficient, and, as its averments were admitted, he was entitled to his discharge. We are still of the opinion that the judgment rendered, discharging him upon the denials of his answer, was conclusive on this particular creditor (Roman), and that there was nothing owing from Dimmick to the Montgomery Iron Works. Had the complainant contested the answer, there could be no question as to the conclusiveness of the judgment. On the other hand, when the garnishee filed his sworn answer denying indebtedness, the plaintiff had the right to contest it, and, failing to do so, he in effect conceded that it was true, and the garnishee was entitled to his discharge. Hurst v. Home Protection F. Ins. Co. 81 Ala. 174, 1 So. 209. And a judgment so rendered was an adjudication by the court as to an indebtedness vel non. It was a finding upon the only issue involved in the controversy, and was to all intents and purposes a judgment upon the merits. It is true that a judgment of nonsuit or dismissal in a garnishment case would conclude nothing but costs. Wise v. Falkner, 45 Ala. 471. But the failure of the creditor to contest the answer, and who in the meantime permits the court to proceed to judgment, is unlike the mere dismissal of the garnishment, but is in effect an admission of the recitals of the answer. And a judgment rendered thereon for the plaintiff, if the answer admitted indebtedness, would be conclusive between the immediate parties, and one rendered for the garnishee, when the answer denied indebtedness, would also be conclusive as between the creditor and the garnishee.

The creditor makes the only issue the law contemplates, by making the affidavit which is the institution of the suit, and which charges the garnishee with being indebted, etc., to the debtor. If the garnishee admits the charge by his answer, the plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment against him, and there would be no room to question the conclusiveness of the judgment. If he denies the indebtedness, that merely puts upon the plaintiff the burden of proving his charge, which he can do by contesting the answer, and failing to do so is no failure to present an issue, as the issue was previously presented, but is a declination on his part to prove the one and only issue involved. And a judgment rendered for the garnishee would be as conclusive as one rendered for the plaintiff, when the indebtedness was admitted by the answer. Our court, in the case of Steiner Bros. v. First Nat. Bank, 115 Ala. 379, 22 So. 30, speaking through Brickell, Ch. J., in discussing judgments in gar-nishment suits, and the effect of same, says: "A garnishment, as it has often been defined and described in the course of judicial decision, is 'the institution of a suit by a creditor against the debtor of his debtor, and is governed by the general rules applicable to other suits adapted to the relative situation of the parties.' 1 Brickell, Dig. p. 173, § 276. Such being the nature and character of the proceeding, it follows necessarily that the judgment rendered, as between the parties, the plaintiff instituting it, and the garnishee standing in the relation of a defendant, has all the properties and qualities of finality and conclusiveness of a judgment rendered in any other civil suit. A judgment against the garnishee in favor of the plaintiff as finally and conclusively fixes and determines the liability of the garnishee and the rights of the plaintiff as if it had been rendered in a suit inter partes commenced in the ordinary mode of instituting civil suits; and such is in effect the declaration of the statute. Code 1886, § 2983. A judgment against the plaintiff, discharging the garnishee, the only final judgment which can be rendered in his favor, as conclusively adjudges that he was not subject to the process, was not the debtor of the plaintiff, and had not possession or custody or control of effects of such debtor. Either judgment, the one in favor of the plaintiff, or that in favor of the garnishee, concludes the rights of the parties in respect to the cause of action involved,—the matter of right asserted by the one and denied by the other."

The decree of the City Court is affirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

W. T. WALKER FURNITURE COMPANY, NY, Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM H. DYSON.

(32 App. D. C. 90.)

Appeal — exception — generality.

1. An exception that a charge is contrary to law is too general to be of avail on appeal.

Trespass — conditional sale — retaking property — force.

2. A conditional vendee of personalty, who, in the contract, agrees that, upon failure to make the requisite payments, the vendor may take possession of the property and remove the same, cannot recover against the vendor in trespass for using only the necessary force in retaking the property, requisite to overcome resistance wrongfully interposed by him.

(November 4, 1908.)

Case Note. — Right to employ force in retaking property sold conditionally.

As to liability for the abuse of the right to retake property sold conditionally, on breach of condition, see note to Flaherty v. Ginsberg, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1132.

The courts are not in entire harmony as to the right of a seller of property on conditional sale to employ force in retaking it. The note above mentioned shows that the seller would be liable if he abused the license given him to retake the property upon a breach of condition, and, applying that principle, the courts are unanimous that unnecessary force will render the seller liable for such damages as may result from the use of such excessive force.

In some jurisdictions the courts deny to the seller the right to exercise any degree of force in retaking property sold conditionally on breach of condition. Thus, in Pagan v. Drake Furniture Co. 73 S. C. 364, 53 S. E. 542, the seller was held liable for entering upon the premises of the purchaser on conditional sale of a tablecloth, and intimidating the purchaser by drawing a pistol and cursing her, and threatening to kick her, and using violence in seizing the cloth. It is not entirely clear whether the case was submitted to the jury on the theory that the seller would be liable only if the claim of the purchaser that the tablecloth was paid for were found to be true, or whether that was simply one of the elements entering into the question of the wrongfulness of the act and the amount of damages to be awarded therefor.

In Culver v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 645, 62 S. W. 922, a seller of rugs was held properly convicted of an assault upon the purchaser thereof by conditional purchase, for forcibly removing them on the theory that he had no right to exercise any degree of force in retaking the rugs on breach of condition. The clause in the agreement to pay the purchase price empowered the seller to take possession of and sell the rugs on default in payment of the purchase money and interest thereon. Upon the question whether the license thus given authorized the use of force, the court said: "Nor do we agree that he [the seller] was in possession of the rugs, by merely taking manual possession of the same in the room without her [the purchaser] consent. The room was her home, and it and all therein was in her possession, and she had a right to prevent appellant or anyone else from taking the goods that were in her possession in said room from the same without her consent; and ap- 19 L.R.A. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful seizure of property belonging to plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lorenzo A. Bailey, for appellant:

The contract was a license to enter and pellant had no right to forcibly eject her from the door, and so take his departure with her goods. In thus holding, we are not nullifying appellant's rights under the contract. This, as we understand it, only gave him authority to take possession with her consent, and not against her consent. If she improperly withheld this consent, the courts were open to him."

In Terry v. Williams, 148 Ala. 468, 41 So. 804, the fact that one, in borrowing money of pawnbrokers, entered into a contract with them for the purchase of certain property, by which the title was reserved to the seller, when, as a matter of fact, no property was purchased, but the property purported to have been purchased was then the property of the borrower, was held to give to the seller or lender no right to enter upon the premises of the buyer, and, in a rude, wanton, and reckless manner, possess himself of the property. For the application of this doctrine to a conditional sale see Stowers Furniture Co. v. Brake (Ala.) 48 So. 89.

While the specific question was not passed upon, it was stated in Ramey v. W. W. Kimball Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 597, 58 S. W. 471; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Conner, 111 Ky. 827, 64 S. W. 841, and C. F. Adams Co. v. Sanders, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1978, 66 S. W. 815, that the seller of property conditionally was not liable for retaking the same, unless in so doing he inflicted personal injury upon the purchaser by the use of force.

This doctrine was also apparently recognized in North v. Williams, 120 Pa. 109, 6 Am. St. Rep. 695, 13 Atl. 723.

A different rule was, however, applied in Lambert v. Robinson, 162 Mass. 34, 44 Am. St. Rep. 326, 37 N. E. 753, wherein the doctrine was enunciated and applied as to the right of a seller of property at a conditional sale to exercise force in retaking the same. That "a person who has a right to enter upon the land of another and there do an act may use what force is required for the purpose, without being liable to an action. If he commits a breach of the peace, he is liable to the commonwealth. If he uses excessive force, he is liable to a personal action for an assault." It was held that the evidence in this case was sufficient to authorize the submission to the jury of the question of excessive force.

While it does not appear what, if any, force was used in Wilmerding v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co. 122 Ga. 312, 50 S. E. 100, yet it does appear that the seller forcibly retook possession of property sold conditionally. The court, however, held that he was not liable for a trespass in so doing.

take the furniture upon default by the plaintiff; and that license was coupled with an interest in the goods, and was therefore irrevocable.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in trespass on a declaration in which plaintiff, William H. Dyson, averred that on May 25, 1906, he was the owner and possessor of certain household goods and furniture then lawfully in his possession and daily use in his dwelling house and home in this city, and that the defendant, the W. T. Walker Furniture Company, a corporation, through its officers, agents, and employees, on that day, with force and arms wrongfully came upon said premises and into said dwelling house and home, and wrongfully and unlawfully took and carried away said furniture.

The defendant interposed a plea of not guilty, and also averred a conditional sale between it and the plaintiff under the terms of which the goods mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration were the property of the appellant, the title to said goods being reserved until plaintiff had paid the stipulated sum of $66 for all of said goods, and that the amount then paid was $53, leaving a balance due of $13; that, under the terms of said conditional sale, the defendant was authorized and empowered to take possession of said goods and remove the same, and retain as rent for said goods all moneys theretofore paid on said contract by the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) plaintiff; that plaintiff in said contract agreed to "waive, relinquish, and release any trespass and right of action for damages whatsoever, which he could or might have against the defendant by reason of any matter or thing done in obtaining possession of said chattels."

The evidence of the plaintiff tended to show full payment for the furniture and compliance with the terms of the contract, and that the defendant's agents forcibly entered and carried away most of said furniture.

The defendant introduced the contract described in its plea, and its evidence tended to show a balance due under the contract, and that no more force was used in retaking the furniture than was reasonably necessary.

The plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment in the sum of $171.25 and defendant appealed.

At the close of the court's charge to the jury the defendant excepted to each part thereof "on the ground that the same was contrary to law." This exception was clearly too general to avail the defendant here. He should have stated the specific grounds for his exceptions, and thereby given the trial court an opportunity to pass upon them. If parties are to be permitted to avail themselves of such general exceptions, it is apparent that a reversal of a case may be asked on grounds not suggested to or considered by the trial court. This question has so recently been adverted to that it is not necessary to pursue it further here. McDermott v. Severe, 202 U. S. 600, 50 L. ed. 1162, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 709, affirming 25 App. D. C. 276; Brown v. Savings Bank, 28 App. D. C. 353; District of Columbia v. Duryee, 29 App. D. C. 327, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 675.

The appellant specifies as error the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury "that if, upon all the evidence, they believed that the goods taken by the defendant's employees were part of the goods received by the plaintiff from the defendant under the contract mentioned in the testimony, and that at the time of such taking the plaintiff had paid under said contract not more than $56, and that, in entering the plaintiff's house and in the taking and removal therefrom of said goods by the defendant's employees, they had used only such force as was reasonable and necessary, the verdict should be for the defendant."

That the clause in the contract authorizing the vendor to enter the premises of the vendee and take possession of and remove the goods mentioned in the contract, upon a breach of the terms thereof, constituted an irrevocable license coupled with an interest, is not open to question. The question, therefore, for determination, is, whether one who has given such a license can recover in trespass in a case where he wrongfully interposed resistance, and the vendor used only such force as was reasonably necessary in overcoming such resistance.

In the early case of Wood v. Manley, 11 Ad. & El. 34, the plaintiff sold a quantity of hay then on his land to the defendant, with license to enter and take the same. Subsequently plaintiff served upon defendant a written notice not to enter or commit any trespass on plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff having locked his gate, the defendant broke open the same, entered, and carried away the hay. Lord Denman, Ch. J., in passing upon the case, said: "Mr. Crowder's argument goes this length: That, if I sell goods to a party who is by the terms of the sale to be permitted to come and take them, and he pays me, I may afterwards refuse to let him take them. The law countenances nothing so absurd as this. A license thus given and acted upon is irrevocable."

Hodgden v. Hubbard, 18 Vt. 504, 46 Am. Dec. 167, was an action for assault and battery, brought by one who had fraudulently obtained possession of certain personal property, and from whom such property had been forcibly retaken by agents of the vendor. The court said: "Whoever is guilty of a breach of the peace, or of doing unnecessary violence to the person of another, although it may be in the assertion of an unquestioned and undoubted right, is liable to be prosecuted therefor. But the fraudulent possessor is not the protector of the public interest. . . . The plaintiff had no lawful possession, nor any right to resist the attempt of the defendants to regain the property, of which he had unlawfully and fraudulently obtained the possession. By drawing his knife he became the aggressor, inasmuch as he had no right thus to protect his fraudulent attempt to acquire the stove, and the possession of the same, and it was the right of the defendants to hold him by force, and, if they made use of no unnecessary violence, they were justified; if they were guilty of more, they were liable."

In Walsh v. Taylor, 39 Md. 592, the facts were quite similar to the facts in this case. The court said: "The contract, the construction of which was for the court, plainly gave the defendant an irrevocable license, or, rather a license coupled with an interest; and, as such, the plaintiff could not withdraw from it, and hold the defendant as a trespasser for doing what she had agreed he might do with impunity."

tion in tort for entering and breaking plaintiff's close, and for assault. The plaintiff was in possession of certain articles of household furniture under an agreement, the terms of which were similar to the terms of the agreement in the present case. The acts complained of were committed by the defendants in retaking the furniture. The court ruled that the defendants, having a right to enter and remove the furniture, were entitled to use such force as was reasonably necessary, and that they were only liable in case they used excessive force; and "that a person who has a right to enter upon the land of another and there do an act may use what force is required for the purpose, without being liable to an action. If he commits a breach of the peace, he is liable to the commonwealth. If he uses excessive force, he is liable to a personal action for an assault."

To the same effect are White v. Elwell, 48 Me. 360, 77 Am. Dec. 231, and Willoughby v. Northeastern R. Co. 32 S. C. 410, 11 S. E. 339.

Jones, in his Treatise on Landlord and Tenant (at § 558), says: "It may be stated as a general rule that, though an entry by force might subject a landlord to penalties for a breach of the law criminally, it confers no right of action on the tenant thus holding without any right of possession" § 561. "The Colorado statute takes away the right that existed at common law to make entry by force, although the right to possession may exist. Yet a license reserved in the lease to make such an entry does not contravene the statute, and, under such a provision, the landlord may enter and remove a tenant upon condition broken, if he use no unnecessary force to accomplish his purpose." The same author alludes to the rulings in Ambrose v. Root, 11 Ill. 497, 52 Am. Dec. 456, and Fabri v. Bryan, 80 Ill. 182, to the effect that, although courts will not lend their aid to enforce a contract to accomplish something prohibited by law, an agreement authorizing an entry without liability as a trespasser for the use of force is not an agreement to do an unlawful act; and that a party acting under such a contract would be liable criminally for a breach of the peace, but not liable in a civil action for assault and battery.

In this case the plaintiff authorized the defendant to retake the goods in the plaintiff's possession upon a breach of the conditions of the contract. If the jury should find that a breach of the contract had occurred, and that the defendant used only such force as was reasonably necessary in overcoming the resistance the plaintiff thus wrongfully interposed, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action. If, on the other hand, the jury should determine that there had been no breach of the terms of the contract, and that the plaintiff had paid for the furniture, then the defendant was a trespasser and liable to respond in damages.

Such contracts are burdensome and often oppressive, but, in the absence of fraud, the vendee is himself responsible for the situation, for he signed the contract. The liability to original prosecution and the certainty of being required to respond in damages for an abuse of the license thus obtained, will deter vendors from the use of force. The defendant was entitled to the instruction requested, and, therefore, the judgment must be reversed with costs and the case remanded for a new trial.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

HEMMER, Plff. in Certiorari,
v.

ROBERT BONSON, District Judge.

(— Iowa, —, 117 N. W. 257.)

Certiorari — erroneous decree — who entitled to.

1. A consent decree in an action under the statute by a citizen to enjoin the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, of which he fails or refuses to seek correction by appeal, may be reviewed under a writ of certiorari at the suit of any citizen, upon a proper showing of his qualifications.

Same — interest.

2. The owner of property adjoining that on which is maintained a liquor nuisance has sufficient interest to be entitled to seek a writ of certiorari to review a consent decree in a suit by a citizen to enjoin the maintenance of the nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community.

Same — motive.

3. That the real motive of an interested person in applying for a writ of certiorari to review a decree in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, is to compel the purchase of his property at an exorbitant price, cannot be considered by the court as a reason for denying the relief.

Same — extraneous matters.

4. Neither the oral statements of a judge in entering a decree enjoining the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which by its terms, permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, nor the interpretation which the parties have put upon the decree, can be considered upon a petition for a writ of certiorari to correct the decree.

(July 9, 1908.)

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment of the District Court for Dubuque County enjoining the maintenance of a liquor nuisance. Annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Graham and Andrew P. Gibbs for petitioner.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Briefly stated, the case is as follows: In April, 1907, one Thorne, a citizen of Dubuque, began an action in equity, alleging that certain persons, named as defendants therein, were maintaining a liquor nuisance on lot No. 295, in said city, and asking that the same be enjoined, as provided by statute. To this petition the parties charged with maintaining the nuisance appeared and defended, and, after due hearing, the court found that the allegations of the petition had been sustained, and entered a decree of perpetual injunction in words as follows (omitting title):

Case Note. — Who is entitled to invoke certiorari to review a decree or order affecting the sale of intoxicating liquors?

Whatever the general rule may be as to the issuance of the writ of certiorari at the demand of one who was not named as a party to the proceedings in which the judgment or order sought to be reviewed was entered, if it is true, as was said in HEMMER v. BONSON, that when the matter to be reviewed is one which affects the public generally, an individual citizen may ordinarily invoke the remedy of certiorari, it would seem that the rule allowing an individual such right would be especially applicable to cases involving the sale of intoxicating liquors; and it is probably for this reason that it has been generally held that where a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors is granted by a body not having the authority to do so, a writ of certiorari may be allowed at the instance of persons who are mere residents and taxpayers of the municipality, and who had remonstrated before the local body against its action, although there is some conflict of opinion on the question of the necessity of the remonstrance.

This is clearly so held in State, Dufford, Prosecutor, v. Staats, 54 N. J. L. 286, 23 Atl. 667; and was evidently also recognized in State, Dufford, Prosecutor, v. Nolan, 46 N. J. L. 87; and State, Austin, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. L. 118, 3 Atl. 65.

In State, White, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 62 N. J. L. 644, 42 Atl. 170, it was held that where a license to sell intoxicating liquors has been granted by a municipal body contrary to law, such action may, in the dis-

"Now, on this June 12, 1907, a regular day of said court, the above-entitled cause came on for hearing, J. C. Chalmers appearing as counsel for plaintiff, and H. Michel appearing as counsel for defendants, and the court, after duly considering the pleadings, proof offered, and statements of counsel, finds, in pursuance thereof, the allegations of plaintiff's petition to be sustained in the particulars hereinafter specially enjoined: It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the defendant occupants, Schaffhauser Bros., be and are hereby perpetually enjoined from maintaining and continuing the condition complained of in the saloon upon the premises described as city lot No. 295, in the city of Dubuque, county of Dubuque, and state of Iowa, to the extent and in the particulars as follows: (1) From permitting or making sales of intoxicating liquors therein, or elsewhere, in any saloon in the nineteenth judicial district, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, or on the evening of such day, or general election days, and on Christmas. (2) From making sales of such liquors earlier than 5 o'clock A. M., or making sales later than 11 o'clock P. M., during the week days. (3) From knowingly making sales of such liquors to men who have taken the so-called cures for drunkenness, minors, and drunkards. (4) From the sale of such liquors to any person whose wife, husband, parent, child, brother, sister, guardian, ward over fourteen years of age, or employer shall, by written notice, cretion of the court, be reviewed on certiorari, at the instance of a citizen and taxpayer of such municipality, although he had not remonstrated before the local body against its action. The court said: "It has usually happened in such cases that the party applying for the writ has not only been a resident and a taxpayer, but also that he has remonstrated before the local body against its action. But the fact that the applicant for the writ has been a remonstrant against the action complained of, although it may be persuasive in determining whether or not his application should be granted, is not jurisdictional. The fact that the applicant is a resident and taxpayer, without more, is sufficient to justify the action of the court in allowing the writ."

In State ex rel. Campbell v. Heege, 37 Mo. App. 338, it was held that after the refusal by the attorney general of the state and by the prosecuting attorney of the county to institute proceedings, due to the views taken by them of their scope of duty, a writ of certiorari may be granted upon application of assessed, tax-paying citizens of the township, who had filed a remonstrance, to review the alleged illegal action of the county court in granting a certain dramshop license. The court took occasion to say: "Our statutes relating to dramshop licenses recognize the principle that the granting of a dramshop license is of interest to the assessed, tax-paying citizens of the cities, towns, or municipal townships, by making it a condition precedent to the granting of such license that the applicant shall support his application by the petition of at least a majority of the tax-paying citizens of the city, incorporated town, or municipal township containing twenty-five hundred inhabitants or more; and we think we merely carry out the policy of this statute in recognizing the right of citizens of the municipality or township remonstrating against the issuing of the license to remove the record of the county court to a superintending court, for the purpose of having the question determined whether it has been granted in a case within the jurisdiction of the county court." 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A similar case and holding to the same effect is State ex rel. Hill v. Moore, 84 Mo. App. 11. In this case, however, it was contended that because no remonstrance had been filed it was distinguishable from the Heege Case. The court, however, said that the dramshop act failed to disclose any right of the tax-paying citizens to file a remonstrance against the granting of dramshop licenses, or, by any form of protest, to become in any sense parties to the record; such proceedings being purely ex parte.

In State ex rel. Ferry v. Williams, 41 N. J. L. 332, 32 Am. Rep. 219, it was held that a citizen who desires to inspect recommendations filed with the collector of taxes as the basis for issuing pending liquor licenses, in order to ascertain whether the provisions of the law have been observed, is entitled to mandamus to compel the exhibition of such letters. The court, after reviewing a number of cases relevant to this question, said: "These cases seem to indicate that with us the exception to the rule is extended so far as to justify this court in acting by mandamus, certiorari, or quo warranto, at the instance of private persons, for the redress or prevention of public wrongs by public bodies and officers whose official sphere is confined to some political division of the state, whenever the applicant is one of the class of persons to be most directly affected in their enjoyment of public rights, and the public convenience will be subserved by the remedy desired."

In McCreary v. Rhodes, 63 Miss. 308, it was held that a qualified voter of a city, who appears before the municipal authorities of such city some time after the filing of a petition for a license to retail liquor, but before final action thereon, and objects to the issuance of such license, thereby becomes connected with the proceedings sufficiently to enable him to prosecute a writ of certiorari to have the same reviewed.

In Darling v. Boesch, 67 Iowa, 702, 25 N. W. 887, it was held that, under a provision of the Code permitting any resident of the county to appear and show cause why a permit to sell intoxicating liquors should not be granted to an applicant therefor, such person forbid the same. (5) From having any obscene pictures in said saloon. (6) From permitting gambling with cards, dice, billiards, by bowling, or by maintaining slot machines, in said saloon, or permitting music, dancing, or other like form of entertainment therein. (7) From establishing or conducting any new saloon without first obtaining a resolution of the city council of the city of Dubuque consenting thereto, and filing same with the county auditor. (8) From having any women employed in said saloon, from serving any free lunches therein, and from conducting said saloon otherwise than in a quiet, orderly manner. (9) From conducting a saloon on the premises described herein, or elsewhere in this nineteenth judicial district of Iowa, while holding any township, town, city, or county office to which he may hereafter be elected. (10) From allowing any wine rooms in or as a part of said saloon. (11) From the sale of such liquors in the saloon on the premises herein described, in any other than a single room, and from erecting or maintaining screens or blinds in front of said saloon or obstructing the view from the street, except that blinds or screens not more than 5 feet in height, measuring from the sidewalk, may be maintained during the times when sales are not otherwise herein prohibited. (12) The defendant owner, Geo. Schaffhauser, is hereby perpetually enjoined from knowingly permitting any violation of the terms of this decree in the saloon upon the said described premises. (13) Judgment is hereby rendered against the defendant occupant Schaffhauser Bros. for the costs of this action, taxed at $—, including the statutory attorney's fee of $25 for plaintiff's attorney, and the same shall be and remain a lien against the premises herein described until fully paid, and execution shall issue therefor unless sooner paid.

"Robert Bonson, Judge of said court."

It will be observed that this decree does not enjoin the defendants from continuing to keep and sell intoxicating liquors upon the premises; but, on the contrary, in form and substance, it presupposes the continuance of the business. The injunction goes no further than to regulate such business in certain particulars. It does not recite or find that the provisions of the mulct law, so called, had ever been complied with by the county or state, or that the defendants had in any manner attempted to observe the conditions necessary to entitle them to the in effect becomes a party to any proceeding for the granting of a permit to sell such liquors, and therefore, in a proper case, is entitled to have the proceedings reviewed on certiorari, although he has no pecuniary or property interest that is affected by the action of the board.

It has been held, however, that where no one signed a counter petition against the issuance of the license, and no objections whatsoever had been made, a number of the qualified voters of the town are not so connected with the proceedings as to enable them to invoke the common-law writ of certiorari, and thereby have reviewed the proceedings of the board of mayor and aldermen, who had granted the license. McCreary v. O'Flinn, 63 Miss. 204.

In Stokes v. Wall, 112 Ga. 349, 37 S. E. 383, it was held that the granting by municipal authorities of a license to sell intoxicating liquors is not reviewable at the instance of a citizen and taxpayer who undertakes, as such, to sue out a certiorari for this purpose, when there is no provision of law authorizing him to contest the granting of such license, or to become in any manner a party to the application therefor. It appeared in this case also that the petitioner had appeared at the meeting of the town council when the license was granted, and objected to the granting of the same. The court, however, after distinguishing McCreary v. Rhodes, supra, on the ground that a statute in Mississippi permitted, on the filing of a petition for a license to retail liquor, the presentation of a counter petition by one or more legal voters of the town, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said: "If he had a right to appear at a meeting of the town council, and object to a license being granted to an applicant therefor, and, upon his objection being disregarded, to sue out a writ of certiorari, every other citizen and voter of the town had the same right; and to permit the official acts of the mayor and council to be interfered with in such manner would be intolerable, and contrary to all precedent, so far as we know."

In Deberry v. Holly Springs, 35 Miss. 385, it was held that although at common law none but a party to the record or judgment could maintain the writ of certiorari, under a statute permitting any person who feel themselves aggrieved by the judgment of the board of police to appeal by certiorari to the circuit court, the corporate authorities of the town were proper parties to appeal by certiorari from an order of the board of police granting a license to retail spirituous liquors within the limits of the corporation.

It would seem almost naturally to follow that where the order granting one the privilege of selling intoxicating liquors causes some peculiar, individual injury, as was the case in HEMMER v. BONSON, such person injured would have the right to invoke the writ of certiorari to review the proceedings.

A case of this nature is Dexter v. Cumberland, 17 R. I. 222, 21 Atl. 347, reviewed and sufficiently set out in HEMMER v. BONSON.

In Rhode Island Soc. v. Budlong (R. I.) 25 Atl. 657, it was held that a society which had become a party to the proceedings by appearing in pursuance of the notice given by protection of said statute. While enjoining some of the acts forbidden by the statute, it directly or inferentially permits others which are no less positively forbidden, even where the mulct law is in force. See Code, § 2448. For instance, it not only leaves the defendants at liberty to sell, but to continue the sales until 11 o'clock at night, to put up screens 5 feet high at the windows of the saloon, to provide the room with chairs, benches, and tables, to conduct the business without bond, and without the consent of the adjacent property owners, and in many other ways it ignores the express provisions of the statute. Thereafter, neither party named in said proceedings having appealed, and the time for such appeal having expired, the plaintiff herein, a citizen of the state and county, and owner of property adjoining the lot on which the business was being maintained, applied to this court for a writ of certiorari to review said decree. The writ being allowed and served, the judge presiding at the rendition of the decree made return and answer thereto as follows: "First, denies the jurisdiction of this court to consider and pass upon the validity of the decree; second, alleges that the writ is not sued out in good faith by the petitioner, but to compel the defendants in the decree to purchase her property at an exorbitant price; third, that the decree was entered by the consent of the parties and counsel, and with the oral statement of the court, and the understanding by all persons concerned, that it was not to be regarded as a permit or license to violate the law of the state."

Other matters are averred having no relevancy to the complaint made, except to make clear the good faith of the respondent; but, his good faith not having been assailed by the petitioner, and not being questioned by this court, we shall not take time to recite them here.

The first and only serious question suggested relates to the right of the petitioner, or any other person than the plaintiff named in the injunction proceeding, to sue out a writ for a review of the decree. It may be conceded that, as a general rule, certiorari will not issue at the demand of one who is not named as a party to the proceedings in which the judgment or order sought to be reviewed was entered. But this is by no means universally true. If the petitioner for the writ is a party in substance, though not in form, he may have the writ. So, the council, and filing its objection, and which owned land within 200 feet of the place for such a license for the sale of intoxicating liquor was requested, had such a special interest in the matter in issue as entitled it to file a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings of the city council in granting such license. At a later hearing of this case it was found that the petitioners in the above case did not own the land within 200 feet of the building for which the license was granted, and therefore, in Rhode Island Soc. v. Cranston, 21 R. I. 577, 44 Atl. 223, it was held the petitioner could not be regarded as a proper party any more than any other person who might see fit to object to the granting of the license.

Nor would there seem to be any question but that the person to whom the privilege for the sale of intoxicating liquors had been granted, had sufficient personal interest to institute certiorari to review a judgment or decree directly affecting his interests.

Thus, in State v. Robbins, 54 N. J. L. 566, 25 Atl. 471, it was held that the owner of an inn which had been licensed for several years at a nominal sum can prosecute a writ of certiorari to try the legality of an order for an election which is to determine whether or not a very much larger license fee is to be charged, since a direct private injury to his property is threatened by the proceedings attacked.

So, in Miller v. Jones, 80 Ala. 89, one to whom a license had been granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors was held to have sufficient individual interest in the subject-matter to permit him to apply to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari to review an election in favor of prohibition, held valid by the probate court.

However, in Lexington v. Sargent, 64 Miss. 621, 1 So. 903, where a person commenced a suit by certiorari to review and annul an ordinance or resolution of record, made by the town council, to the effect that, in accordance with the petition of a majority of the voters against the issuance of a license, no such license would be issued for twelve months, and where, besides the illegality of the petition and the disqualification of the mayor and council, he alleged that, prior to the filing of such petition, he had himself filed a petition for a license, signed by a majority of the legal voters, and conforming in every respect to the requirements of the statute, but did not allege that any final action had been taken on such petition, it was held that, as he was not a party to the proceeding sought to be reviewed, he was not entitled to maintain a writ of certiorari.

It is probably well to note that in several cases the court, without expressly passing on the question as to whether or not they were proper parties, has allowed writs of certiorari to review the jurisdiction of local bodies exercising the power of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors, at the instance of persons in the place where the license was to be operative; but, since it is impossible to tell from the cases who these persons were, or whether or not they had a special interest in the proceedings, the cases are of no practical value in this note, and have been expressly excluded.

also, if the matter to be reviewed is one which affects the public generally, an individual citizen may ordinarily invoke the remedy of certiorari. Collins v. Davis, 57 Iowa, 256, 10 N. W. 643; Goetzman v. Whitaker, 81 Iowa, 527, 46 N. W. 1058. For a still stronger reason it follows that the same remedy is open to the individual citizen who suffers peculiar injury by reason of a judgment or order entered in excess of jurisdiction. People ex rel. Sheridan v. Andrews, 52 N. Y. 445; Dyer v. Lowell, 30 Me. 217; State ex rel. Enderlin State Bank v. Rose, 4 N. D. 319, 26 L.R.A. 593, 58 N. W. 514; Tallon v. Hoboken, 60 N. J. L. 212, 37 Atl. 895; State, Danforth, Prosecutor, v. Paterson, 34 N. J. L. 163; State, Avon-by-the-Sea Land & Improv. Co., Prosecutor, v. Neptune City, 57 N. J. L. 362, 30 Atl. 529. While the injunction proceeding was brought in the name of an individual citizen, such plaintiff acted in a representative capacity only, and the decree rendered therein is primarily one for the protection of public interests. The plaintiff in such proceeding has neither the right nor the power to consent to the entry of a decree which shall operate as a license or permit for the maintenance of a nuisance for the abatement or prevention of which this remedy was created. The statute gives the right to maintain injunction proceedings to any citizen of the county. Code, § 2406. And if, having brought suit, the plaintiff permits an unauthorized decree to be entered to the prejudice of the public, and fails or refuses to seek its correction, we see no good reason why, under this provision, and under the principle we have approved in Goetzman v. Whitaker, supra, and other cases, any other citizen may not appear, and, upon proper showing of his qualifications, be permitted to have the same reviewed under a writ of certiorari.

Under the statute of Rhode Island making it necessary for an applicant for a liquor license to give notice of his application to the owners of land within 200 feet of the building where the business was to be carried on, it was held that an order granting license without the proper service of such notice could be reviewed upon certiorari at the suit of any owner within the prescribed limit, though not served with notice. In disposing of that case, the court says: "Certiorari lies not only to review the decisions of inferior courts, but also the determinations of special boards exercising a judicial power affecting the rights or property of citizens, when no other legal remedy is provided. It is not necessary that the applicant should be a party to the record, but only that he should be interested in the subject-matter upon which the record acts." 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dexter v. Cumberland, 17 R. I. 222, 21 Atl. 347. Under our own statute (Code, § 2448), a liquor dealer wishing to avail himself of the benefits of the mulct law must, among other conditions, obtain a written statement of consent therefor from all the resident freeholders owning property within 50 feet of the building where the business is carried on. The petitioner herein is the resident owner of the property adjoining the place where the liquor nuisance is maintained, and therefore, in addition to her interest as a representative of the public, she also has a special interest in the question whether such business shall be permitted within the prescribed distance of her premises. She thus comes clearly within the rule of the Rhode Island case, the propriety and justice of which cannot well be questioned. See also State ex rel. Campbell v. Heege, 37 Mo. App. 338.

We are therefore disposed to hold that the petitioner shows herself entitled to maintain this proceeding. We are also very clear that the objection made by the respondent, denying the good faith of the petitioner, and alleging that her real interest in suing out the writ is to compel the purchase of her property by the defendants, is one we are not authorized to consider. The motive with which such an action is brought is a matter of no materiality. The simple question presented in such proceeding is, first, whether the plaintiff is a citizen of the county, and therefore has the qualification which the statute provides; and, second, whether the defendants, are, in fact, conducting the business of keeping or selling intoxicating liquors, contrary to law, at the place described in the petition. These facts being found to exist, it is the plain duty of the court to enter a decree for the relief demanded, without any consideration whatever as to the motive which may have actuated the plaintiff to bring the suit. Motive and self-interest on part of one who prosecutes another for violation of law may always be considered as bearing upon the veracity and credibility of the complainant as a witness in the case, but they can never operate to release or excuse the offender from the penalty which the law affixes to his act. Neither can we consider the oral statements of the respondent at the time of entering the decree, nor the construction placed upon such decree by the parties thereto. We must look to the decree alone, in the light of the pleadings upon which it was rendered, and give it construction according to the ordinary and usual significance of the language employed. When thus read, it is, in effect, a license or permission for the defendants therein named to continue the business complained of, subject only to the restrictions which are there prescribed.

It is too clear for argument that such a decree is unauthorized by law, and that the district court, in entering it, acted in excess of its jurisdiction. If we may read between the lines of this record, it is not unfair to say that the decree appears to have been the result of a compromise between the persons seeking to enforce the statutes of the state against the illegal sale of intoxicants and those resisting such enforcement. The persons engaged in such prosecution may have been, and doubtless were, acting in entire good faith, and yielded to the compromise believing that, under the peculiar circumstances, it was better to obtain this much relief than to further continue the litigation. It is equally possible and probable that the court adopted a similar view of the situation, and ratified the agreement of the parties by entering the decree. But neither good faith nor upright intention can give validity to a decree which the court has no jurisdiction to enter. If the defendants were selling liquor in violation of law, as charged by the plaintiff, there was but one thing which the court was at liberty to do, and that was to enjoin such parties absolutely from the further prosecution of the business in any manner or form. If they were not maintaining a nuisance, then no relief should have been granted, and the case should have been dismissed. We think it unnecessary to pursue the discussion any further.

The writ must be sustained, and the decree of the District Court is annulled and the cause is remanded to the said court for further proceedings in harmony with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS, Appt.
v.
PHIL KEENER, Resp't.

Intoxicating liquor — police judge — notice.

Although the police judge of a city of the second class exercises judicial functions, he is not a repository of judicial power in the sense of article 3, § 1, Const., and the legislature has authority to require him to notify the county attorney of the fact of violations of the prohibitory liquor law which came to his notice or knowledge, and to furnish the county attorney the names of the witnesses by whom such violations may be proved, under penalty of a fine and forfeiture of his office.

(October 10, 1908.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Cherokee County quashing an information charging defendant with having violated the prohibitory liquor law of Kansas. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. S. Jackson, Attorney General, and E. B. Morgan, for appellant:

Police judges are municipal officers, and do not come within the usual meaning of the term "judicial officers."

State v. Young, 3 Kan. 445.

Messrs. J. N. Dunbar and Jes. F. Wolfe, for respondent:

The law, so far as it relates to the duty of a police judge to report violations of the state prohibitory liquor law to the county attorney, requires a purely judicial officer to perform duties that are intrinsically executive in their character, and that have no connection with, or even remote relation to, the duties pertaining properly to his office.

State ex rel. Godard v. Johnson, 61 Kan. 803, 49 L.R.A. 662, 60 Pac. 1068; Cooley, Case Note. — May judges of municipal or police courts be vested or burdened with powers or duties of a nonjudicial character?

The only case which has been found involving the specific question stated is that of People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Provines, 34 Cal. 520, in which it was held that a statute providing that the police judge of the city and county of San Francisco should act ex officio as police commissioner was not in contravention of a clause of the Constitution providing that "the powers of the government of the state . . . shall be divided into three separate departments, — the legislative, the executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercises of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." The court held that such constitutional provision refers to a restrictive division of the powers of the state government, and not of the local governments thereafter to be created by the legislature. The argument in support of this view is drawn from internal evidence afforded by the provisions of the Constitution, from the order and arrangement of the several parts, and from the reason and policy by which the provision in question was manifestly dictated.

Instances of the recognition of the broad rule that constitutional provisions relating to the separation of the departments of government refer to departments of the state government, and not to departments

This argument derives the power of the legislature to organize police courts and to provide for police judges from article 3, § 1, Const., which reads as follows: "The judicial power of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts, inferior to the supreme court, as may be provided by law." The section of the Constitution quoted is not the true source of the legislature's authority over the establishing of municipal courts. Such authority comes with the grant to the house of representatives and senate of all the legislative power of the state (Const. art. 2, § 1), which includes power to provide for the organization and government of cities. It is an elementary principle of constitutional law that restraints upon the power to organize and regulate municipal governments must be found in the Constitution or none exists, and the manner in which such power is exercised rests entirely in the discretion of the legislature. Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 268. The only limitations upon this power found in the Constitution of this state are that the legislature may not confer corporate power by special act, and must provide for the organization of cities, towns, and villages by general law. Const. art. 12, §§ 1, 5. There is, therefore, nothing to prevent the legislature from adopting any form of government for the cities of the state which it may deem wisest. In framing municipal charters, the legislature, itself a popular body, can scarcely escape the influence of the sentiments and settled habits, customs, and practices of the American people; but the problems of modern city government are novel and perplexing, and, so far as the Constitution is concerned, the legislature may vest all the executive, legislative, and judicial power of a city in a single person or body of persons if it should conclude that plan would best promote the public welfare, or it may apportion the various functions among different officials according to its own judgment of what the public good requires. Mayors' courts have been recognized by this court as lawful under the territorial government (State v. Young, 3 Kan. 445) and under the present Constitution (Prell v. McDonald, 7 Kan. 426, 12 Am. Rep. 423).

The principle involved has its foundation in the character and objects of municipal government which are essentially local. True, the government of a city is a matter which in a very important sense concerns the entire state, but the people of that city are the persons primarily affected, and their peculiar local needs and interests are ordinarily disconnected in legal thought from the needs and interests of the people of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

whole state taken collectively. It is a settled rule of constitutional interpretation that the grant of legislative power to the legislature excludes all other bodies from the exercise of that power. The grant to cities of legislative power respecting their local affairs to be exercised by means of ordinances does not contravene this rule because the regulation of those affairs is not regarded as a part of the state's business. "It has already been seen that the legislature cannot delegate its power to make laws; but, fundamental as this maxim is, it is so qualified by the customs of our race, and by other maxims which regard local government, that the right of the legislature, in the entire absence of authorization or prohibition, to create towns and other inferior municipal organizations, and to confer upon them the powers of local government, and especially of local taxation and police regulation usual with such corporations, would always pass unchallenged. The legislature in these cases is not regarded as delegating its authority, because the regulation of such local affairs as are commonly left to local boards and officers is not understood to belong properly to the state." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 264. Manifestly local courts erected to enforce local legislation and to carry out schemes of local government are to be regarded in the same manner. They are not a part of the state judicial system. To those courts the constitutional doctrine of the separation of powers applies, subject to the limitations which have been found to be necessary and unavoidable in the practical working out of our scheme of government. But a police court, organized for purposes of local municipal judicature, is not a repository of the judicial power referred to in the Constitution any more than a city council is a lawmaking body in the sense of the Constitution. The reasoning of Chief Justice Crozier in the case of State v. Young, supra, supports this view. He said: "But it is said that the enforcement of city ordinances is a judicial power, and that by the twenty-seventh section of the organic act the judicial power of the territory was vested exclusively in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. It is true that the administration of municipal ordinances is the exercise of a sort of judicial power, but it is no part of the judicial power contemplated by the section referred to. That section refers to the enforcement of the laws of the territory at large, and to that only. The courts therein named were to have the exclusive cognizance of all subjects arising directly under the laws of the legislature, or at common law, and in chancery; but it was not intended that in them alone could power to enforce city ordinances be deposited. Nor is the creation of municipal courts for the enforcement of municipal regulations inconsistent with this section, because the exercise of such power on the part of the legislature is not only not conferring judicial power within the meaning of this section, but is exercising authority over a rightful subject of legislation within the meaning of § 24." It may be true that the legislature has created city courts which are also state courts, but the court in question is not one of them and their status need now be discussed.

From what has been said it follows that the legislature had the right to impose upon the defendant the duties prescribed by the statute quoted, and the information was wrongfully quashed.

The defendant is much exercised over what his attitude might be if a complaint under a city ordinance were lodged with him for a violation of the liquor law which he had reported to the county attorney. It is sufficient to say that his conduct should be the same as in any other case in which he knows all the facts.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, with direction to overrule the motion to quash.

All the Justices concur.

v.

JOHN J. FLETCHER et al.

(—Kan.—, 98 Pac. 784.)

Joint wrongdoers — release — effect.

1. An acknowledgement by the plaintiff of satisfaction against two of several defendants, who are sued as joint wrongdoers, will not release the others, where the instrument offered to show such release shows that it was not intended to have such effect.

Same — construction.

2. Where such acknowledgment of satisfaction contains an express reservation of the right to proceed against the other joint wrongdoers, who are codefendants with those released, and other expressions in the instrument are not inconsistent with the retention of such right, the intention of the parties that the instrument should not operate as a release of such codefendants sufficiently appears.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas for Wyandotte County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted from the sale by defendants of intoxicating liquors to plaintiff's husband. Reversed.

Statement by Benson, J.:

The plaintiff, Carrie Eden, sued John J. Fletcher and twelve other defendants, including the municipality of Kansas City, Kansas, and the mayor and chief of police of that city, for damages resulting from the intoxication of her husband by liquors sold to him by the defendants at a place where it is alleged they maintained a common nuisance; that the defendant brewing companies furnished the liquors for such unlawful purpose; that the city received a sum each month from its codefendants in consideration of its permission to carry on such business; that the mayor and chief of police participated in this corrupt arrangement; and that thereby and because of the intoxication of her husband thus caused by the defendants her home had been ruined, and she had lost the means of support for herself and family, to her damage in the sum of $20,000. While a motion to set aside the service of summons upon the Val Blatz Brewing Company was pending, the plaintiff entered into a stipulation in this and other similar actions as follows: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between Case Note. — Effect, in release of one joint tortfeasor, of reservation of right as against others.

The earlier cases on this question are collected in the note to Abb v. Northern P. R. Co. 58 L.R.A. 293, referred to in the case reported, and therefore will not be herein reviewed in detail, but simply summarized with reference to the doctrines which they follow. The subsequently decided cases, however, are set forth more fully.

Some of such earlier cases hold that a release under seal of one joint tortfeasor will operate to discharge the others, although there is an express stipulation that such others shall not be thereby released. De-long v. Curtis, 35 Hun, 94; Babcock & W. Co. v. Pioneer Iron Works, 34 Fed. 338; Bronson v. Fitzhugh, 1 Hill, 185; O'Shea v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 44 C. C. A. 601, 105 Fed. 563. The reasoning upon which this doctrine is based is that the reservation is simply void as being repugnant to the legal effect and operation of the lease itself, which, being under seal, is deemed a complete satisfaction. Gunther v. Lee, 45 Md. 60, 24 Am. Rep. 504.

A similar reason has been given for attributing a like effect to releases not under seal, and reserving the right to proceed against other joint tortfeasors. Ruble v.

the parties to the above-entitled causes that the said causes be and the same are dismissed as to the defendants the Val Blatz Brewing Company and John Kremer. The plaintiff hereby acknowledging full satisfaction and payment for all damages, and injuries arising out of or in any manner connected with the causes of action in the petitions in these causes alleged against said company and said John Kremer. And the plaintiff further acknowledging full satisfaction and payment of any injuries or damages arising out of the matter set out in said petitions against the United States Brewing Company the same as if said brewing company had been made a party in the said petitions and these causes. The plaintiff hereby reserving and not in any manner waiving any rights or causes of action against any of the other defendants." Thereupon the plaintiff dismissed her action as to the Val Blatz Brewing Company and Kremer without prejudice. The defendant Fletcher then filed the following motion: "Comes now the defendant John J. Fletcher in each of the above-named actions, and moves the court to dismiss the said action and each of them for the following reasons, to wit: (1) Because, on or about the 15th day of September, A. D. 1906, the plaintiff in each of the above-entitled actions made a full accord, settlement, and satisfaction with defendants John Kremer and Val Blatz Brewing Company for all the injuries alleged and set forth in the petitions filed in said action, and received therefor the full Turner, 2 Hen. & M. 38; Mitchell v. Allen, 25 Hun, 543.

And it has likewise been held that, since the party injured can have but one satisfaction, a release of one joint tortfeasor, though expressly reserving a right of action against the others, will operate to discharge all. Seither v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 125 Pa. 397, 4 L.R.A. 54, 11 Am. St. Rep. 905, 17 Atl. 338; Williams v. LeBar, 141 Pa. 149, 21 Atl. 525; Smith v. Consolidated Gas Co. 36 Misc. 131, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1084; Johanson v. New York, 71 App. Div. 561, 76 N. Y. Supp. 119; Abb v. Northern P. R. Co. 28 Wash. 428, 58 L.R.A. 293, 92 Am. St. Rep. 864, 68 Pac. 954.

But other decisions attempt to carry out the evident intention of the parties in such agreements, by considering such a release as being merely executory, or a covenant not to sue. Matthews v. Chicopee Mfg. Co. 3 Robt. 711; Miller v. Fenton, 11 Paige, 20; Chamberlin v. Murphy, 41 Vt. 110; Duck v. Mayeu [1892] 2 Q. B. 511.

Since the compilation of the note above referred to, the following cases have been decided:

In Home Teleph. Co. v. Fields, 150 Ala. 306, 43 So. 711, it was held that, under §§ 1805 and 1806, Code 1896, providing that "all receipts, releases, and discharges in writing, whether of a debt of record, or a contract under seal, or otherwise, must have effect according to the intention of the parties thereto," and "all settlements in writing, made in good faith for the composition of debts, must be taken as evidence, and held to operate according to the intention of the parties," a release by which one of two joint tortfeasors paid a certain sum of money in partial satisfaction, and with the express understanding and agreement that it should not release the other joint tortfeasor did not do so, but operated only to release such other from liability pro tanto.

In Barnum v. Cochrane, 139 Cal. 494, 73 Pac. 242, a motion for an entry of satisfaction of a joint judgment rendered against two tortfeasors, based on an instrument releasing one of them, in consideration of a certain amount, from such judgment, "so 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) far as the same can be done without releasing or discharging" the other "from the payment of the balance thereof," was held to have been properly denied, since, if the legal effect of a release of one would be to release the other, such agreement, by force of its own limitations, was not a release; and if, on the other hand, the release of one did not in law release the other also, then necessarily such other still remained liable for the balance, and was not entitled to satisfaction of the judgment.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Averill, 224 Ill. 516, 79 N. E. 654, an agreement whereby a plaintiff, for a money consideration, dismissed a suit as to one joint tortfeasor, and wherein it was expressly agreed and understood that it should not be held or construed to be a release of any damages or right of action arising to the plaintiff by reason of any matters at that date existing, was held not to be a release, within the meaning of the rule that a release of one joint tortfeasor is a release of both, but to operate as a covenant not to sue.

In Gilbert v. Finch, 173 N. Y. 455, 61 L.R.A. 807, 93 Am. St. Rep. 623, 66 N. E. 133, it was held that the rule that a release of one joint tortfeasor operates as a release of all is founded upon a theory that a party is entitled to but one consideration for an injury sustained by him, and therefore does not apply where an instrument neither purposes nor is intended to be a full and complete settlement of the plaintiff's entire claim; so that, where the instrument expressly reserves the right to pursue the others, it is not technically a release, but a covenant not to sue, and does not operate to discharge them.

This decision is followed in Hirschfeld v. Alsberg, 47 Misc. 141, 93 N. Y. Supp. 617, and Morris v. North American Mercantile Agency Co. 53 Misc. 574, 103 N. Y. Supp. 761; and in Walsh v. Hanan, 93 App. Div. 580, 87 N. Y. Supp. 930, it was held to warrant a like holding as to an instrument under seal.

In Robertson v. Trammell, 98 Tex. 364, 83 S. W. 1098, an agreement to dismiss an action as against one joint tortfeasor, and sum of $400, and therefore agreed to and did dismiss all of said actions against the said John Kremer and the said Val Blatz Brewing Company, and thereby the said accord and satisfaction as to the defendants John Kremer and the Val Blatz Brewing Company did operate as a bar to the further prosecution of each and all of the cases aforesaid." This motion was heard over the objection of the plaintiff, who contended that the matters referred to therein should be pleaded in defense and could not properly be decided upon a mere motion. The motion was sustained, and the action dismissed. The plaintiff excepted and brings the case here for review.

Messrs. James M. Mason and E. E. Chesney, for plaintiff in error:

The discharge of one joint tortfeasor does not necessarily discharge all, contrary to the intention of the party, where there is an express reservation of a right to sue the others in the instrument.

Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McWherter, 59 Kan. 345, 53 Pac. 135; Johnson v. McCann, 61 Ill. App. 110; Barrett v. Third Ave. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 628; Sharpe v. Williams, 41 Kan. 56, 20 Pac. 497; Baker v. Lovett, 6 Mass. 78, 4 Am. Dec. 88; Nagle v. Hake, 123 Wis. 256, 101 N. W. 409; Zimmerman v. Smiley, 62 Neb. 204, 86 N. W. 1059; Abb v. Northern P. R. Co. 58 L.R.A.

not to make the cause of action a basis in a suit against it, but that, in the event of the further prosecution of the suit against the other defendant, such agreement should operate as a contract that such defendant should not be successfully sued, and that it should be understood that the plaintiff did not release either defendant from liability on the cause of action alleged, but merely agreed to hold the one harmless from any legal responsibility, was held to be a covenant not to sue, and not a release.

In El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Darr (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 166, it was held that a stipulation in a release given to one joint tortfeasor, that it shall in no wise affect any claim against the others, prevents it from operating to discharge such others.

In Carey v. Bilby, 63 C. C. A. 361, 129 Fed. 203, the court, after declaring its acceptance of the rule that a release wherein the right to proceed against joint tortfeasors is reserved does not operate to discharge them, as supported by the greater weight of authority and founded upon the better reasons, said: "Besides, we are not aware of any sufficient reason which should preclude a person who has sustained an injury through the wrongful act of several persons from agreeing with one of the wrongdoers, who desires to avoid litigation, to accept such sum by way of partial compensation for the injury as he may be willing to pay, and to discharge him from further liability, without releasing his cause of action as against the other wrongdoers. The law favors compromises generally, and it is not perceived that an arrangement of the kind last mentioned should be regarded with disfavor."

On the other hand, in McBride v. Scott, 132 Mich. 176, 61 L.R.A. 445, 102 Am. St. Rep. 416, 93 N. W. 243, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 61, a release containing a reservation of the right to proceed against other joint tortfeasors, and stipulating that the only benefit that they should receive by reason thereof would be by way of reduction pro tanto of the damages, was held to operate as a discharge of all. The court bases its decision less on the technical operation of the release than on the argument that to admit of a settlement with one joint tortfeasor, and to hold that a reservation of the right to proceed against others saves such right, would open the door for the plaintiff in any case to acquire by successive settlements more than just compensation.

And in Dulaney v. Buffum, 173 Mo. 1, 73 S. W. 125, where a receipt had been given in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims and demands on account of the matters and things set up or referred to in a petition in an action pending against several alleged joint tortfeasors, so far as the persons making the payments were concerned, it being agreed to discontinue and dismiss said suit so far as such persons were concerned, it was held that a verbal understanding that such instrument should not operate as a release of the other joint tortfeasors would not prevent it from operating to discharge them.

In Gilbert v. Timms, 28 Ohio C. C. 107, it was held that a settlement with one joint tortfeasor, in making which the plaintiff expressly stipulated that he reserved all rights to prosecute his action against the other and recover such damages as he might be able to show had accrued to him in excess of the amount so received, nevertheless operated as a release of the other joint tortfeasor, where the action was for unliquidated damages, although it was suggested that there may be a distinction where the damages are measurable under fixed rules of law rather than by the discretion of the jury, so that it may readily be determined whether or not the amount paid by one is full compensation and satisfaction for the injury complained of.

For discussion of questions closely related to the subject of this note, see case note to Snyder v. Mutual Teleph. Co. 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 322, on Effect of release of one person from liability for a tort to release another, where former was not in fact or law liable; and case note to Ryan v. Becker, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 330, on Right to show by extrinsic evidence that payment of judgment against, or consideration for release of, alleged joint tortfeasor, was not a satisfaction of claim.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleges that the court erred in hearing the motion over her objection and in holding that, upon the stipulation and the payment therein acknowledged, the motion should be sustained. The defendant Fletcher, who alone made the motion and obtained the order of dismissal, contends that the remaining defendants, having been sued as joint wrongdoers with the brewing company and Kremer, were released by the settlement so made with them, upon the principle that the release of one or more of several joint wrongdoers releases all. Westbrook v. Mize, 35 Kan. 299, 10 Pac. 881. It was said, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McWhorter, 59 Kan. 351, 53 Pac. 137, that "the soundness of the general rule that a settlement with one of two joint tortfeasors ordinarily discharges both is recognized." That there are exceptions to, or limitations upon, the application of the rule, must also be conceded, for in the case last cited it was held not to apply where the proof did not show that the defendant released was liable for the tort, although charged with its commission. It was held in Nebraska, in an action for damages under the civil liability provisions of the intoxicating liquor laws of that state, that "the rule is that, where the damages are uncertain, accord and satisfaction before judgment by one of several joint wrongdoers is satisfaction as to all; but the discharge of a party not shown to be a joint wrongdoer will not operate as a discharge of the other defendants." (Syllabus.) "In the case at bar, there being no proof that Huber was jointly a wrongdoer in the sale of liquors to J. B. McConnell, the receipt of the money by Mrs. McC. and dismissal of the action as to Huber did not release the plaintiffs in this action. The judgment of the district court is right, and is affirmed." Wardell v. McConnell, 25 Neb. 558, 41 N. W. 548. A similar result was reached in Thomas v. Central R. Co. 194 Pa. 511, 45 Atl. 344. It is also held in many jurisdictions that the rule invoked by the defendants does not apply to cases where the instrument offered as a release contains a reservation of the right to sue the other codefendants. Other courts hold that such reservation does not prevent the application of the principle, and that all joint wrongdoers are discharged from liability by the release of one because of the supposed indivisibility of a single tort, where there can be no apportionment of the damages among the tortfeasors, and because the reservation is repugnant to the release. A recent and leading case supporting this doctrine, Abb. v. Northern P. R. Co. (28 Wash. 428, 68 Pac. 954), is reported in 58 L.R.A. 293, and in 92 Am. St. Rep. 882, with elaborate notes in each reviewing the authorities on this subject. In McBride v. Scott, 132 Mich. 176, 61 L.R.A. 445, 102 Am. St. Rep. 416, 93 N. W. 243, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 61, the same rule is declared.

The decisions to the contrary, while conceding the general rule as stated in Westbrook v. Mize, supra, deny its application to cases where the instrument shows that it was not the intention to release all the wrongdoers, and that such intention appears where the instrument reserves the right to proceed against those who are not by its express terms released. This is the rule finally adopted in New York after an exhaustive review of the earlier decisions in that state and elsewhere. In Gilbert v. Finch, 173 N. Y. 455, 61 L.R.A. 807, 93 Am. St. Rep. 623, 66 N. E. 133, that court said: "The instrument given to the Maine incorporators upon the settlement of the plaintiff's suit against them released and discharged them from all further claims or demands, so far as the plaintiff was concerned; but it was expressly provided in the instrument that it should not affect any cause of action on behalf of the receiver against any other person. The purpose of this reservation is very evident. The receiver, doubtless, intended to pursue the defendants for the balance of the claim. The instrument therefore does not purport, neither was it intended, to be a full and complete settlement of the plaintiff's entire claim. . . . In England the modern authorities appear to be quite uniform upon the question. They are to the effect that, as between joint debtors and joint tort feors, a release given to one releases all; but, if the instrument contains a reservation of a right to sue the other joint debtor or tort-feors, it is not a release, but in effect is a covenant not to sue the person released, and a covenant not to sue does not release a joint debtor or a joint tort feor;" and concludes thus: "Where the release contains no reservation it operates to discharge all the joint tort feors; but, where the instrument expressly reserves the right to pursue the others, it is not technically a release, but a covenant not to sue, and they are not discharged. It follows that the release, so called, did not operate to discharge the defendants."

In Duck v. Mayen [1892] 2 Q. B. 511, it was held that a release of one of two joint tort feors, containing a clause that it was made without prejudice to the claim against the other, was a covenant not to sue, and that it did not operate as a release in favor of the defendant not included in its terms. The decision is based upon the principle that the intention of the parties, as deduced from the whole instrument, must be carried out. The court said: "If it were clear that the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved, inasmuch as such right would not be preserved if the document were held to be a release, the proper construction, where this was sought to be done, was that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release." Page 514. The same rule appears to be approved in the following cases, among others: Bell v. Perry, 43 Iowa, 368; Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 393, 100 Am. Dec. 752; Sloan v. Herrick, 49 Vt. 327; Matthews v. Chicopee Mfg. Co. 3 Robt. 711. In the case last cited the release of one joint wrongdoer was pleaded as a defense by the other. The alleged release contained a reservation similar to the one in the instrument under consideration here. The court said: "It is plain that full effect cannot be given to all parts of such an instrument literally. If it is an absolute release, it is a satisfaction of the claim, and necessarily discharges the liability of any other person, either jointly or as surety therefor. If it reserve the liability of that other, it cannot be a release. At first courts were inclined to reject the latter reservation as repugnant to the first, or releasing it; but subsequently, on the principle of attempting to reconcile all parts, so as to carry out the apparent object of the parties, 'ut res magis valeat,' etc., they have given effect to the words of present release as being merely executory or a covenant. The sole ground of the effect of a release to one of several joint contractors or wrongdoers, in discharging all, is that it was, in presumption of law, a satisfaction, . . . and wherever the release was in such a form, or accompanied by such restrictions, as to repel such presumption, it did not necessarily discharge all." This opinion was the subject of much judicial consideration in New York and other states, followed in some cases and rejected in others, until by the decision in Gilbert v. Finch, supra, it was adopted as the settled rule in New York.

The court of appeals of the eighth Federal circuit has adopted the same view. The late Judge Thayer, in Carey v. Bilby, 63 C. C. A. 361, 129 Fed. 203, said: "We are of opinion that the doctrine enunciated in the cases last cited is supported by the greater weight of authority, and is founded upon the better reasons. It has the merit of giving effect to the intention of the party who executes such an instrument which should always be done when the intention is manifest and it can be given effect without violating any rule of law, morals, or public policy. Besides, we are not aware of any sufficient reason which should preclude a person who has sustained an injury through the wrongful act of several persons from agreeing with one of the wrongdoers, who desires to avoid litigation, to accept such sum by way of partial compensation for the injury as he may be willing to pay, and to discharge him from further liability without releasing his cause of action as against the other wrongdoers. The law favors compromises generally, and it is not perceived that an arrangement of the kind last mentioned should be regarded with disfavor. The release which was read in evidence in the case at bar plainly shows that the sum paid by Hysham was not accepted by the plaintiffs as full compensation for the injury which they had sustained, that it was not in fact full compensation for the injury, and that they had no intention of releasing their cause of action as against Carey. Why, then, should it be given an effect contrary to the intent of the one who executed it? We perceive no adequate reason for giving it such effect, and accordingly agree with the lower court that it did not release Carey."

In the note following the report of Abb. v. Northern P. R. Co. supra, in 92 Am. St. Rep. 882, the annotator said: "In our opinion, however, the intention of the parties in such cases should be given effect; and, if the instrument releasing one joint tortfeasor expressly reserves the right to pursue the others, it is not technically a release, but a covenant not to sue, and they are not discharged." In closing a note upon the same case in 58 L.R.A. 307, a summary is given in which it is said: "But in releases not under seal the courts are coming to a more reasonable and equitable doctrine, allowing the intentions of the parties to the agreement to regulate the extent to which it shall be given effect, and attempting to treat it the same as any other unsealed contract between the parties, not unlawful in itself, and plain and express in its terms." This was the rule in equity in the case of the release of one of two or more joint obligors upon contract. (Kirby v. Taylor, 6 Johns. Ch. 242), and it is now made the rule by statute in this state (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1194). In Bell v. Perry, supra, it was stated that the foundation of the rule rests in both cases on the joint liability whether arising out of tort or contract; and this is also referred to in the Gilbert Case in New York, where there is a similar statute. The court said: "It thus appears that the decisions of this court are in accord with the English rule and in harmony with our statute in reference to joint debtors."

sue those not expressly released, indicate the same intention. The clause acknowledging satisfaction in general terms concludes with the words "against said company and said John Kremer," which were improperly used if the intention was to release all the defendants. The further clause releasing another corporation, not a party to the suit, was also unnecessary if the view of the defendants is correct. When we consider with these clauses the express reservation with which the instrument closes, the intention not to release any of the defendants except the brewing company and Kremer is clear. This conclusion is not opposed to the principle decided in Westbrook v. Mize, 35 Kan. 299, 10 Pac. 881. The facts of that case did not include a reservation such as this. It is not perceived how the defendants, who were not parties to the stipulation, can justly complain if the plaintiff is allowed to proceed with her action against them. The receipt of partial satisfaction by the plaintiff will not operate to their prejudice. Robertson v. Trammell, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 53, 83 S. W. 258, Id. 98 Tex. 364, 83 S. W. 1098.

It is not necessary to decide whether the court erred in passing upon the merits of the proposed defense upon a motion, for in any event the motion should have been overruled for the reasons already stated.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

v.

NEW ORLEANS RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.

(121 La. 945, 46 So. 929.)

Highway — fire apparatus — right of way — street car.

Headnotes by MONROE, J.

Case Note. — Liability of street railway company for injuries caused by collision with fire apparatus.

That the driver of a fire department supply wagon approaches a street crossing where there is a street car track, at a rapid rate of speed, and the trolley pole and top of an approaching street car would be visi-complishment of that purpose, the requirement that individuals and vehicles engaged upon less pressing missions shall not only accord them the right of way, but shall hold themselves in readiness to do so when they have reason to anticipate that fire apparatus may appear, is not unreasonable, and that condition may be said to exist when a vehicle, and more particularly a street car, which is confined to its track, approaches a fire engine house situated in close proximity to such track.

Same — negligence of motorman.

2. The motorman of an electric car which passes immediately in front of a fire engine house is guilty of double negligence when he drives the car at full speed in approaching such house, and fails to see, in time to enable him to stop the car and avoid collision with an outcoming hose wagon, a signal given whilst his car is 144 feet distant from the engine house.

(Provosty, J., dissents.)

(April 27, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the motorman of one of defendant's street cars. Affirmed.

Statement by Monroe, J.:

Plaintiff sues for damages for personal injuries resulting from the alleged negligence of the motorman of one of defendant's ble to him 100 feet from the crossing, although, by reason of a high board fence, the motorman would be unable to see the wagon's approach, and whether the gongs on the wagon and car were sounded, as well as the speed of the car, is in dispute, will warrant an instruction that whether the operator of the car gave signals or not, it was the driver's duty to exercise ordinary care to make use of his faculties on approaching a crossing of a track, and to look and listen before driving thereon; and, if the jury believe he failed to exercise ordinary care, and failed to look and listen, and thereby contributed to the collision with the car, which resulted in his death, their verdict should be for the defendant. Guiney v. Southern Electric R. Co. 167 Mo. 595, 69 S. W. 296.

Nor is such an instruction open to the objection that it declares a failure to look and listen under all circumstances to be negligence. Ibid.

So, an instruction is unobjectionable which informs the jury that if, from the evidence, they believe that the motorman had no warning of the approach of the supply wagon, and could not have known thereof by keeping a vigilant watch, regard being had to the circumstances and surroundings, until the car and the wagon had reached the street intersection, and that the wagon and car were both going at such a speed that it was impossible for the motorman to avoid the collision, then they should find a verdict for the defendant. Ibid.

Where a motorman had shut off the power, and had his car well under control as he approached a street crossing, and it does not appear that he saw a fire engine cross the street, or heard the gong of a following hose wagon, with which he collided, no negligence is shown upon his part. Wood v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. 117 La. 119, 41 So. 436, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 983.

Even though the plaintiff may have been guilty of contributory negligence, the question of the defendant's negligence is for the jury in an action by a fireman for injury received in a collision between a rapidly-driven hose wagon and a street car, at an intersecting street, where there is evidence warranting the inference that the car, which had been stopped, was suddenly started by the motorman, who might have known of the wagon's approach, with a wanton or reckless disregard of the duty resting on him to prevent the collision. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 132 Ala. 507, 31 So. 618.

A prima facie case of negligence is established by a showing that a fireman was injured in a collision between the truck on which he was riding, when returning from a fire, and a street car running in excess of the speed permitted by ordinance, which the motorman was unable to check after discovering the truck, which he might have seen when the car was 250 feet from the point of collision. Burleigh v. St. Louis Transit Co. 124 Mo. App. 724, 102 S. W. 621.

While it was the duty of the plaintiff, in some measure, to look to his own safety, it was not incumbent upon him to keep that vigilant watch for approaching cars which would be expected of the driver, where the collision occurred late in the evening of a winter night, and the plaintiff stood upon the running board of the truck, on the side opposite from which the car approached, and he had a poor chance to discover it. Ibid.

The court cannot take a case from the jury where it appears that a rapidly-driven fire engine, with gong sounding, approached an intersecting street, and was struck by a street car running at a high rate of speed, the motorman of which was signaled by bystanders to stop, to which he paid no attention. Chicago City R. Co. v. McDonough, 221 Ill. 69, 77 N. E. 577.

So, a prima facie case of negligence is shown where the driver of a hose cart saw bystanders apparently waving their hands at a street car on an intersecting street, and, seeing the car stop, started across the track, ahead of the car, which, at that instant, shot suddenly ahead, and, in attempting to avoid a collision with the car, the cart struck a lamp post, and a fireman on the wagon was injured. O'Neill v. St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 453, 83 S. W. 990.

And, under such circumstance, the plain-street cars. Defendant denies the negligence charged, and alleges that plaintiff's injuries are attributable to his own want of care. There was a trial before a jury, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $15,000, which was made the judgment of the court. Defendant has appealed, and plaintiff has answered, praying for an increase in the award. The facts, as we find them from the evidence in the record, are as follows: Plaintiff, at the date of the accident, was thirty-eight years old, and for about two years had been driver of steam fire engine No. 19, which has its house on the river side of Maple, 212 feet below Fern, and about 61 feet above Burdette, street. The house is set back about 5 feet from the property line, and has two front openings, provided with double doors, each door being 5 feet wide, and swinging outward. The upper opening is used for the engine and the lower for the hose wagon, which latter is a heavy, four-wheeled, two-horse vehicle, carrying about 1,000 feet of hose. Defendant has two tracks on Maple street; the one nearer to the engine house being used by the down, and the other by the up, going cars. The distance between the house and the nearer track is, say, 21 feet, 10 inches; the banquette being 9 feet, 6½ inches wide, and the distance between the curb and the track being 7 feet, 6½ inches. There is a slight down grade between the engine house and the track, and the space is covered with planking to a width at the house and on the banquette of, say, 29 feet,

Where the facts are disputed, it is error for the court to charge the jury that it would be negligence for a motorman to fail to stop his car in time to avoid colliding with a hose wagon on the way to a fire, where there was no question of his ability to do so had he used the means at his command; as it was for the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances, a failure to stop his car constituted negligence. McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. 134 Iowa, 398. 109 N. W. 618.

And the doctrine of last clear chance is not applicable upon the theory that the driver of the hose wagon saw the approaching car in time to avoid a collision, notwithstanding the negligence of the motorman, as the driver's negligence is not imputable to the plaintiff. Ibid.

Where there is testimony which warrants the jury in finding that if a motorman had had his car under proper control when approaching an intersecting street, or had been keeping a proper lookout, he would have discovered the approach of a fire truck in time to avoid a collision with it, and to permit it to pass first, a verdict in favor of an injured fireman who was riding upon the truck will not be disturbed. Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 73 App. Div. 441, 77 N. Y. Supp. 54, affirmed without opinion in 177 N. Y. 535, 69 N. E. 1123.

Whether a motorman is guilty of negligence, and a fireman guilty of contributory negligence, is a question for the jury, where a fire truck, going at the rate of 7½ miles an hour, along an asphalt paved street, was struck at an intersecting street crossing by a street car which was going from 25 to 30 miles an hour, it being disputed whether the gong of the street car was rung, so that it might have been heard if ordinary care had been exercised by plaintiff and others upon the truck. Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Ward, 25 Ohio C. C. 399.

The question of the plaintiff's want of care is for the jury where he was riding to a fire, standing upon the foot board, upon the north side of a hook-and-ladder truck, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

looking south, and an approaching car came from the north, without ringing its gong, the first warning the plaintiff had of its approach being a signal given by a woman upon the sidewalk, when he immediately jumped from the truck, but was struck by the car. Quinn v. Dubuque Street R. Co. (Iowa) 94 N. W. 476.

As the men upon the opposite side of the truck were in position to see the approach of such car, it cannot be said as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was negligent in not turning around and observing the car in time to leave the truck so as to avoid being struck by it. Ibid.

So, it is a question for the jury, where the evidence is such that it might have been found that the motorman, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have stopped the car in time to avoid a collision with the truck, notwithstanding he testified he did the best he could in order to avoid a collision. Ibid.

Whether the driver of a truck weighing 9,000 pounds, and carrying 10 or 12 men, was at fault, is a question for the jury, where a high building obstructed his view of the intersecting street, and, by reason of his position upon the truck, he did not see the approaching car until it was 50 or more feet away, although he looked and listened until he was about to go upon the track, and then urged his horses forward, but could not cross in time to avoid the collision. Ibid.

And so, whether the driver of a hook-and-ladder truck, who was injured in a collision with a street car, exercised ordinary care and prudence in giving notice of his approach, is a question for the jury, where, with gong ringing, he drove slowly into an intersecting street, with which he was familiar, and was unable to see a street car rapidly approaching about 150 feet away, the gong of which was not sounded until his horses were nearly upon the track, and the momentum of the heavy truck was such that it was impossible to stop, so he attempted, by urging his horses to greater speed, to swing the truck away from the car, but failed to do so. Consolidated Trac- widening between the curb and the track to 36 feet. When the doors of the engine house are thrown open, they can readily be seen from a point 150 feet above, and from a like distance below, by the motormen of approaching cars, and, as they are usually closed in winter, the fact of their being open at that season is fair warning that some movement of the engine or hose wagon may be expected; and especially is that the case when the approaching motorman sees them thrown open. The rule of the defendant company requires its motormen to give the right of way to vehicles of the fire department, and to stop their cars when such vehicles are approaching, and plaintiff offered to prove that defendant's instructions were and are that the motormen shall keep their cars under control in passing the engine house in question, for the reason that the engine or hose wagon may be expected to emerge at any time; but the testimony on that subject was objected to and excluded as irrelevant. At about 8 o'clock on the morning of February 6, 1906, plaintiff, having been ordered to hitch the engine horses to the hose wagon and take them to be shod, complied with the order to the extent that (he and the pipeman), having hitched up the horses, he took his position and strapped himself on the driver's seat. The pipeman pushed open the doors, and, following them as they opened, went forward to the track, and raised his arms as a signal to the approaching car, whereupon plaintiff, whose view of the car was tion Co. v. Chenowith, 61 N. J. L. 554, 35 Atl. 1067.

So, it is for the jury to determine whether the failure of the motorman to give notice of the approach of his car by the ringing of his gong was the proximate cause of the collision. Ibid. The court said it deemed the necessity of giving audible signals to be so plain and constant a requirement of care and prudence that it would be held a legal duty.

And the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, as, from the facts shown, two conclusions could be reasonably reached,—one favorable to the plaintiff, and the other to the defendant; hence, a question for the jury was presented. Ibid.

It was held in Consolidated Traction Co. v. Chenowith, supra, that the trial court properly refused to instruct the jury specifically, first, that if a permanent obstacle intervened to prevent observation, reasonable care required the driver of the truck to so regulate the speed of his horses as to be in a position to stop before going upon the street car track, if it were not safe to do so; second, that similar prudence would require delay in going upon the track until the driver could assure himself of his safety; third, that reasonable prudence required that the judgment to be formed by the driver should have been formed while it was possible for him to act prudently, in view of the then conditions, and not get himself into a position where peril was to be incurred,—as such requested instructions did not ask the court to declare a legal principle, but to make application of the principle it had already declared in its previous charge; and the determination of these questions was for the jury; the court having already charged the jury that the measure of the duty of the driver in crossing the track was to use such care as a reasonably prudent man would use under like circumstances.

And the jury is justified in finding that the plaintiff, who was riding upon the running board of a truck in answering an alarm of fire, was free from contributory negligence, where, upon discovering the approach of a street car, and the liability of a collision, he jumped for safety, and the truck was struck by the car and tipped over upon him. Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. supra.

A street railway company is liable where, upon approaching a fire house, the motorman heard an alarm of fire, and saw the horses of the engine just as they were coming out of the house, and, as the engine was nearly across the track, the car struck it with great violence, and injured the plaintiff, and the car was running in violation of a rule of the company requiring cars to pass engine houses at not more than 4 miles an hour, which rule is not limited to the time the car is actually in front of such house, but includes the approach as well. McKernan v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 138 Mich. 519, 68 L.R.A. 347, 101 N. W. 812.

And, if the plaintiff had knowledge of the existence of such rule, it might have a distinct bearing upon the question of his contributory negligence. Ibid.

Effect of law, rule, or custom giving fire apparatus right of way.

A law or ordinance giving fire apparatus, when responding to an alarm of fire, the right of way in the public streets, has a material bearing upon the question of the contributory negligence of a fireman riding thereon, as he is justified in assuming that such rule will be observed by a street car motorman upon discovering the approach of fire apparatus. New York v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 90 App. Div. 66, 85 N. Y. Supp. 693, affirmed without opinion in 182 N. Y. 536, 75 N. E. 1128; Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 84 App. Div. 514, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1016; Warren v. Mendenhall, 77 Minn. 145, 79 N. W. 661. See Garrity v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 112 Mich. 369, 37 L.R.A. 529, 70 N. W. 1018.

And a fireman will be presumed to be familiar with such a law, and his conduct must be judged in the light thereof. Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 84 App. Div. 514, cut off by the open door upon his left, assuming that the car or any approaching vehicle would thereby be stopped, allowed the horses, which were prancing or jumping, to move forward, obliquing them slightly to the left as they cleared the doors, with a view of reaching the blacksmith shop by going in that direction. He then discovered that a car was coming very rapidly on the down track, and was threatening a collision, to avoid which he pulled the horses to the right in the hope of being able to get the wagon on the street between the track and the curb, and had partly succeeded in so doing when the car struck the left hind wheel of the wagon (one of the horses being then on the banquette and the other on the street), and drove the wagon forward some 15 or 20 feet, until it collided with a post situated on the edge of the banquette at a point about 39 feet below the engine house, and between which and the seat of the wagon plaintiff's left leg was jammed and badly mashed. It is admitted that, after passing Fern street, the car moved at full speed, with all the power on, until the motorman became aware, from the opening of the doors of the engine house or the signal of the pipeman, or both, that a vehicle was about to come out of the house. The motorman testifies that, when he got about 75 feet from the house, these doors were thrown open from the inside of the house, and drew his attention as he saw a man jump to the door and throw up his hand, and that just then a pair of

And such an ordinance also has a material bearing upon the question of the negligence of the motorman of the car with which a collision occurs. Ibid.

Thus, where by statute fire apparatus is given the right of way in public streets over all vehicles excepting those carrying United States mail, a street railway company will be liable for injuries sustained by a fire truck in a collision with street car which approached a street crossing at a high rate of speed, the motorman not being on the lookout to discover approaching fire apparatus or signals thereof. New York v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 90 App. Div. 66, 85 N. Y. Supp. 693, affirmed without opinion in 182 N. Y. 536, 75 N. E. 1128.

And, as an abstract proposition, such a law imposes upon a motorman the duty to yield the right of way, irrespective of any requirement as to reasonable care, if he has the opportunity to do so. Duffghe v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 109 App. Div. 603, 96 N. Y. Supp. 324, affirmed without opinion in 187 N. Y. 522, 79 N. E. 1104; See Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 84 App. Div. 514, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1016, affirmed without opinion in 177 N. Y. 535, 69 N. E. 1123.

So, the fact that, by ordinance, fire apparatus is given the right of way, will justify a finding of freedom from contributory negligence of the driver of a hook-and-ladder truck, who was injured in a collision with a slowly-moving street car, in driving down an incline, with his gong, as well as those of other apparatus, ringing, although the truck was not under control, and he saw the car when the truck was 140 feet from the point of collision, and the motorman testified he did not see the car, which was visible 35 feet from the point of collision, until the horses were almost in front of the car, and that he did not hear the shouts or observe the warning signals of bystanders. Warren v. Mendenhall, supra. The court observed that it was the duty of firemen, in responding to alarms of fire, to act regardless of a considerable degree of danger to themselves, and, as their duties are of a public character of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

importance, it is the duty of everyone to be alert to give them the right of way; and even though a private individual, as a matter of law, would be guilty of negligence in attempting to pass in front of a car as the plaintiff did, yet, under the circumstances, the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury.

So, where, by law, the wagon of a salvage corps, moving from 15 to 20 miles an hour, was given the right of way in responding to fire alarms, and a member thereof was injured in a collision with a street car which approached an intersecting street at a speed of 20 miles an hour, and the motorman who was engaged in conversation with another person, failed to observe the wagon's approach on the intersecting street, a verdict will not be directed for the defendant street railway company. Flynn v. Louisville R. Co. 110 Ky. 662, 62 S. W. 490.

And the plaintiff is entitled to recover, even though guilty of some negligence, if the motorman knew, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known, of the approach of the wagon, and could have avoided the collision by the exercise of ordinary care. Ibid.

And under such an ordinance, the driver of the vehicle would proceed on the theory that he had the prior right of way at a crossing; and while such ordinance does not require a higher degree of care on the part of a motorman with reference to fireman than toward any other person, yet it would charge the motorman with knowledge of a fact very material in determining whether he exercised the care required under the circumstances. McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. 134 Iowa, 398, 109 N. W. 618.

So, such an ordinance is admissible as bearing upon the question of the duty of a motorman to assume that a hose wagon about to cross the street car tracks at an intersecting street would not be stopped in order to permit the car to pass in front of it. Ibid.

But the fact that, by law, the driver of a hose wagon was entitled to the right of way, will not excuse his failure to exercise due care and prudence in attempting to pass in horses shot out in front of him. The driver, he says, "had no chance to get over the track with the horses, but turned down, and, as he turned down, the car struck the wagon right up in the hind wheel, and hit it a glance blow." He also testifies that just as soon as the doors attracted his attention he threw off the power, pulled the reverse back, fed the (reverse) power, and, as quickly as he could, applied the air brake; and he explains the fact that the car did not stop until it (the front end, which is 43 feet from the rear end) had reached a point, say, 100 feet below Burdette street, or more than 240 feet below the point at which the collision occurred, by saying that, after the wagon had been forced out of the way, the horses were frightened, and the situation was precarious, and he thought it wiser to allow the car to roll on (meaning that the brake was released, but that no power was applied), in order to open, or clear, the street.

The pipeman testifies that, when he reached the track and raised his hands in warning, the car was opposite the first house below Fern street, a point ascertained by subsequent measurement to be 144 feet above the engine house; that the motorman was then looking off to his left, and did not see him; that he ran forward until he was opposite the upper door of the engine house (thereby becoming obscured from the view of the plaintiff, who had not as yet emerged from behind the open, lower, doors), and attracted the attention of the motorman by a narrow space in front of a street car with his horses going at full speed, so as to permit a recovery by a fireman who was riding beside him, whose duty it was to watch for obstructions, and who was injured in a collision with the car, although the defendant's evidence tended to prove that the car was at a standstill, and the wagon ran into it, while that of the plaintiff was to the effect that the started forward when the wagon was about 30 feet from the track, and collided with it. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 126 Ala. 135, 28 So. 87.

However, as it appeared upon a second appeal of the last case (132 Ala. 507, 31 So. 618) that the plaintiff was seated on the wagon, back of the driver, and not on the seat with him, the question of the defendant's negligence was held to be for the jury, even though the plaintiff may have been guilty of contributory negligence, where the street car had been stopped, and the motorman might have known of the wagon's approach, and the evidence justified a finding that the latter's conduct in suddenly starting the car showed wanton and reckless disregard of his duty to avoid a collision with the wagon.

And it was held in Garrity v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 112 Mich. 369, 37 L.R.A. 529, 70 N. W. 1018, that the fact that, by ordinance, fire apparatus had the right of way, will not relieve the driver of a hook-and-ladder truck of the duty of approaching a street crossing where there are street car tracks with his horses under control.

But it is a case for the jury where the driver of a fire truck is injured by a collision with a street car at an intersecting street crossing, although he was negligent in approaching the crossing without having his horses under control, where the evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the car could have been stopped in time to avoid the collision, or a prudent man would have been justified in expecting that it would stop, in view of the fact that the fire truck had the right of way. Ibid.

So, negligence in approaching a crossing of an electric street car track, without having his horses under control, will not preclude a recovery for injuries which the driver of a fire truck receives by collision with a street car, in attempting to cross in front of a car, if, at the time he discovered the car, the circumstances were such as to justify a prudent man in attempting to make the crossing. Ibid.

But, in the absence of allegation or proof of a law or custom giving fire apparatus the right of way over other vehicles,—as, under the general rule of the road, that a vehicle which reaches a street crossing first, going at a reasonable speed, has the right of way, the driver of a hook-and-ladder truck cannot recover for injuries sustained in a collision with a street car, which reached the intersection first, and, after slowing down almost to a stop, proceeded over the crossing at a slightly increased speed, it appearing that the truck was going only about 4 or 5 miles an hour as it approached the crossing, but the driver immediately increased its speed, and, although he endeavored to avoid a collision by swinging his horses to the right, he was unable, owing to the length of the truck, to turn sharply enough to clear the car. Knox v. New Jersey Street R. Co. 70 N. J. L. 347, 57 Atl. 423, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 164.

So, rules of a street railway company, requiring its cars to give the right of way at street crossings to fire apparatus, are admissible as bearing upon the question of a fireman's contributory negligence, as he has the right to assume, when approaching street car tracks upon intersecting streets, that such rules will be obeyed by the motormen of approaching cars. Chicago City R. Co. v. McDonough, 221 Ill. 69, 77 N. E. 577; Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Ward, 25 Ohio C. C. 399.

The violation of a rule of a street railway company, requiring street cars to give the fire department right of way at all crossings, and, if necessary, to stop and let the fire apparatus go by, is evidence of negligence. Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Ward, supra.

Where, for many years, it has been a uniform custom of a street railway company to slacken the speed of, or stop, its cars, so hallooing to him, and that it was only then, when he was within 90 feet of the engine house, that the motorman made any movement to stop the car. The witness further says (referring to the motorman): "He shut off his power, and, when he got in front of the door where the steamer is supposed to come out, he put on again his power, and he stepped back to the door, and then it struck the hose wagon and jammed it up against the post, and then the car stopped 127 feet from the post. That was the end of the car after the man was jammed against the post."

Speyerer, a witness called by plaintiff, had alighted from an up-going car at the corner of Burdette street, and, having crossed over to the river side of Maple (and upper side of Burdette), observed through the side window of the engine house (only about 40 feet distant) that the apparatus was ready to go out. His attention was then attracted by the pipeman coming out and waving his hands and hallooing to the motorman of the down-coming car, who, as he testifies, was then (when the pipeman waved his hands) about half a square (say 150 feet) above the engine house. The witnesses thus mentioned are the only ones examined whose testimony, as to the more material facts immediately connected with the accident we find worth considering.

The captain of fire company No. 19 was in the rear of the engine house at the moment of the accident, and his testimony is unimportant, save in so far as it relates as to give fire apparatus the right of way, it was held, in Hanlon v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 118 Wis. 210, 95 N. W. 100, that the driver of a hose wagon, responding to an alarm of fire, might reasonably presume that the usual and customary efforts to avoid a collision with his wagon would be observed, and hence the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury, where, upon approaching an intersecting street crossing, he continuously rang his gong, which could be heard from two to eight blocks away, and assumed that an approaching street car would stop, and immediately urged forward his galloping horses, and, as he got within a few feet of the street car track, he saw that the car had not slowed up, and although he attempted to turn his vehicle so as to avoid a collision, it was struck by the car, and he was injured.

And the driver may assume that those in charge of the street car, if the approach of the apparatus is known, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should be known, will stop it or slacken its speed so as to permit the apparatus to pass in front of the car. Ibid.

And the fact that plaintiff had been a member of the fire department for twenty-five years creates a presumption that he had knowledge of the custom of a street railway company to slacken the speed of its cars at a particular crossing. Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Ward, supra.

And such a custom, if known to the plaintiff, is proper to be considered by the jury in determining whether he might rightfully consider it in attempting to cross the street car track. Ibid.

As a city fire department is not subject to an ordinance limiting the speed of vehicles in the city streets, such ordinance is not admissible, for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's negligence in driving the truck at a speed in excess of that permitted by the ordinance. Ibid.

An ordinance giving street cars the right of way over vehicles, adopted prior to the adoption of an ordinance giving fire apparatus the right of way, has no application to vehicles belonging to the fire department. McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. supra. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Imputation of driver's negligence to fireman.

The negligence of the driver of a fire truck will not be imputed to a fireman riding upon it, who has no control over the actions of the driver. McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. supra; McKernan v. Detroit Citizen's Street R. Co. 138 Mich. 519, 68 L.R.A. 347, 101 N. W. 812; Burleigh v. St. Louis Transit Co. 124 Mo. App. 724, 102 S. W. 621; Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, supra; Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 84 App. Div. 514, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1016, affirmed without opinion in 177 N. Y. 535, 69 N. E. 1123.

The reason for the rule just stated is aptly expressed in McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. supra, as well as in other cases cited, where the court said that "the general rule that, where several persons are engaged in a common enterprise in the carrying on of which each is participating, the negligence of one of them may be imputed to the others, . . . [does not apply]. We are satisfied, however, that the facts do not afford the slightest occasion for applying or even discussing the common-enterprise rule. The deceased was not riding on the hose wagon in the prosecution of any common enterprise in which he and the other members of the fire department had voluntarily engaged, but in pursuance of his individual duty as a member of the fire department, and, in that capacity, a servant of the city. He had nothing to do with selection of the driver, and he had no control over his acts. Under such circumstances, it has been frequently held by other courts that there is no relation of common enterprise which would justify the imputation to the deceased of any negligence on the part of the driver of the hose wagon."

Although the case of Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 126 Ala. 135, 28 So. 87, apparently imputes the negligence of the driver of a hose wagon to a fireman riding upon the seat with him, whose duty it was to watch for obstructions, yet, upon a second appeal of the case (see 132 Ala. 507, 31 So. 618), it appearing that the plaintiff was not in fact riding on the seat at the

to the condition of the rails of the car track. On that subject he says: That he observed the condition of the track and told the motorman of car No. 316, "You have got no excuse. Look at the condition of the track." Being asked: "What was the condition of the track?" he replied, "Dry." The motorman thus referred to was not called to deny that such a conversation took place, though he says that the rails were wet and slippery, which he attributes to dew. On the other hand, he testifies that the day was cloudy, that the accident occurred at 8:02, and he denies that there had been any fog. The conductor of car 316 had left the city when the case was tried, and was not examined. The motorman and the conductor of car 301 (which was approaching at the moment when the doors of the engine house were thrown open, on the uptown track, and had reached a point probably 60 feet below the corner of Burdette street, or from 275 to 344 feet from car 316) undertake to testify as to time the collision occurred, and had nothing to do with driving the wagon, therefore this court refused to impute the driver's negligence to him.

A rule of the fire department relative to the conduct of drivers of fire apparatus, which does not purport to authorize any fireman upon the vehicle to exercise any control over the driver, is inadmissible on behalf of the railway company. McBride v. Des Moines City R. Co. supra.

Standing on moving vehicle as negligence.

It is not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a fireman, while riding to a fire on a hose wagon, to stand upon his feet to put his coat on, where, before starting to the fire, he did not have time to do so, and, in order to avoid getting wet, and to be in readiness for service upon arrival at the fire, the men were allowed to put on their coats while on the way to the fire. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 132 Ala. 507, 31 So. 618.

So, it is not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a fireman, not having time to dress completely before starting to a fire, to do so while standing with one foot upon the running board of a hook-and-ladder truck, with his other leg over the side piece of a ladder, in order to steady himself while dressing, and, as the truck was driven sharply around a corner, the forward end of the ladder struck a street car, and was pushed back with such force as to cut off his leg. Magee v. West End Street R. Co. 161 Mass. 240, 23 N. E. 1102.

Injuries to street car passenger.

A prima facie case of negligence is established when a passenger on a street car shows he was injured in consequence of a collision between the car and a rapidly-moving piece of fire apparatus, together with his freedom from negligence, which casts upon the defendant the burden of showing that the collision was the sole fault of those in charge of the fire department wagon. Olsen v. Citizens' R. Co. 152 Mo. 426, 54 S. W. 470.

And such a showing establishes a case within the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, as street cars, when managed with prudence, do not ordinarily collide with other vehicles; and it then devolves upon the defendant to overcome the presumption of negligence with evidence of due care upon its part. Williamson v. St. Louis & M. R. Co. (Mo. App.) 113 S. W. 239.

which negligence may be inferred, where a bystander ran into the street and tried to signal the motorman to stop, which the latter failed to observe, and he might have heard the ringing of the gong upon the approaching hose wagon had he been giving slight attention to his duties, and there was evidence that he might have stopped his car in time to avert the collision; also, that, by ordinance, fire apparatus has the right of way in the streets. Ibid.

So, a case for the jury is presented where the gong upon the approaching fire truck could be heard several blocks distant, and was heard by the plaintiff, a passenger on a street car, and people on the sidewalk shouted at the motorman, and made gestures and signs for him to stop, which, however, was disputed by the defendant. Olsen v. Citizens' R. Co. supra.

Where there is ample evidence to justify a finding that a street car driver, by the exercise of proper care, might have avoided colliding with a rapidly moving hook-and-ladder truck by which a passenger was injured, the question of the defendant's negligence is for the jury. Heucke v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 69 Wis. 401, 34 N. W. 243.

It being the duty of the defendant to exercise the utmost care and prudence in carrying its passengers, it is responsible for a slight want of such care as a careful and vigilant man would observe under like circumstances, and a street railway company will not be relieved from liability by reason of the negligence of the driver of the truck. Ibid.

The unreasonable overloading of a street car, and its unlawful speed, which makes it impossible to stop the car as soon as may be necessary to avert a collision with a fire truck, moving quite rapidly, constitute gross negligence, which will render a street railway company liable to a passenger for injury sustained in a resulting collision. Richmond R. & Electric Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 32 L.R.A. 220, 53 Am. St. Rep. 839, 24 S. E. 267.

And the defendant railway company is responsible for the negligence of either the conductor or motorman under such circumstances, as it is the duty of the conductor as well as the motorman if either hears the sound of the gong, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, may discover the danger in time to avert it, to use all means at hand to that end. Williamson v. St. Louis & M. R. Co. and Olsen v. Citizens' R. Co. supra.

the distance at that moment between car 316 and the engine house, and as to the exact movements of the motorman of car 316, but, as they labored under the disadvantage of being a block, more or less, away, and of having, in the case of the motorman, to see through the vestibule glasses of both cars, and for some purposes through the woodwork of the vestibule of car 316, and, in the case of the conductor, who was at the rear end of car 301, of having also to see through the glass in the front door of his car, their testimony may be taken with some allowance. Moreover, the motorman testifies that car 316 struck the hose wagon between the front and hind wheels; whereas, the one absolutely certain fact in the case is that it struck the left hind wheel of the wagon, which was broken by the blow. He testifies that the rails were wet, because the morning had been foggy, but the motorman of car 316, as we have seen, swears that there had been no fog. He testifies that the motorman of car 316 kept his air brake applied until his car stopped on the lower side of Burdette street, and that he did well, using his best efforts, to stop when he did, but the motorman of car 316 swears that he "could have stopped right in the street, and blocked the street up," but that, as soon as the accident had occurred, he released the air brake and allowed the car to roll on purposely, in order to open the street. He testified, without qualification, that a car, moving at full speed, cannot be stopped in less than 125 or 150 feet, and it was only after some cross-examination by defendant's counsel that he was brought to admit that the question may be affected by the speed at which the car is moving; the last question and answer being:

Q. Under what circumstances could you stop under 120 feet?

A. I would have to be going very slow.

The motorman of car 316, however, says that a car going at full speed can be stopped within 90 feet on a dry track. The conductor of car 301 testifies that, when the pipeman came out of the engine house and threw up his hands, his (the conductor's) car was between 60 and 70 feet below Burdette street, and that it stopped with the rear end on the lower side of the street, from which, as the car was 43 feet long, it would appear that the stop was made in from 103 to 113 feet. Both he and the motorman testify that, when the engine house doors were thrown open, car 316 was from 60 to 70 feet above the engine house, and they, as well as the motorman of car 316, agree that the vestibule glasses were free of moisture, and that the air was cold.

Messrs. Dart & Kernan and Henry Plauché Dart, Jr., for appellant.

Messrs. Woodville & Woodville for appellee.

Monroe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the facts stated, we conclude that the competent witnesses as to what took place just before and at the moment of the accident were Pinero, motorman, Ziemer, pipeman, Speyerer, spectator, and Dole, the plaintiff. Ziemer and Speyerer testify that, when the former first signaled, the car (316) was 144 or "about 150" feet above the engine house, and we think, all the circumstances considered, that we must accept their testimony as true, since Dole, plaintiff, corroborates them by testifying that, when he emerged from the engine house and first saw the car, it was about 120 feet away, and the motorman "was paying no attention,"—from which we conclude that the motorman did not at first see the open doors or the signal. We also accept as true the statement of Pinero that, when his attention was attracted, he shut off and reversed the power, and applied the air brake. We think he was mistaken in supposing that he saw the doors "opening" or the signal when first given.

Zierner, as we have seen, testifies that Pinero, when about 90 feet from the wagon, shut off the power, but that he turned it on again, and stepped back into the door of the car, just as the car was about to strike the wagon. And Speyerer, testifying on that subject, says: "If he shut it off altogether, I can't say, but he made a motion with his hands on the controller to shut it off, and he might have started and thrown it back again. The power couldn't have been shut off the car from the distance it went."

Ferran, the motorman of car 301, testifies that, as the doors of the engine house were opened, he saw Pinero applying his air brake; that, when he got near the hose wagon, he "pulled his reverse and threw his power on, and, by so doing, that his overhead flew off, and he was still using his air all the while, until he landed on the other side of the street." But, according to his own statement, at the moment that the doors were opened, he was occupied with stopping his own car, and we attach no importance to his testimony as to what Pinero was doing, 240 feet away, with two vestibule glasses intervening.

It is, however, quite possible—even probable—that Ferran may have observed him as car 316 approached and passed car 301, and, if his testimony is to be believed, Pinero was unable, notwithstanding his best

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question intended to be raised by the defendant's demurrer to the declaration, and the question principally discussed at the plaintiff's wife must stop with the period of her existence."

Christiancy, J., in Hyatt v. Adams, supra, in explaining the rule applied in Baker v. Bolton, supra, said: "For myself I think . . . that the reason of the rule is to be found in that natural and almost universal repugnance among enlightened nations to setting a price upon human life, or any attempt to estimate its value by a pecuniary standard,—a repugnance which seems to have been strong and prevalent among nations in proportion as they have been or become more enlightened and refined, and especially so where the Christian religion has exercised its most beneficent influence, and where human life has been held most sacred. . . . To the cultivated and enlightened mind, looking at human life in the light of the Christian religion as sacred, the idea of compensating its loss in money is revolting."

In Green v. Hudson River R. Co. 28 Barb. 9, in holding that a husband could not recover for the instant death of his wife, who, while traveling on one of defendant's passenger trains, under a contract to carry her safely, was killed in a wreck caused by the negligence of defendant's servants, the court said: "If it was necessary at this day to give a reason for this doctrine, I should think it more natural and obvious to refer to the old maxim which has obtained from the earliest days of the common law: Actio personalis moritur cum persona." And the court also further said: "Where death is the concomitant of the collision, and life departs at the instant the shock is received, no action for loss of service can be sustained, because there is no time during her life when it can be said that the husband has lost the service and society of his wife in consequence of the injury complained of. This may be thought a narrow ground on which to place any right of recovery, but there is no other on which the common-law rule can be 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) overcome, which declares that the mere death of a human being cannot be complained of as a civil injury, to be compensated in damages."

In Higgins v. Butcher, supra, the plaintiff declared that the defendant assaulted and beat his wife, of which she died on the following day; and it was held that such act was a personal tort to the wife, and died with her.

So, in Smith v. Sykes, Freem. C. L. Rep. 224, it was held that no action will lie on the part of the husband against one who beats his wife so that she dies, as the matter is criminal and of a higher nature.

So, a widow may not recover at common law for the loss of services and consortium of her husband, who was feloniously shot, and his death occurred the same day. Wyatt v. Williams, supra.

And in Grosso v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra, it was held that the husband could not recover for the negligent killing of his wife, whose death was instantaneous or for the loss of her society and assistance in his domestic affairs.

And it was said in Womack v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. supra, where the wife's death was instantaneous, that the husband could not recover for loss of her society and companionship, or for the value of her services, nor for his sufferings and mental anguish caused by her death.

So, it was held in Duncan v. St. Luke's Hospital, 113 App. Div. 68, 98 N. Y. Supp. 867, affirmed without opinion in 192 N. Y. 580, 85 N. E. 1109, that a husband could not recover for the death of his insane wife, caused by jumping from a window of a hospital where she was confined, by reason of the negligence of her attendant in not watching her, the case being based upon the breach of an express agreement between the husband and the defendant that, for a designated sum, a constant watch was to be the argument, is whether, under an action of contract brought upon the implied agreement of a physician with a husband to render necessary and proper medical care and service to his wife in her illness, a recovery can be had for the husband's loss of her society, care, and comfort, resulting from her death, caused by the defendant's failure to perform his contract.

For many years it has been held in this commonwealth that, without a statutory provision, no recovery can be had for the death of a person, however wrongfully caused by another. This has been decided in cases where the plaintiff was in such relations to the deceased person that, by reason of the death, he was deprived of valuable legal rights, as in the case of a husband suing for loss of the services and consortium of his wife, whose death was caused by the defendant's negligence (Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. 1 Cush. 476, 48 Am. Dec. 616), and, in a similar case, where the action was brought by a father for loss of services of his minor son (Skinner v. Housatonic R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, 48 Am. Dec. 616). So it was held that a promise to pay an annuity to a widow, on account of the death of her husband through the defendant's negligence, and upon her agreement to forbear to sue, could not be enforced, although she was deprived of her husband's support and of his consortium. (Palfrey v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 4 Allen, 55. See Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 658. It was recognized that, in some countries, under different systems of jurisprudence, the law was different. Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. supra. But, except as changed by statute, this doctrine is firmly established in the law of this commonwealth. Barrett v. Dolan, 130 Mass. 366, 39 Am. Rep. 456; Richardson v. New York maintained over the wife, as the cause of action is ex delicto, and not ex contractu.

However, it was said in Lynch v. Davis, 12 How. Pr. 323, although clearly obiter, that a husband might, at common law, recover the pecuniary damages, including loss of society and aid of his wife, sustained by him by the breach of a physician's contract of employment in negligently treating the wife so as to cause her death.

A widow cannot recover upon an agreement made with her by a railway company for compensation for negligently causing her husband's death, as to permit a recovery in such a case would violate the common-law rule. (Palfrey v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 4 Allen, 55.

So, it was held in The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 30 L. ed. 358, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140, that a suit in rem could not be maintained in admiralty by a widow to recover for the negligent killing of her husband upon the high seas, as no statute conferred such right and none existed at common law. Ch. J. Waite said: "We know of no country that has adopted a different rule on this subject for the sea from that which it maintains on the land; and the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, leaves the matter untouched. . . . The argument everywhere in support of such suits in admiralty has been not that the maritime law, as actually administered in common-law countries, is different from the common law in this particular, but that the common law is not founded on good reason, and is contrary to 'natural equity and the general principles of law.' Since, however, it is now established that, in the courts of the United States, no action at law can be maintained for such a wrong in the absence of a statute giving the right, and it has not been shown that the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, has established a different rule for the government of the courts of admiralty." 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ralty from those which govern courts of law in matters of this kind, we are forced to the conclusion that no such action will lie in the courts of the United States under the general maritime law. The rights of persons in this particular under the maritime law of this country are not different from those under the common law, and as it is the duty of courts to declare the law, not to make it, we cannot change this rule." A similar decision was had in The E. B. Ward, Jr. 4 Woods, 145, 16 Fed. 255, and in Seward v. The Vera Cruz, L. R. 10 App. 59.

And although the following decisions of the lower Federal courts have held that, in admiralty, following the civil-law rule, a husband or wife might recover, in the absence of statute, for the negligent killing of the other, they are expressly disapproved in The Harrisburg, supra. The Sea Gull, Chase, Dec. 146, Fed. Cas. No. 12,578; The Highland Light, Chase, Dec. 150, Fed. Cas. No. 6,477; Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Sawy. 262, 5 Fed. 75; The Tonawanda, 13 Phila. 464, Fed. Cas. No. 14,109; The Charles Morgan, 2 Flipp. 274, Fed. Cas. No. 2,618.

But it was held in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Henson, 7 C. C. A. 349, 19 U. S. App. 169, 58 Fed. 531, that a recovery by a husband for the negligent death of his wife would be sustained where the question of his legal capacity to sue therefor in his own name was raised for the first time in the appellate court.

The earliest case upon this subject in this country is Cross v. Guthery, 2 Root, 90, 1 Am. Dec. 61, decided in 1794, where it was held that a husband might maintain an action for damages against a surgeon for unskillfully performing an operation upon his wife, which resulted in her death; the damages alleged being that he had been put to great cost and expense and had been deprived of the wife's services, company, and consortium. In answer to the contention that the offense charge appeared to be a felony, and that, by the laws of England, the private injury was merged in the public offense, the court said that such rule was applicable in England only to capital crimes, where, from necessity, the offender must go unpunished or the injured individual go unredressed. However, the force of this decision is probably destroyed by Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 25 Conn. 265, 65 Am. Dec. 571, where it is held that at common law there can be no recovery for a death resulting from negligence.

C. R. Co. 98 Mass. 85-89; Worcester & Suburban Street R. Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 180 Mass. 263-265, 57 L.R.A. 629, 91 Am. St. Rep. 275, 62 N. E. 364. The decisions exclude, as a ground of recovery, all elements of damage which arise solely from death, and as to such damage, they are as applicable to actions of contract as to actions of tort.

And in Kake v. Horton, 2 Haw. 209, even though the common law, as ascertained by English and American decisions, is the adopted law of Hawaii, the court, under power to proceed and decide according to equity where there is no express law, refused to follow the common-law rule that an action will not lie for negligently causing the death of a husband or wife, and permitted a recovery in such a case. This doctrine was followed and applied in The Robert Lewers Co. v. Kekauoha. 52 C. C. A. 483. 114 Fed. 849.

However, the husband may, at common law, recover for the loss of services of his wife, and expenses incurred in her care between the time of her negligent injury and death, where death is not instantaneous. Nixon v. Ludlam, 50 Ill. App. 274; Long v. Morrison, 14 Ind. 595, 77 Am. Dec. 72; Mowry v. Chaney, 43 Iowa, 609; Wyatt v. Williams, 43 N. H. 102; Eden v. Lexington & F. R. Co. 14 B. Mon. 204; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Green v. Hudson River R. Co. 28 Barb. 21, affirmed in 2 Keyes, 94; Philippi v. Wolff, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 196; Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493.

So, in Baker v. Bolton, supra, Lord Ellenborough held that, upon the death of the wife by the negligent act of another, the husband might recover for the loss of her society, together with his distress of mind, suffered on account of her injury, from the time of the accident until the moment of her dissolution.

But in Hyatt v. Adams, supra, it was held that he may not recover for his mental sufferings during that period, where the injuries inflicted upon the wife were not wilfully caused.

In Hyatt v. Adams, supra, while the common-law right of the husband to recover 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The whole subject is now covered by statutes, of which some apply only to deaths caused by certain corporations or classes of persons, as railroad and street railway corporations, common carriers and employers of labor, and one is general (Rev. Laws, chap. 171, § 2, amended by Stat. 1907, p. 324, chap. 375), applying to all other corporations and persons. This last statute cov-damages sustained by his wife by reason of an unskilful surgical operation, which resulted in her death, was denied, yet, it was held he might recover the damages he sustained and which accrued prior to, and not in consequence of, the wife's death.

And, in Green v. Hudson River R. Co. 28 Barb. 21, Bacon, J., said that, at common law, "an action by a husband for the loss of his wife by the careless and negligent act of a third party can only be sustained where some period intervenes between the time of the injury and the time of dissolution, during which he could be said to have suffered the loss of her service and society, and incurred expense and undergone anxiety and distress on her account."

So, the husband may recover for being deprived of the society and assistance of his wife between the date of her negligent injury and her death. Philippi v. Wolff, supra.

And it was held in Mowry v. Chaney, supra, that the husband might also recover for the loss of the wife's society between the time of her injury and her death.

So, in Long v. Morrison, supra, it was held that where the wife's death resulted from the negligence of a physician at common law the husband might recover for the loss of her services between the time of injury and her death; and, if the action grew out of a breach of the contract upon the surgeon's part for skilful services, it survived the wife's death. See also SHERLAG v. KELLEY.

A husband may recover compensation for his loss of time as well as the funeral expenses of his wife, who was killed by defendant's negligence, although at common law he cannot recover for her death. Philby v. Northern P. R. Co. 46 Wash. 173, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1193, 123 Am. St. Rep. 926, 89 Pac. 468.

But the right of the husband, where the death of the wife was instantaneous, to recover for money expended in her burial, was denied in Grosso v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 317, 13 Atl. 233.

As to the common-law right of the husband to recover for loss of time and funeral expenses necessitated by the negligent killing of his wife, see the case note to Philby v. Northern P. R. Co. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1193.

As to the right of a parent, at common law, to recover damages for the negligent death of a minor child, see the note to Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Beall, 41 L.R.A. 807, and Stevenson v. W. M. Ritter Lumber Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 316.

ers dead by negligence, whether the relations of the parties are such that there is a breach of an express or implied contract, or whether the duty neglected arises outside of any contract. The remedy given by it is exclusive of any other in the cases to which it applies; and, if the present plaintiff had brought his action seasonably, he would have been entitled to a recovery under it. So far as the plaintiff claims damages growing out of the death of his wife, we are of opinion that the first and second grounds of demurrer are a bar to his recovery.

The third ground of demurrer is as follows: "For that the plaintiff cannot recover in an action of contract for alleged injury to his wife, resulting in her death, as stated in the declaration." If, through a breach of the defendant's contract, there was an injury to the plaintiff's wife that caused him damage, he can recover for it in an action of contract, notwithstanding that it finally resulted in her death. If he was caused additional expenses for her nursing, care, and treatment by the defendant's failure to perform his contract, he is entitled to damages. The fact that his wife subsequently died from the same cause is immaterial. As to this part of the case the declaration may be considered as if the allegation of death and the consequences of the death were omitted.

The demurrer does not distinctly raise the question whether the declaration is insufficient to permit a recovery of nominal damages or of actual general damages, if any were suffered previous to her death. If the question were raised, we should be obliged to answer it adversely to the defendant. The implied contract is set out, and the defendant's failure to perform it. In Hagan v. Riley, 13 Gray, 515, Chief Justice Shaw says: "For every breach of a promise made on good consideration the law awards some damage."

The breach is sufficiently alleged. It is a general rule in pleading that a breach of a contract may be assigned in the negative of the words of the contract. The exception is when such a negative does not plainly show that there is a breach. Marston v. Hobbs, 2 Mass. 433, 3 Am. Dec. 61; Bacon v. Lincoln, 4 Cush. 210, 50 Am. Dec. 765; Fisk v. Hicks, 31 N. H. 535-541; Randel v. Chesapeake & D. Canal Co. 1 Harr. (Del.) 151-175; Karthauss v. Owings, 2 Gill & J. 430-441; Poirier v. Gravel, 88 Cal. 79-82, 25 Pac. 962; Westbrook v. Schmaus, 51 Kan. 558-561, 33 Pac. 306.

The only averment of damages is general in the ad damnum. Where there are previous averments that show a liability, this is enough, unless special damages are claimed. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The forms of pleading previously used in this commonwealth are authorized by Rev. Laws, chap. 173, § 130. In Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 167, § 94, under the forms of declarations in actions of tort, is this language: "The ad damnum is a sufficient allegation of damage in all cases in which special damages are not claimed." In the form of declaration for breach of promise of marriage, there is no reference to the subject of damages, but the claim is left to the ad damnum. This is also true of some of the other forms in actions of contract in the same section. The principle is recognized in many cases. Baldwin v. Western R. Corp. 4 Gray, 333; Prentiss v. Barnea, 6 Allen, 410; Warner v. Bacon, 8 Gray, 397, 69 Am. Dec. 253; Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 1-24; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142-146, 6 S. E. 53; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 58 Ind. 575; Laraway v. Perkins, 10 N. Y. 371; Peters v. Cooper, 95 Mich. 191, 54 N. W. 694; McCarty v. Beach, 10 Cal. 462; Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 163-167, 60 Am. Rep. 529, 11 Pac. 882; Packard v. Slack, 32 Vt. 9; Wilson v. Clarke, 20 Minn. 367, Gil. 318; Hadley v. Prather, 64 Ind. 137. The declaration is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover nominal damages, and general damages if any resulted to the husband from a breach of such a contract as is set out. There being no other averment than the statement of the contract and an allegation of a breach of it, it does not appear whether there will be a claim of general damage to the plaintiff in his wife's lifetime, and we need not consider whether further averments would be necessary to entitle him to anything more than nominal damages.

Because the declaration states a cause of action in the plaintiff, without reference to the averments of the death of his wife and the damages resulting from it, the judgment is reversed and the demurrer is overruled.

So ordered.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

A. L. JOHNSON, Appt.,
v.

TOWN OF PHILADELPHIA.

(— Miss. —, 47 So. 526.)

Nuisance — skating rink.

1. A skating rink is not a nuisance per se, and cannot be made so by municipal ordinance.

Municipal corporation — authority — closing rink.

2. Charter authority to regulate, suppress, and impose taxes on skating rinks does not empower a municipality to require such rinks as are not in fact nuisances to close at 6 o'clock P. M.

(November 24, 1908.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Neshoba County denying an injunction against the enforcement of an ordinance which would result in the closing of the complainant's skating rink and destruction of his business. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. E. Wilson and E. S. Richardson for appellant.

Messrs. S. L. Dobbs and May, Flowers, & Whitfield for appellee.

Mayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The town of Philadelphia derives its power as a municipal corporation from the Code chapter on municipalities. On January 24, 1907, its mayor and board of aldermen passed the following ordinance, viz.:

"Be it ordained by the board of mayor and aldermen of the town of Philadelphia, Mississippi, that the pool rooms, billiard parlors, dance halls, and skating rinks, doing business at this time, or hereafter, in said town, shall close at 6 o'clock P. M., and remain closed until 6 o'clock A. M., and that any person managing or operating any such pool room, dance hall or skating rink after 6 o'clock P. M., and before 6 o'clock A. M., or any person found playing pool or billiards, dancing, or skating in any public hall or place herein, between such hours, shall be fined not less than $5.00 nor more than $100.00, nor be imprisoned more than thirty days, or both.

"Sec. 2. Be it further ordained that, the necessities and interest of the town demanding this ordinance be in full force and effect after this date."

At the time the above ordinance was passed, Johnson was conducting a skating rink in the town of Philadelphia, having previously paid all state and municipal taxes, and, after the passage of the ordinance procured an injunction against the town of Philadelphia enjoining the enforcement of the ordinance on the ground that it destroyed his business, was unreasonable, and void.

The great preponderance of testimony shows that Mr. Johnson conducted his business in an orderly manner, and that he allowed no such conduct in his place of business as would warrant the board of mayor and aldermen in suppressing it. But, if this were not true, the ordinance plainly shows that it was enacted under § 3340, Code 1906, giving municipalities the power "to regulate, suppress, and impose a privilege tax on all circuses, shows, theaters," etc., "skating rinks, . . . and other like things." If it were disposed to consider this ordinance as an ordinance suppressing a nuisance, it could have no validity, as a skating rink is not a nuisance per se, and no general declaration of the mayor and board of aldermen, through the medium of an ordinance declaring it to be a nuisance, without any notice to the party conducting the business and without reference to the fact of whether it is in fact a nuisance, can make it so.

Into every charter power given a municipality to pass by-laws or ordinances there is an implied restriction that the ordinances shall be reasonable, consistent with the general law, and not destructive of a lawful business. It is manifest that, if Johnson is not allowed to operate his skating rink except between the hours of 6 A. M. and 6 P. M., business will be destroyed. His is a place of amusement, and, so far as this record shows, a place of innocent amusement, the main business of which is done after 6 P. M. Under pretense of regulating a business, the business attempted to be regulated cannot be destroyed. This was not the intention of the legislature. If the legislature had intended that amusements of this character could be prohibited by a municipality, they would have said so in unequivocal terms.

In Freund on Police Power, § 63, it is said: "There is implied in every delegation of power to a municipal corporation a condition that the power must be exercised reasonably, and that therefore every unreasonable ordinance is ultra vires, and the court, in treating it as null and void, merely enforces the legislative will and principles of policy embodied in it."

And, again, in § 158 it is further said: "The requirement of reasonableness is so general in its nature that it allows the courts to exercise a very efficient control over ordinances without being under the necessity of formulating in each case a principle which would be a guide for other cases."

The section of the Code giving a municipality the power to regulate and suppress gives no power to prohibit. Skating rinks and such like can be suppressed only when as a fact they become nuisances, and when they are regulated it must be in a reason-

Note. — A painstaking search has brought to light no other cases in which the question has been raised as to the power of a municipal corporation to pass ordinances controlling or otherwise regulating skating rinks.

able way. In McQuillin on Municipal Ordinances, p. 79, it is said: "The power 'to regulate' will not be construed to include the power to prohibit. 'A power simply to regulate does not embrace a power to prohibit or destroy a trade or occupation.' Therefore ordinances to be valid cannot interfere with lawful employment."

The fact that the state law authorizes the conducting of the business is evidence that it was in contemplation of the law that the places should exist. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 325.

In the case of Crittenden v. Booneville (Miss.) 45 So. 723, the court said that the power given the municipality, under § 3340, "to regulate, suppress, and impose a privilege tax on all circuses, shows," etc. . . . does not carry with it the power to prohibit, unless it is in the exercise of the police power to suppress a nuisance. The municipality may regulate; that is to say, it may provide the hours during which these places may keep open, etc., and, if the conduct of the owner is such as to warrant it, or if it is conducted in a boisterous or immoral way, so as to become a nuisance, they may suppress altogether. But the power to regulate and suppress when the business has become a nuisance is one thing and the power to pass a general ordinance prohibiting the operation of a pool room, which has been legalized by the statute, is another thing. The first they have the power to exercise. The second they are without power."

We can establish no fixed and permanent guide to settle in future cases what is and what is not a reasonable exercise of the power of regulation. Each case must largely be determined by its own facts. In the Crittenden Case we held that the municipality may provide the hours during which a place of business of the character under discussion may be kept open, etc., yet, when the hours prescribed ruin the business under the guise of regulating, such a regulation is unreasonable.

The nature of the business being conducted forms an element for the consideration of the court in determining whether or not an ordinance is unreasonable as an ordinance regulating a business. It is unreasonable to say that a skating rink shall be kept open only between the hours of 6 A. M. and 6 P. M., and such ordinance cannot be upheld. Rights cannot be stealthily taken away under the power to regulate. The power to regulate is given for a wholesome purpose. It is a defensive power of municipality, and not a weapon of destruction.

Reversed and remanded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. ANTON SCHAEFER, Public Examiner,
v.

MINNESOTA TITLE INSURANCE & TRUST COMPANY.

RE WILLIAM BROS. BOILER & MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Claimant.

(104 Minn. 447, 116 N. W. 944.)

Title insurance — insolvency — recovery of premium.

1. The holder of a policy of insurance issued by a real-estate title-insurance company is, upon a cancellation or annulment of the policy by a judicial decree declaring the company insolvent and appointing a receiver to wind up its affairs, entitled to a return of a proportionate part of the premium paid therefor, measured by the time elapsing between the date of the policy and the date on which the company was so adjudged insolvent.

Same — contract stipulations — retention of premiums.

2. The policy holder is not entitled to the return of that part of the premium which the application for insurance stipulated might be retained by the company for its services in investigating the title insured.

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Case Note. — Right to return of premiums on adjudication of insolvency of insurer.

It is not intended in this note to include cases which pass upon the right of the insured to recover the present value of an insurance policy upon the dissolution of the insurer, unless the present value is treated as the unearned premium. Neither will cases be included which pass upon the measure of damages of an insured because of the dissolution of the insurer, unless the measure of damages is limited to the unearned premiums.

As to stock insurance companies, the courts are in harmony in holding that the insured, upon the dissolution of the company, is a creditor to the amount of the unearned premium on the policy or policies he holds. This statement is, of course, limited to cases passing upon the right to unearned premiums. It is not intended to assert this as a proposition of law applying to insurance policies generally, where there may be some other value to the policy than the unearned premium.

The foregoing doctrine was applied as to credit insurance in Gray v. Reynolds, 55 N. J. Eq. 501, 37 Atl. 461, wherein it is said that, where there is no reserve value to the policy, and no method of obtaining reinsurance, the only practical mode of deter-

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County allowing a claim in intervention in insolvency proceedings; the claimant appealing from so much of the decree as allowed the defendant company to retain a part of an unearned premium, and the receiver appealing from so much as allowed the claim. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jay W. Crane, for claimant:

The adjudication of insolvency and the appointment of a receiver in effect canceled the policy of title insurance; and claimant is entitled to repayment of the unearned premium on said policy.

mining the compensation to be made to the insured, where no provable loss had occurred at the time of the insolvency, would be by a rebate of that portion of the premium which represented the unexpired term of the policy. This case cites as authority for this position Smith v. National Credit Ins. Co. 65 Minn. 283, 33 L.R.A. 511, 68 N. W. 28, which is cited in STATE EX REL. SCHAEFER v. MINNESOTA TITLE INS. & T. Co.

The doctrine was applied as to casualty insurance in American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case (Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co.) 82 Md. 535, 38 L.R.A. 97, 34 Atl. 778, wherein it was held that, as soon as the insolvency of the insurer was judicially established by the decree appointing receivers, every holder of an existing policy had a claim to have a pro rata portion of his premium returned to him, where he had paid for a period extending beyond the date of insolvency.

The doctrine was also applied to fire-insurance policies, in Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co. 10 Mo. App. 393. The policy in this case contained a provision authorizing the assured to surrender the same and recover the unearned premiums at his pleasure. In this case, however, it was held that the mere taking of dissolution proceedings or the insolvency of the company did not ipso facto cancel the policy so as to entitle the policy holders to their unearned premiums from that date; and, unless advantage of the provision already mentioned was taken by the policy holders to cancel the same, the policy would not be considered as canceled until an adjudication of dissolution and insolvency had been had.

That question is now regulated by statute in Missouri, the superintendent of insurance, as to companies of insurance other than life insurance, being required to ascertain and allow the amount of premium unearned on each policy outstanding and in force at the time of the decree dissolving the company. Carr v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 28 Mo. App. 215.

Messrs. Belden, Jamison, & Shearer for defendant.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case, as disclosed by a stipulation of the parties, are as follows: The Minnesota Title Insurance & Trust Company was organized under the laws of the state for the purpose, among other things, of insuring titles to real property and issuing policies therefor. In February, 1907, claimant applied to the company for a clause in a fire-insurance policy permitting him to terminate the same and recover the unearned premium by surrendering the policy, although receivership proceedings were pending against the insurance company at the time such policy holders sought to take advantage of this clause. It is said that the amount to be repaid by the company on the cancellation of the policy is to be determined by the contract to the same extent as it would have been if receivership proceedings had not been begun. That these proceedings introduced no new element into the contract, and did not deprive a policy holder of his right to be paid a pro rata part of the premium when his policy was canceled by the dissolution of the company.

In Franzen v. Hutchinson, 94 Iowa, 95, 62 N. W. 698, it was held that local policy holders of a foreign insurance company, which had made an assignment for creditors in a different state could avail themselves of a clause in their policies authorizing them to cancel the same and demand the unearned portions of premiums which they had paid; and that they could enforce these demands against any property of the company within the state.

In Fogerty v. Philadelphia Trust, S. D. & Ins. Co. 75 Pa. 125, while the right of a policy holder to file his claim as a creditor of an insolvent fire insurance company because of the unearned premium on a policy issued by such company was recognized, his right to set off such claim in an action against him in behalf of the company, for a loan made to him by the company, was denied.

A statutory provision that policy holders of subsisting policies in a company dissolved are entitled to the pro rata portion of the premium paid by them was held in People v. Security Life Ins. & Annuity Co. 78 N. Y. 114, 34 Am. Rep. 522, not to apply to policies in life insurance companies, but only to policies of other classes which have a definite term to run.

In Lovell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 28 L. ed. 423, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390, the holder of a life-insurance policy was pany for a policy insuring the title to certain property it then owned, upon which, after due investigation, a policy was issued in due form insuring the title for the period of twenty-five years from its date, and claimant paid the premium charged therefor, amounting to $45. Thereafter, on March 26, 1907, about two months after the issuance of the policy, the insurance company, in proceedings instituted by the attorney general, was duly adjudged insolvent, and a receiver appointed to wind up its affairs. In June, 1907, claimant filed with the receiver as a demand against the company a claim for the return of the premium so paid. The question whether the claim should be allowed came up for hearing before the court below, where judgment was ordered for claimant for the unearned part of the premium less $10, which the court held the company was entitled to retain for services rendered in the examination of the title preparatory to the issuance of the policy. Both parties appealed.

We have found no case involving the right of a policy holder in an insurance company like the one before us, an insurer of title to real property, to a return of the unearned part of the premium, where, before the expiration of the policy, the insurance company became insolvent and retired from business. The question is entirely new and one of first impressions. We discover no reason, however, for not applying the rule applicable to the, in a measure, analogous case of a fire in-held entitled to his pro rata share of unearned premiums upon the consolidation of such life insurance company with another company. It is to be noted, however, in this case, that the insured canceled his policy because of the consolidation, and demanded as the measure of his damages all premiums paid by him. The court, however, held that he had had the benefit of protection for five years under his policy, and the value of that protection should be deducted from the premiums paid.

But Hone v. Boyd, 1 Sandf. 481, denied the right of the holder of a policy of marine insurance to have the ratable proportion of the premium for the period remaining unexpired at the time the insurer became insolvent abated from the amount of his premium note in an action thereon by the receivers. This decision appears not to be in accord with the other decisions.

Mutual companies.

Where a company authorized to insure either upon the customary mutual plan, taking deposit notes subject to assessments from time to time in proportion to losses, or for a term of years at a fixed annual premium, receiving the first year's premiums in advance and taking notes payable in instalments at the commencement of each of the years during which the policy is to run, issues a policy in the latter form, the holder does not thereby become a stockholder; and his obligation to continue payment of the notes terminates upon the insolvency of the company, the note for that year having been paid. Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 63 Ill. 187.

So, a policy, issued by a mutual fire insurance company but in the form of policies issued by stock insurance companies, was held, in Re Minneapolis Mut. F. Ins. Co. 49 Minn. 291, 51 N. W. 921, not to make the holder a member of the company; and his right, upon the termination of the policy by insolvency proceedings, to repayment of the unearned premium, was not inferior to the claims of other policy holders who had suffered loss by fire.

And one who, under a statute providing that a cash premium, when paid to a mutual insurance company, is to be received in lieu of a deposit note, pays the premium in cash, is entitled, upon the cancellation of the policy, to receive back a proportion thereof, to be determined upon the same basis as the rebate on a deposit note; and such obligation to repay is a liability of the corporation which must be discharged by its receiver. Raegener v. Willard, 44 App. Div. 41, 60 N. Y. Supp. 478.

In Carr v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 33 Mo. App. 291, the statute relating to recovery of unearned premiums (see 28 Mo. App. 215, supra) upon the dissolution of an insurance company was held to apply to policies in mutual fire insurance companies containing a clause authorizing their surrender by the policy holder at any time, and the recovery by him of the unearned premium thereon.

But, where a policy of a mutual insurance company contained a clause that, in the event of the dissolution of the company because of its insolvency, the insured, in addition to the cash premium paid by him, should pay a sum equal thereto, if necessary, to meet the liabilities of the company, it was held, in Hammond v. Knox, 125 App. Div. 9, 109 N. Y. Supp. 367, that, where the liability of the company was such as to require the entire premium paid, and also the full additional amount which the policy holder had obligated himself to pay, he could not avail himself of another clause in the policy permitting policy holders to cancel their policies at any time and recover the unearned premium.

In Dewey v. Davis, 82 Wis. 500, 52 N. W. 774, and Atlas Paper Co. v. Seamans, 82 Wis. 504, 52 N. W. 775, it was held that, to entitle the holder of a policy of a mutual insurance company, whether issued on the "cash plan" or the "mutual plan," to the return of unearned premiums, he must bring himself within the terms of a statute declaring that, at the request of the insured, the company shall cancel the policy and return the unearned premium, or of the provision of the by-laws giving the company insurance company. It has been held in respect to such companies that the adjudication of insolvency and the appointment of a receiver to close the affairs of the company in effect annuls the policy and entitles the holder thereof to a return of the unearned premium. Taylor v. North Star Mut. Ins. Co. 46 Minn. 198, 48 N. W. 772; Re Minneapolis Mut. F. Ins. Co. 49 Minn. 291, 51 N. W. 921; Smith v. National Credit Ins. Co. 65 Minn. 283, 33 L.R.A. 511, 68 N. W. 28; McCallum v. National Credit Ins. Co. 84 Minn. 134, 86 N. W. 892. In the case of fire, hail, storm, or other like insurance, the indemnity is against loss which may occur at some time in the future during the life of the policy, and the contract serves as a protection to the policy holder during that time. In the title insurance the situation is the same, save that the loss suffered must arise from some defect in the title existing at the time of or before the policy was issued, and is subsequently successfully asserted to the damage of the policy holder. So that, substantially, the indemnity in either case is against future loss or damage; the loss arising in the one case from the happening of a future event, and in the other from a loss subsequent to the date of the policy by reason of the successful assertion of an adverse title or interest in the land insured which existed at the time or before the contract was made. That a loss of this kind might arise in the future, though the chances in this class of insurance are strongly against such a result, brings the case, by analogy, within the rule applicable to other insurance contracts, and the trial court was correct in applying it. The difference in probable or possible loss in the two classes of insurance is practically one of degree only; the probability of loss in this class being materially less than in the case of fire insurance.

We are also of opinion, and so hold, that the court adopted the correct rule of damages. The court held that the claimant was entitled to the return of the premium less a proportionate amount, which it may be said the company earned up to the time of its insolvency, and the sum of $10, allowed for the examination of the title before issuing the policy. The allowance of this item is fully justified by the terms of the contract, by which claimant agreed to pay for the insurance the sum of $45, with the understanding that $10 thereof, which was paid at the time of the application, should be retained by the company, whether the policy was issued or not, as compensation for services rendered in the investigation of the title. The company fully performed this service. If a policy had not been issued, the applicant could not demand its return; and if, under such circumstances, it could be retained by the company, the fact that it issued the policy should not forfeit its right to retain it for the same service. The court adopted the rule of time in measuring the earned portion of the premium. It is urged that this was incorrect, and that some other more equitable rule should have been applied. We are unable to concur in this contention. While it is true that the risk of loss under a contract the right to cancel any policy, and requiring it, in case it does so, to return the unearned premium, which were the only provisions on the subject; and that the cancellation of the policy by operation of law, in consequence of proceedings to wind up the company, did not bring him within either provision. The court gave as an equally conclusive reason why the policy holder could not recover the unearned premium that the premium notes constituted the only funds in the hands of the receiver out of which to pay the claims against the insolvent company, and that there was no law authorizing an assessment of those notes to pay unearned premiums on policies, whether the premium was paid in cash or by note, the statute only authorizing assessments to pay "losses and expenses" accruing during the period of the insurance.

In reaching the same conclusion upon a very similar state of facts, the court said, in Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116: "Claims for return premium stand upon footings varied according to the terms of the particular contract, and the time and circumstances of the cancellation. Assuming that such a claim, when the cancellation is made necessary by insolvency, or 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by losses resulting in suspension and settlement through a receiver of the court, is to be regarded as belonging to the same period with the losses themselves, yet, in the absence of particular agreements, the foundation of such a claim is not obvious. The appropriation of the fund is contemplated by the nature of the association; its exhaustion results from the limit fixed by statute, which becomes an element in the contract, even when not expressly contained therein. No 'just claim' against the company arises from the fact that all future indemnity is thus practically rendered ineffectual. In that condition of things, if the party would be entitled, on any ground, to maintain an action, or prove a claim, for the loss of his unexpired term by the cancellation of his policy, it would seem that the measure of his damages must be reduced to a minimum." The court added, however, that these suggestions did not apply to the case of a cancellation effected before the occurrence of losses, whereby the party is relieved from liability to assessment, and his claim has already become fixed as a debt against the solvent company.

of this kind, unlike other insurance, diminishes with the lapse of time, and as the end of the period covered by the policy approaches there is less and less likelihood of loss, yet to attempt to say from this basis what proportion of the premium has been earned would involve the matter in arbitrary speculation, and bring up at an exceedingly unsatisfactory result, since no certain or definite rule could be evolved from that process of reasoning; whereas, on the other hand, to apportion the time during which the policy was in force to that of the unexpired period leaves no room for speculation or conjecture, does not involve an effort to measure the value of the possibility or probability of a loss, and fixes a rule which, if not wholly satisfactory, is at least definite and certain.

Our conclusions, therefore, are in harmony with those reached by the learned trial judge, and his order in the premises is affirmed.

Headnote by BRANNON, J.

Case Note. — Effect of appointment of receiver for insured on fire insurance.

The appointment of a receiver for a mortgagee to whom a policy of insurance was expressly payable, after the destruction of the insured property, does not violate a condition of the policy that, if any change shall take place in the title or possession of the property, whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance, in whole or in part, by legal process, or judicial decree, the policy shall be void. Small v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 51 Fed. 789. The court said that, as the receiver was appointed after the loss occurred and a right of action therefor had accrued, no forfeiture thereby occurred.

So, the appointment of a receiver to take possession of insured property pending a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage thereon, where the policy was expressly payable to the mortgagee, does not violate a condition of the policy rendering it void if any change takes place in the title or possession by legal the property, "whether by legal process or judgment, or otherwise," the policy shall be wholly void. The appointment of a receiver in a suit to take possession and control of the property, who takes actual possession of it, prevents recovery of loss under it.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mingo County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover upon a fire-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stokes & Bronson and Sheppard, Koodykoonts, & Scherr for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Vinson & Thompson and Brown & Wiles, for defendant in error:

The provision of the insurance policy is a material one, and the taking of possession by the trustee avoids the policy.

German Ins. Co.* 84 Wis. 76, 36 Am. St. Rep. 905, 54 N. W. 22; St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Archibold (Tex. App.) 16 Ins. Law J. 153.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The New York Fire Insurance Company issued a policy to the Columbia Distilling Company insuring a stock of liquors and other personal property. The policy contained the provision that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, shall be process, judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance, as the possession of the receiver, as an officer of the court, being for the benefit of all parties concerned, does not, as between the mortgagee and the insurer, impair or diminish the interest of the latter in the insured property. Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 58 Kan. 339, 62 Am. St. Rep. 621, 49 Pac. 92.

The taking possession, by a receiver, of insured property at the instance of a mortgagee, to whom the loss was expressly payable, in order to preserve the value of the insured property as security, is not a violation of a condition of a policy providing that it shall be void if the insured property be levied on or taken into possession or custody under any proceeding in law or equity, whether there is any change of possession or not. Farmers' F. Ins. Co. v. Baker, 94 Md. 545, 51 Atl. 184. The court observed that such a condition did not mean a taking into custody as the result of the appointment of a receiver for the insured property under void if . . . any change other than by death of the insured takes place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insured (except change of occupancy without increased hazard) whether by legal process, or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, or if this policy be assigned before loss." A suit was brought to dissolve the insured corporation, and in it a receiver was appointed to operate the distillery and take possession and control of the company's property, including the personality insured, and the receiver did take actual possession of such property. Later a proceeding in bankruptcy was instituted against the distilling company to adjudge it a bankrupt, and in this bankruptcy proceeding another receiver was appointed to take possession of the said property, and he did take possession of it. Later a fire destroyed the property insured. We have in hand a writ of error in an action brought by Bronson, trustee in bankruptcy, against the insurance company, to recover from it the loss arising from the fire. The judge of the circuit court of Mingo county, upon such circumstances, as such appointment was an incident growing out of the particular situation, and could not have, and was not intended to have, any ultimate effect upon the title or possession, being merely an expedient devised to meet the exigency, the intention and effect being merely to make temporary provisions for the care and protection of the property in the interest of all concerned.

So, the appointment of one copartner, in a dissolution proceeding, as a receiver pendente lite of the insured copartnership property, the receiver continuing the business, does not constitute such a change in the actual custody of the property as will violate a condition of a policy that, if, the insured property is sold or transferred, or any change takes place in title or possession; whether by legal process, or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance, the policy shall be void; as his appointment works no change in the possession of the partnership, the legal title to the property remaining in the latter and it is a change in legal title only that will avoid the policy. Keeney v. Home Ins. Co. 71 N. Y. 396, 27 Am. Rep. 60, reversing 3 Thomp. & C. 478.

In Herman Bros. v. Katz Bros. 101 Tenn. 118, 41 L.R.A. 700, 47 S. W. 86, the court denied the contention that the destruction of insured personality between the seizure thereof upon attachment and the appointment of a receiver constituted an increase of risk, and violated a provision rendering a policy void if any change takes place in the title or possession of the subject-matter of insurance, whether by legal process, or judgment, or by the voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise.

The appointment of a receiver to take agreed facts, rendered judgment for the insurance company.

The sole question here is whether the change of possession into the hands of the said receivers avoids the policy, and bars recovery because of the clause in the policy above quoted. We think no recovery can be had upon it. By the appointment of the receiver and his taking actual possession of the property, the distilling company, which was in possession when the policy issued, was deprived of the possession. When an insurance company insures property for one person, it has inquired into his carefulness and character, and it trusts him to provide for the safety of his own property, while he has it in possession; but it does not trust everybody into whose hands it may come, whether he be receiver or not. The very thing against which that policy provided had taken place before the fire,—a total change of possession. The distilling company no longer guarded the property. It was in the hands of one not moved by the same interest to care for the property as would be the distilling company when solvent and operating. Its interest had charge of and collect the rents from leased property, which was insured in the name of a trustee, for the benefit of the property owner's creditors, whom the receiver succeeded, does not violate a condition of a policy rendering it void if any change takes place in title or possession of the property, whether by sale or judicial decree, without notice to the company and its consent indorsed thereon, as the appointment of a receiver did not work such a change in the possession or title of the property as the policy contemplated, or render the insured less watchful in guarding and preserving the property from destruction. Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Bartlett, 91 Va. 305, 50 Am. St. Rep. 832, 21 S. E. 476.

Where a policy of fire insurance runs to a receiver in a designated suit, a mere change of receivers does not involve a change of title or possession. Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019.

No condition of a fire-insurance policy against change of possession or title is violated by the appointment of a receiver in bankruptcy for the insured after the destruction of the insured property. Gordon v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. 120 La. 441, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 827, 124 Am. St. Rep. 434, 45 So. 384; Fuller v. Jameson, 98 App. Div. 53, 90 N. Y. Supp. 456, affirmed without opinion in 184 N. Y. 605, 77 N. E. 1187; Fuller v. New York F. Ins. Co. 184 Mass. 12, 67 N. E. 879.

As to the effect of bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings or assignment for benefit of creditors, on fire insurance, see case note to Gordon v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 827.

practically ceased. It was bankrupt. Kerr, Ins. § 151, says that a condition of a policy that, if any change of title or possession takes place, "whether by sale, transfer, conveyance, legal process, or judicial decree, then and in every such case the policy shall be void, includes an involuntary as well as a voluntary change of possession. A writ of attachment is process, and the fact that an officer levied upon property insured under a writ of attachment, and took possession thereunder, shows a change of possession, avoiding the policy." The case cited by Kerr—Carey v. German American Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 80, 20 L.R.A. 267, 36 Am. St. Rep. 907, 54 N. W. 18—so holds. The mere delivery to a sheriff of an execution for levy is not a change of title or possession under such a policy, nor even is its levy, unless the officer takes actual possession, though the levy gives him constructive possession; but it is different if he takes actual possession. A sale under decree does not change interest, so long as the insured remains in possession and retains right of redemption. Vance, Ins. 454. It is the actual change of possession, physical possession, that violates the policy. In this case there was such change of possession. It will be found on reading the authorities that actual change of possession under legal procedure so operates. Walradt v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 136 N. Y. 375, 32 Am. St. Rep. 752, 32 N. E. 1063; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Met. (Ky.) 9, 81 Am. Dec. 521; Wood v. American F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 382, 52 Am. St. Rep. 733, 44 N. E. 80; McClelland v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 107 La. 124, 31 So. 691. Cleavenger v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 47 W. Va. 595, 35 S. E. 998, does not militate against this position, but supports it. It holds that a decree of sale which is not executed until after the fire does not avoid a policy such as is involved in this case because there was no change of title or possession until after the fire; that is, if there had been such change of possession, it would be different. The case of Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Bartlett, 91 Va. 305, 50 Am. St. Rep. 832, 21 S. E. 476, would not support a recovery in this case. A corporation owned the property, and gave a deed to trustees to secure its creditors. The trustees took out insurance for the corporation in its name and leased the property. The property was in the possession of the corporation. The trustees never took actual possession. The receiver was appointed on the resignation of the trustees, and left the same lessee in possession. It was held the policy was not avoided. The court said that the mere appointment of a receiver did not work any such change in the possession or title of the property as contemplated by the clause of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the policy. No change of possession took place. The same lessee in possession under the corporation before the trustees resigned remained in possession after the substitution of a receiver in their place, and was in possession at the time of the fire. The court said: "The only change that had taken place was that the court had appointed J. Kemp Bartlett, Jr., as the hand to receive and sign receipts for rent arising from the Luray inn, in the room and stead of H. J. Smoot and others, trustees, resigned. The only act performed by J. Kemp Bartlett, Jr., as receiver after his qualification on the 16th of October, 1891, disclosed by the record, was to make an indorsement thereon extending for a further time the same lease that was on the property when the policy was executed; thus continuing the property in the actual possession of the same lessee." The case of Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019, was where property insured in the name of a receiver was in the hands of the court by its receivers at the date of the policy, and the fire occurred while the property was in the hands of the receiver who took out the policy. Before the fire, that receiver resigned, and a new one was appointed, but had not qualified or taken possession when the fire occurred. There was no change of actual possession. It was still in the hands of the first receiver. The court held that the mere name of the receiver or the personnel of the officer did not change the possession of the property as it was in the possession of the same party at the date of the fire as when the policy was written. The point of the decision is that a mere change of the receiver, not changing possession, is not a change of title or possession under the policy. But this admits that, if there were a change of possession, it would be different. Counsel asks: "Did the appointment of a receiver increase hazard or risk? We say 'Yes,' or might have done so. The company did not choose the receiver, or consent to his selection. It provided against it. It is the letter and plain meaning and spirit of the contract, and it has been said over and again, that 'contracts of insurance, like other contracts, are to be considered according to the sense and meaning of the terms, and, if clear and unambiguous, the terms are to be taken in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense.' Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379. The clause is nothing but the usual in policies made for the protection of the company, and has been often recognized by the courts as valid.

We affirm the judgment.

J. W. JOHNSON, Appt.,
v.
MAMMOTH VEIN COAL COMPANY.

(— Ark. —, 114 S. W. 722.)

Master — statutory duty — assumption of risk.

1. A miner does not, by continuing his work after the master has refused to comply with its statutory duty to furnish necessary props to make the room in which he is working safe, assume the risk of injury from such breach of duty.

Same — contributory negligence.

2. It is not negligence per se for a miner, knowing that a portion of his room is in need of props which the master refuses to furnish, to continue to work in another portion, the roof of which he has tested, where the fall of the unprotected portion of the roof may affect the portion in which he is working, or may not.

Johnson brought suit against the Mam-

Case Note. — Servant's assumption of risk of the master's breach of a statutory duty.

This subject is treated in a case note to Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981. The cases subsequently decided are characterized by the same conflict that was disclosed in that note.

The present note does not cover the question whether assumption of risk is available as a defense to an action based on the employment of a child under statutory age. (see on that subject case note to Lenahan v. Pittston Coal Min. Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 461); nor the question whether the doctrine of assumed risk is available under a statute abolishing or modifying the fellow-servant rule; nor the question whether the defense of contributory negligence is available as a defense to an action based upon a breach of the master's statutory duty. Upon the question whether contributory negligence is a defense where the statute excludes the defense of assumption of risk, see case note to Dumphy v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1152.

By the decision in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Gannon, 40 Colo. 195, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 90 Pac. 853, Colorado aligns itself with those jurisdictions which permit the defense of assumption of risk of a master's neglect of duty, even though the duty was imposed by statute, it being specifically held in that case that a switchman might assume the risk of the failure of the railroad company to block switches, as required by a statute which also declares that the failure to do so shall be prima facie evidence of negligence.

In Sutton v. Des Moines Bakery Co. 135 Iowa, 390, 112 N. W. 836, the Iowa supreme court, following the previous decisions in that state, also holds that a servant may assume the risk of the absence of a guard required by statute.

To the same effect is Seely v. Tennant, 104 Minn. 354, 116 N. W. 648, following the previous decision in Starr v. Great Northern R. Co. 67 Minn. 18, 69 N. W. 632.

And the New Jersey court of errors and appeals, after a review of the cases, adopts this side of the question in Mika v. Passaic 9 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Print Works (N. J.) 70 Atl. 327. The court emphasizes the fact that there is no provision in the statute expressly excluding such defense, and that it provides a penalty alone for violation, and makes no reference to civil liability.

As shown in the previous note, New York is committed to this side of the question; and it is held in the recent case of Bushtis v. Catskill Cement Co. 128 App. Div. 780, 113 N. Y. Supp. 294, that the New York doctrine was not affected by an amendment of the factory act making failure to comply with its provisions a crime.

When, however, an action is brought under the New York employers' liability act (Laws 1902, chap. 600, § 3) based upon the violation of a specific statutory duty on the part of the master, assumption of risk is made a question for the jury rather than for the court by the provisions of § 3 of that act, to the effect that an employee, as a matter of law, shall be deemed to have assumed only the necessary risks inherent in the nature of the business which remain after the employer has exercised due care and has complied with the laws for the protection of employees; and that, in an action for an injury for which the employer would otherwise be liable, the question whether he understood and assumed the risk shall be submitted to the jury, subject to the usual powers of the court, in a proper case, to set aside a verdict contrary to the evidence. Kierman v. Eidlitz, 109 App. Div. 726, 96 N. Y. Supp. 387, S. C. on subsequent appeal, 115 App. Div. 141, 100 N. Y. Supp. 731.

It was at one time held by the appellate division of the first department (Ward v. Manhattan R. Co. 95 App. Div. 437, 88 N. Y. Supp. 758) that the provisions of § 3 of the employers' liability act applied whether the action was brought under that act or at common law; but in the subsequent case of Curran v. Manhattan R. Co. 118 App. Div. 347, 103 N. Y. Supp. 351, that court changed its ruling on this point, and held that the section applied only to an action brought under the act; and it is also held by the appellate division of the third department in O'Neil v. Karr, 110 App. Div. 571, 97 N. Y. Supp. 148 (af-moth Vein Coal Company for a personal injury received in its mine; and, after hearing the evidence adduced, the circuit judge directed a verdict to be returned in favor of the defendant. The sole question on this appeal is whether the plaintiff's testimony presented such facts as would justify the case going to the jury. Johnson's testimony was to the following effect. He was an experienced miner, working in room No. 2, east entry, of the mine of the Mammoth Vein Coal Company on the 5th of March, 1906. The room was approximately 150 feet long by 20 wide. It was properly propped on both sides to within 15 or 20 feet of the face of the coal, the props being on both sides and in the middle. On the west side there were no props for 15 or 20 feet of the face of the coal, and on the east side there were props to within 8 or 10 feet of it. Johnson was injured on Wednesday, and on the preceding Monday, when he finished his work, he called upon the boss driver for props to be placed in his room by the next morning. The boss driver was the proper person upon whom to make this demand, as it was his business to furnish props to the miners upon demand. Johnson wanted these props to place under the west side of his roof, as he had discovered that that side was drummy for a space of 4 to 8 feet. A drummy condition of a roof is where the rock is loosened to some extent, and such condition is dangerous, and this fact was known to him. Johnson had placed two shots, one on the firmed by the court of appeals), and Bush-tis v. Catskill Cement Co. supra, that the provisions of the section on this point are not applicable in an action at common law.

In Perrotta v. Richmond Brick Co. 123 App. Div. 626, 108 N. Y. Supp. 10, it was held by the appellate division of the second department that the question of the assumption of risk from the failure of the master to provide a proper guard for machinery was for the jury, under § 3 of the employers' liability act. It does not appear in this case, however, whether the action was brought under that act or at common law, nor whether it was based upon breach of a common-law duty of the master, or upon his violation of a specific statutory duty.

It will be observed that the modification, indicated by these cases, of the New York rule as to assumption of risk in case of the master's violation of a statutory duty, is not due to any change of opinion as to the effect of a statute imposing specific duties upon the master, but is attributable solely to the express provisions of the employers' liability act already referred to.

As shown in the earlier note, Indiana is committed to the doctrine that a statute imposing specific duties upon the master, by implication excludes the defense of assumption of risk in an action based on the violation of such statute. This view is sustained, and applied in the subsequent case of Diamond Block Coal Co. v. Cuthbertson, 166 Ind. 290, 76 N. E. 1060, to an action based on the violation of the master's statutory duty concerning coal mines; in United States Cement Co. v. Cooper (Ind. App.) 82 N. E. 981, to an action based on the violation of provisions of the factory act requiring machinery to be guarded.

And in Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Lawrence, 169 Ind. 319, 79 N. E. 363, 82 N. E. 768, it was held that a switchman does not assume the risk from failure to comply with an ordinance requiring locomotives running backward in the nighttime to keep a conspicuous light at the rear; which ordinance was adopted pursuant to a statute authorizing cities to provide for security of citizens from running trains.

The general proposition that a master may not invoke assumption of risk to defeat an action for injuries caused by his violation of a specific statutory mandate or duty is also declared in Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak (Ind.) 87 N. E. 229, and is there applied in an action based on the employment of a child over hours in violation of statute. (The application of the principle to this class of cases, however, is not within the scope of this note. See, on this question, note to Lenahan v. Pittston Coal Min. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461.

The view, however, that assumed risk is not available as a defense to an action based on the violation of a statutory duty is limited in Indiana to the violation of a statute imposing a positive and specific duty upon the employer; and Monteith v. Kokomo Wood Enameling Co. 159 Ind. 149, 58 L.R.A. 944, 64 N. E. 610, noted a distinction on this point between statutes which require of the employer the performance of a specific duty e. g., to guard or fence dangerous machinery, and statutes such as the employers' liability act which do little more than declare the rule of common law; and intimated that assumed risk might be a defense to an action based on a statute of the latter class.

And, recognizing this distinction, Whiteley Malleable Castings Co. v. Wishon (Ind. App.) 85 N. E. 832, and Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bossert (Ind. App.) 87 N. E. 158, hold that the doctrine of assumed risk is read into the statute modifying the fellow-servant rule. (This specific question, however, is not within the scope of this note, and these cases are referred to merely as illustrating the limitation of the Indiana doctrine.)

In Antioch Coal Co. v. Rockey, 169 Ind. 247, 82 N. E. 76, it was held that a miner did not assume the risk from the failure to comply with a statute making it the duty of the mining boss to see that all loose coal, slate, or rock overhead was carefully secured, and, if for any reason such security could not be had, to see that such loose coal, slate, or rock was removed before the miners were permitted to resume work. The decision, however does not seem to rest upon the general doctrine that the statute impliedly ex-west side and one on the east side, of the room, and they had been fired, evidently after he had ceased work on Monday. He did not work on Tuesday, principally because he did not have the props. He demanded of the boss driver props again on Tuesday for Wednesday, and they were promised for that time. He also saw the pit boss, and had a promise from the pit boss that he would have the props on Wednesday, and, according to the custom of the mine, they should have been taken to him Wednesday morning on the first trip of the driver. The driver failed to bring them to him on that trip, and told him he had been unable to get them. After this default of the boss driver and the pit boss to furnish him props as demanded and as promised, Johnson continued to work on Wednesday until he was injured, which occurred some time after the failure to bring props. He worked on the east side of his room, under that part of the roof which was not drummy and which he regarded as properly propped. He tested the roof on Monday, and again on Wednesday after the shots had been fired, and found it in the same condition that it was on Monday before the shots were fired. Four or 5 feet of the coal had been shot out on the west side by the firing of the shot there, and this would have some tendency to loosen the roof, but on sounding it, in his opinion, its condition had not been changed. Had he cludes the assumption of risk, but upon the ground that the facts did not bring the case within the scope of the general rule that a servant assumes the risk of danger incident to working in a place where the character or conditions for safety are constantly changing.

The question whether assumed risk is available as a defense to an action based on the violation of a statute was mooted, but not decided, in Madison v. Clippinger, 74 Kan. 700, 88 Pac. 260; but the negative side of that question is expressly taken in Western Furniture & Mfg. Co. v. Bloom, 76 Kan. 127, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 225, 123 Am. St. Rep. 123, 90 Pac. 821, specifically holding that assumed risk is not available as a defense to an action founded on a violation of the provision of the factory act. This decision was a deduction from the positions previously taken in Kansas that assumption of risk is one of the terms of the contract of employment, and that the protection to employees designed by statute cannot be contracted away. Kansas Buff Brick & Mfg. Co. v. Stark, 77 Kan. 648, 95 Pac. 1047, is to the same effect.

Upon the same reasoning the doctrine that assumption of risk is not available as a defense to an action based on the violation of a statutory duty of the master, e. g., his failure to guard an elevator shaft, is also adopted by the Michigan supreme court in Murphy v. Grand Rapids Veneer Works, 142 Mich. 677, 106 N. W. 211.

And two of the judges expressed an opinion to the same effect in Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co. 147 Mich. 454, 111 N. W. 110. The other three judges concurred in the result only; but it does not necessarily follow, that they entertained any doubt on this point, as their refusal to assent to the opinion may have been due to other points considered therein.

The Oregon supreme court, in Hill v. Saugestad (Or.) 98 Pac. 524, also aligns itself with the courts holding that assumption of risk is not available as a defense to an action based on the violation of the master's statutory duty.

And the Washington doctrine that, in the absence of provisions to the contrary, the statute prescribing specific duties on the 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

part of the master by implication precludes the defense of assumption of risk was followed in the subsequent case of Gustafson v. A. J. West Lumber Co. (Wash.) 97 Pac. 1094 (failure to guard saw.)

And it was held that the repeal of the factory act of 1903 after an injury sustained by an employee did not restore the right to rely on the assumption of risk, as to an injury occurring before the repeal, although the trial of the action took place after the repeal. Miller v. Union Mill Co. 45 Wash. 199, 88 Pac. 130.

In Johnston v. Northern Lumber Co. 42 Wash. 230, 84 Pac. 627, however, where the master had attempted to comply with the requirement of the factory act of 1903 to provide a "proper guard" by furnishing a guard of the kind approved by experienced mill men, it was held that the doctrine precluding defense of assumption of risk was not applicable. It is not clear, however, how the question of assumption of risk could be involved here as the court seems to have been of the opinion that, under the circumstances, there was no violation of the master's statutory duty.

In Millsap v. Beggs, 122 Mo. App. 1, 97 S. W. 956, the court said that it was unnecessary to consider whether defendant can be allowed recourse to the doctrine of the employee's assumption of obvious risk as distinguished from ordinary risk, since, if such defense was allowable, the defendant had the benefit of it.

And Kirby v. Manufacturers' Coal & Coke Co. 127 Mo. App. 588, 106 S. W. 1069, declares in general terms that the doctrine of assumed risk has no application where the master was negligent, without making any reference in this connection to the statute, though as a matter of fact the plaintiff's action was based on the master's violation of a statutory duty.

Federal cases.

As indicated in the note to Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 981, there appears to be some uncertainty whether the Federal courts, in actions based on a violation of a state statute, are bound by the decisions of the courts of the state in which the statute was enacted, upon the received the props he would have placed two or three on the west side 6 or 8 feet from the face of the coal, and he would have considered that sufficient to have made that side safe. He did not consider that any were needed on the east side to make that side safe, as the props extended to within 8 or 10 feet of the coal on that side. When a drummy part of a roof falls, it may fall without affecting the other part, or it might possibly bring down some of the adjoining roof with it. While mining on the east side, close to his shot, the drummy part on the west side fell and brought down some of the roof over him, which hit him on the head and shoulders and knocked him down, and in falling he stumbled over a pick handle which struck him in the groin. This fall over the pick handle ruptured him, and he has been permanently disabled thereby. When he fell his light was put out, and he does not know how much of the roof fell. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial judge granted the motion of the defendant for a peremptory instruction, on the ground that under the decision of Patterson Coal Co. v. Poe, 81 Ark. 343, 99 S. W. 538, the plaintiff assumed the risk, and is not entitled to recover in the action. The plaintiff has properly brought the case here.

question under consideration. It would seem, however, that the question is clearly one of statutory construction, as to which the decisions of the state courts, of last resort at least, would be binding. This seems to be assumed in Federal Lead Co. v. Swyers, 161 Fed. 687, which, however, relying on St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 63 L.R.A. 551, 61 C. C. A. 477, 126 Fed. 405, and Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981, 72 C. C. A. 635, 141 Fed. 247, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 448, held that assumption of risk was available as a defense, whether the case was predicated upon the provisions of the Missouri statute requiring the belting, shafting, gearing and drums in all manufacturing establishments, when so placed as to be dangerous to persons employed thereby, to be securely guarded, or on the statutory provision that no minor or woman shall be "required" to work between the "fixed or traversing" part of a machine. The court apparently assumed that the decision of a Missouri supreme court on the subject would be binding upon it, but refused to follow the decisions on this point of the Kansas City court of appeals, which were promulgated after the Federal decisions already referred to, upon the ground that they were not the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the state. The court makes no reference to the decision of the Missouri supreme court in Durant v. Lexington Coal Min. Co. 97 Mo. 62, 10 S. W. 484, cited in the earlier note, holding that a miner did not assume the risk of the violation of the employer's duty to have an iron cover on the cage used in the mining shaft. While this decision was not based on the specific statutory provisions that were involved in the Swyers Case, it would seem that the principle on which the decision rests was broad enough to cover them, and therefore to afford a binding precedent for a case arising under them.

And in Inland Steel Co. v. Kachwinski, 80 C. C. A. 571, 151 Fed. 219, the Federal court apparently regarded the doctrine announced by the Indiana supreme court, with respect to the "mining act," that the act impliedly precludes the defense of "assumption of risk," as binding upon it with respect to the factory act, although it also alludes to the fact that the same doctrine had been applied by the state supreme court to the factory act.

The Oregon statute, which expressly creates a cause of action in behalf of those injured by its violation, is held in Welsh v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 167 Fed. 465, to preclude the defense of assumed risk. The court inclined to that opinion, even treating the question as one of general law, but said that the question is one as to which the Federal courts are bound by the decision of the highest court of the state in which the action arises, and, in the absence of a decision of the Oregon supreme court on the point, was of the opinion that the decision of the supreme court of the state of Washington, from which the Oregon statute was borrowed, holding such defense precluded, was binding upon it.

The defense of assumption of risk from injury from an unboxed saw was held, in Malloy v. Northern P. R. Co. 151 Fed. 1019, to be precluded by the congressional employers' liability act of 1906, which expressly provides that "no contract of employment, . . . entered into by or on behalf of any employee, . . . shall constitute any bar or defense to an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to, or death of, such employee."

And it was held in Bolan-Darnell Coal Co. v. Williams (Ind. Terr.) 104 S. W. 867, that assumed risk is not available as a defense to violation of an act of Congress requiring owners and managers of coal mines to furnish miners with pure air, which shall be forced through the mines by proper machinery, and to expel therefrom noxious or poisonous gases.

Summary.

The review of the decisions since the note in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981, shows that there has been in the meantime no change of position on this subject by the courts which had then passed upon the point; but that Colorado and New Jersey have been added to the list of states in which it is held that the doctrine of assumed risk is not precluded; and Arkansas, Kansas, and Oregon to those which hold that the statute, by implication, abolishes that defense.

Mr. C. T. Wetherby, for appellant:

Wilful violation must be alleged when the benefit of the statute is invoked.

Cole v. Mayne, 122 Fed. 836.

The servant did not assume the risk in going to work.

Messrs. Read & McDonough for appellee.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is predicated upon § 5352, Kirby's Dig., and upon § 5350 as amended by the Acts of 1905, which sections are as follows:

"Sec. 5352. The owner, agent, or operator of any mine shall keep a sufficient amount of timber when required to be used as props, so that the workmen can at all times be able to properly secure the said workings from caving in; and it shall be the duty of the owner, agent or operator to send down all such props when required, and deliver said props to the place where cars are delivered."

"Sec. 5350. For any injury to persons or property occasioned by the wilful violation of this act, or wilful failure to comply with any of its provisions, a right of action shall accrue to any party injured, for any direct damages sustained thereby; Provided, that should death ensue from any such injury, a cause of action shall survive in favor, first, of the widow and minor children of such deceased; if there be no widow or minor children, then to the father if living, then to the mother; if no mother, then to the brothers and sisters and their descendants." Acts 1905, p. 569.

Briefly stated, the facts are: Johnson found part of his room needed props. He thrice demanded them. The company failed to furnish them. With knowledge that they would not be furnished at that time he continued to work, and was injured by a falling roof. As will be seen from an examination of the foregoing statement, the facts of the case bring it within Patterson Coal Co. v. Poe, 81 Ark. 343, 99 S. W. 538. In that case, as in this one, the miner proceeded with his work without waiting for the props which he had requested, and which the mining company had failed to furnish him; and it was there held that he was aware of the risk which, to some extent, attended the situation, but his continuance of the work manifested his willingness to assume that risk. In the case of Mammoth Vein Coal Co. v. Bubliss, 83 Ark. 567, 104 S. W. 210, the facts were essentially the same as in Patterson Coal Co. v. Poe, but the court preferred placing the ground of the decision upon the contributory negligence of the miner in working in an obviously dangerous place rather than to follow Patterson Coal Co. v. Poe, in placing it upon the assumption of risk, and pointed out in cases like those two, where the plaintiff exposes himself to a danger that is obvious and imminent, it is not of much practical importance whether the case is disposed of on the ground of assumed risk or contributory negligence. This case is memorable in the court as the last judicial work of the late Mr. Justice Riddick. Since the subject was reviewed in the Bubliss Case, the soundness of the decision in the Patterson-Poe Case has been questioned in the consultation room; and now it has been questioned at the bar in the instant case. The circuit judge properly directed a verdict for the defendant company on its authority. In view of this doubt, the subject has been carefully examined and fully discussed, in order to determine whether to follow this case or disapprove it. Assumption of risk and contributory negligence are separate defenses: and, while it frequently happens that there is no practical importance in distinguishing the two where the same state of facts would make out a defense whether called by the one name or by the other, striking instances of which are found in the Bubliss and Poe Cases, yet they rest upon different bases, and each should be approached from a different viewpoint. However, where the danger is obvious, the two defenses are tested by the same standard in that particular, and then the differences are more theoretical than practical. This is pointed out in Choctaw O. & G. R. Co. v. Jones, 77 Ark. 367, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 837, 92 S. W. 244; 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 430; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mangan, 86 Ark. 507, 112 S. W. 168, and by Judge Taft in the Narramore

Case, hereinafter referred to. There is a class of cases where the distinction is vital, and this case happens to be such an one; for, as will be seen in the discussion later on, it presents a question of fact as to whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Hence the case cannot be turned, as a matter of law, upon contributory negligence. But the facts make out a case of assumption of risk for the master's breach of the statute above quoted if such breach is the subject-matter of an assumption of a risk by the servant in continuing in the service with knowledge of the master's breach of said statute.

In the beginning of this discussion, it may be well to point out the differences between the two defenses. In St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 63 L.R.A. 551, 61 C. C. A. 477, 126 Fed. 495, Judge Sanborn, speaking for the circuit court of appeals for this circuit, said: "Assumption of risk is the voluntary contract of an ordinarily prudent servant to take the chances of the known or obvious dangers of his employment and to relieve his master of liability therefor. Contributory negligence is the causal action or omission of the servant without ordinary care of consequences. The one rests in contract, the other in tort." Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schlemmer v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co. 205 U. S. 1, 51 L. ed. 681, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, said: "An early, if not the earliest, application of the phrase 'assumption of risk' was the establishment of the exception to the liability of a master for the negligence of his servant when the person injured was a fellow servant of the negligent man. Whether an actual assumption by contract was supposed on grounds of economic theory, or the assumption was imputed because of a conception of justice and convenience, does not matter for the present purpose. Both reasons are suggested in the well-known case of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Co. 4 Met. 49, 57, 58, 38 Am. Dec. 339. But at the present time the motion is not confined to risks of such negligence. . . . Assumption of risk in this broad sense obviously shades into negligence as commonly understood, . . . [and] apart from the notion of contract, rather shadowy as applied to this broad form of the latter conception, the practical difference of the two ideas is in the degree of their proximity to the particular harm. The preliminary conduct of getting into the dangerous employment or relation is said to be accompanied by assumption of the risk. The act more immediately leading to a specific accident is called negligent. But the difference between the two is one of de- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

gree rather than of kind; and, when a statute exonerates a servant from the former, if at the same time it leaves the defense of contributory negligence still open to the master,—a matter upon which we express no opinion,—then, unless great care be taken, the servant's rights will be sacrificed by simply charging him with assumption of the risk under another name." In Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Jones, supra, the court said: "The defense of contributory negligence rests on some fault or omission of duty on the part of the plaintiff, and is maintainable when, though the defendant has been guilty of negligence, yet the direct or proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of the plaintiff but for which the injury would not have happened. . . . On the other hand, the defense of assumed risk is said to rest on contract, which is generally implied from the circumstances of the case; it being a term which the law imports into the contract, when nothing is said to the contrary, that the servant will assume the ordinary risks of the service for which he is paid." The object of this statute is the protection of men engaged in the dangerous occupation of mining. In considering a statute for a similar purpose, passed by Congress, regulating the operation of coal mines, where said act was in force in New Mexico, the court said: "The act of Congress does not give to mine owners the privilege of reasoning on the sufficiency of appliances for ventilation, or leave to their judgment the amount of ventilation that is sufficient for the protection of miners. . . . This is an imperative duty, and the consequence of neglecting it cannot be excused because some workman may disregard instructions. Congress has prescribed that duty, and it cannot be omitted, and the lives of the miners committed to the chance that the care or duty of someone else will counteract the neglect and disregard of the legislative mandate." Deserant v. Cerillos Coal R. Co. 178 U. S. 409, 44 L. ed. 1127, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 967. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281, 52 L. ed. 1061, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616, the safety appliance act of Congress was before the court, and it was said: "Where an injury happens through the absence of a safe drawbar, there must be hardship. Such an injury must be an irreparable misfortune to someone. If it must be borne entirely by him who suffers it, that is a hardship to him. If its burden is transferred, as far as it is capable of transfer, to the employer, it is a hardship to him. It is quite conceivable that Congress, contemplating the inevitable hardship of such injuries, and hoping to diminish the economic loss to the community resulting from them, should deem it wise to impose their burdens upon those who could measurably control their causes, instead of upon those who are in the main helpless in that regard."

Applying the principles above quoted, it follows that the statute is imperative; that the company which fails to comply with it is guilty of negligence per se, and is liable for all actions which proximately flow from such failure to perform this statutory duty, unless the negligence of the employee concurs with that of the master. The authorities are practically uniform in holding that contributory negligence is a defense to a breach of statutory duty. This was directly ruled in Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Chandler, 71 Ark. 518, 77 S. W. 912, under this same statute, and again in Mammoth Vein Coal Co. v. Bubliss, 83 Ark. 567, 104 S. W. 210. Whether it is open to the master, when he violates the statutory duty where the statute is one which the state, in a kind of paternalism, passes for the protection of persons who are deemed incapable of properly protecting themselves, to avail himself of the defense of assumed risk, is quite another question. These statutes are more frequent in dangerous employments, like railroad service, mining, and work around dangerous and complicated machinery. The question above stated has been before the courts many times, and the decisions are in hopeless conflict upon it. The confusion is worse confounded because of many erroneous applications of the one doctrine when, under the facts, the other doctrine should have been applied. A learned writer on the subject calls attention to this, and gives many illustrations of it from courts of great learning and distinction (1 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 310), and of it he says: "The inexactness of terminology which has been discussed above is doubtless responsible, principally, if not altogether, for the doctrinal confusion between the two defenses which is frequently found in the arguments of judges." The continuance of Johnson to work in his room after the company had refused to give him props was clearly an assumption of the risk of working without the props, if such risk was capable of being assumed in the face of this statute. Whether his continuance without the props was negligence depends upon the obviousness of the danger he encountered in so doing. His conduct measures the one defense, and his relation to the master measures the other. That relation rests in contract, and the assumption of risks impliedly grows out of the contract, and is contractual in its nature.

Proceeding to the exact question; that is, whether there can be an assumption of risk 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against a violation of a statutory duty where the statute is for the protection of the safety of the employee. A summary of the decisions is found in a note to Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981, in which it is stated that the Alabama, Massachusetts, Iowa, Rhode Island, Minnesota, New York, Ohio, and Wisconsin courts have held that the risk of noncompliance with these statutory duties may be assumed, while the courts of Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Vermont, and Washington have held to the contrary. All these cases have not been examined in this investigation, but all of the leading ones have been.

In the Federal courts, the situation is not bettered. The circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit, in Narramore v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 48 L.R.A. 68, 37 C. C. A. 499, 96 Fed. 298, held that an assumption of risk is not a valid defense where the statute is for the protection of employees. On the other hand, the court of appeals of this circuit, in two cases, St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 63 L.R.A. 551, 61 C. C. A. 477, 126 Fed. 495, and Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981, 72 C. C. A. 365, 141 Fed. 247, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 448, holds to the contrary. In the latter case Judge Carland says: "It is, however, conceded that there is nothing in the terms of the law which expressly repeals the law of assumption of risk; but it is contended that, if the defense of assumption of risk is allowed in actions like the one at bar, then the servant can contract the master out of the statute, and thereby render the statute of no force or effect. In other words, it is contended that, as the law of assumption of risk is a term of the contract between the master and servant, to allow the master the defense of assumption of risk in the case at bar would be to allow private parties to render nugatory by their contracts a public statute of the state of Colorado. The error in this contention is in assuming that the law of assumption of risk is created by the contract between master and servant. This error, we believe, has led some courts to enunciate a false doctrine in regard to the question under discussion. A representative case among those which hold that statutes imposing a positive duty upon the master by implication repeal the law of the assumption of risk is the case of Narramore v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. supra. As this case has been followed by at least one of the state supreme courts (Green v. Western American Co. 30 Wash. 87, 70 Pac. 310), we propose to show wherein we think the reasoning of the learned court in the Narramore Case is not only faulty, but that, so far as the decision is based upon the decisions in England, a wrong conclusion was drawn as to what those decisions hold the law to be." Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, supra. And the court of appeals of the second circuit has held to the same effect in E. S. Higgins Carpet Co. v. O'Keefe, 25 C. C. A. 220, 51 U. S. App. 74, 79 Fed. 900. It seems strange that the court of appeals of this (eighth) circuit should repudiate the doctrine of contract being the basis of assumption of risks, for in the earlier decision of St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, supra, where the same conclusion was reached as to the assumption of the risk for a violation of a statutory duty, that court had, in the language heretofore quoted, through Judge Sanborn, stated that assumption of risk is based upon contract. In that case Judge Thayer delivered a dissenting opinion which well states the reasoning on the other side of the question, as will be seen from the following excerpt: "I do not concur in the foregoing opinion. The laws of Missouri (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 6433 [Anno. Stat. 1906, p. 3217]) required the defendant company to keep the gearing which occasioned the plaintiff's injury 'safely and securely guarded when possible' for the protection of its employees. This statute was enacted in pursuance of a sound public policy; that is to say, to insure, as far as possible, the safety of the many thousand artisans and laborers who are daily employed in mills and factories throughout the state, and while so employed are exposed to unnecessary risks of getting hurt if belting, gearing, drums, etc., in the establishments where they work are left uncovered, when so situated that they may be covered readily. The act was inspired by the same motives which induced the Congress of the United States (act March 2, 1893, chap. 196, 27 Stat. at L. 531 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3174]) to require cars to be equipped with automatic coupling appliances when it was discovered that hundreds of brakemen were annually killed or made cripples for life by the use of the old-fashioned couplers that do not couple by impact. A wise public policy demands that, as far as possible, human life shall be preserved, and that there shall not be in any community a large class of persons who are unable to earn a livelihood because they have become maimed and crippled through exposure to unnecessary risks. The statute in question is not only 'a wise measure of legislation, but was prompted by a humane spirit. For these reasons it should not be so applied or construed by the courts as to defeat the objects which the legislature had in view, nor in such a way as to render it less efficient than it was intended to be in the promotion of such objects."

In the Narramore Case, the reasoning of Judge Taft is as follows: "If, then, the doctrine of the assumption of risk rests really upon contract, the only question remaining is whether the courts will enforce or recognize, as against a servant, an agreement, express or implied, on his part, to waive the performance of a statutory duty of the master, imposed for the protection of the servant, and in the interest of the public, and enforceable by criminal prosecution. We do not think they will. To do so would be to nullify the object of the statute. The only ground for passing such a statute is found in the inequality of terms upon which the railway company and its servants deal in regard to the dangers of their employment. The manifest legislative purpose was to protect the servant by positive law, because he had not previously shown himself capable of protecting himself by contract; and it would entirely defeat this purpose thus to permit the servant 'to contract the master out' of the statute. It would certainly be novel for a court to recognize as valid an agreement between two persons that one should violate a criminal statute; and yet, if the assumption of risk is the term of a contract, then the application of it in the case at bar is to do just that." Narramore v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. supra. This case has been approved by this court in the Jones, Bubliss, and Mangan Cases elsewhere cited.

This question was before the Indiana supreme court, under a statute requiring, as this one, the mine owner to furnish timber for the miners to prop their working places when demanded. The court said: "If a statute is a mere affirmation of the common-law duty of the employer with respect to providing safe working places and tools, the rule as to assumption of risk remains in force. The standard of care continues to be the conduct of the reasonably prudent person under like circumstances; and the means of measuring up to it may still be the subject for the joint judgment and agreement of the employer and the employee. If, however, the statute, as in this case, sets up a definite standard, and requires specific measures to be taken by the employer in providing safe working places and appliances, other considerations come into view. The very fact of such legislation indicates that the lawmakers believed that the operation of the common-law rules did not afford the employee sufficient protection; that, under the development of the modern industrial system, tending to centralization of capital and impersonal management, the employee did not stand upon a footing of equality with the employer in contracting for his safety; and that the necessity of earning the daily wage frequently constrained the employee to put up with defective place and tools, without complaint, by reason of his fear of the consequences of complaining." And again the court said: "If the legislature has clearly expressed the public policy of the state on a matter within its right to speak upon authoritatively, and if that public policy would be subverted by allowing the employee to waive in advance his statutory protection, the contract is void as unmistakably as if the statute in direct words forbade the making of it." Davis Coal Co. v. Pollard, 158 Ind. 607, 92 Am. St. Rep. 319, 62 N. E. 492.

The state of Missouri passed a statute providing that it should be no defense to an insurance company that the insured committed suicide, unless it should be shown, to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause, that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy; and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary should be void. In a case wherein there was a contract containing stipulations contrary to the terms of the statute, the effect of the statute and the stipulation came before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court, through Mr. Justice Harlan, said: "An insurance company is not bound to make a contract which is attended by the results indicated by the statute in question. If it does business at all in the state, it must do so subject to such valid regulations as the state may choose to adopt. . . . The contract between the parties, evidenced by the policy, is, we think, an evasion of the statute, and tends to defeat the objects for which it was enacted. . . . Looking at the object of the statute, and giving effect to its words, according to their ordinary, natural meaning, the legislative intent was to cut up by the roots any defense, as to the whole and every part of the sum insured, which was grounded upon the fact of suicide." And the court approved this language from the St. Louis court of appeals: "This was, in effect, a legislative declaration of the public policy of this state." Whitfield v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 205 U. S. 489, 51 L. ed. 895, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578.

In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 460, 3 Am. St. Rep. 245, 3 S. W. 808, it was attempted by contract to avoid a master's liability for negligence to a servant, and this court said: "If he can supply an unsafe machine, or defective instruments, and then excuse himself against the consequences of his own negligence by the terms of his contract with his servant, he is enabled to evade a most salutary rule;" and it was held contrary to public policy to permit it.

A fortiori, if the parties could not directly contract, there could be no implied contract for the assumption of the risk by the mere continuance in the employ in the face of the violation of the statutory duty by the master. It would not be profitable to review further the decisions upon this subject. That has been well done by Judge Taft in the Narramore Case and by Judge Carland in the Norgate Case, on opposite sides of the question, and in the opinion of the court by Judge Sanborn in St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 63 L.R.A. 551, 61 C. C. A. 477, 126 Fed. 495, and on the other side by Judge Thayer in his dissenting opinion in that case, and also by the editors of the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, in the note to the Norgate Case, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981. A recent compilation says: "There is some conflict of authority as to whether a master may avail himself of the defense of assumption of risk where the injury complained of resulted from his neglect of a duty imposed by statute. Where the defense is forbidden by the statute itself, he cannot, of course, rely upon it; and, where there is no such inhibition, the weight of authority seems to be to the same effect, although there are decisions which maintain a contrary doctrine. If the object of the statute is other than the protection of the servant, the master's neglect of the duty imposed will not prevent his relying on the servant's assumption of risk." 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1180. It is the duty of this court to decide which is the sounder reasoning; and, in pursuance of this duty, the court decides that this statute is of that class referred to by the Supreme Court of the United States, where the duty is imperative on the master to furnish these props in order to enable the employee to make safe his working place, and it is for the protection of a large class of laborers engaged in a dangerous occupation who are, by such legislation, not deemed capable of properly safeguarding themselves. The general assembly has deemed it proper in this act to require protection in this particular, as in many others reaching to the safety of the men engaged in this hazardous work, and has thereby evinced the public policy of the state in this regard. And for a breach of such statutes the defense of assumption of risk is not applicable to the violator of the statute.

These statutes usually provide for a safe working place for the employee, or safe appliances with which to do his work; and it has been said in argument that cases holding that there cannot be an assumption of risk for a violation of such statutes would not apply here, because this statute does not reach to the safety of the working place of the miner, as he makes his own room safe. It is true that, according to the mining custom, as developed from the evidence here, as in the preceding similar cases, the duty rests upon the miner himself to examine the roof and determine when it needs props; but it is for the company to furnish him the props with which to make his room safe when he discovers the need of props and demands them. The relation of the master's duty in this regard to the working place was explained in Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Chandler, 71 Ark. 518, 77 S. W. 912, where the court said: "The duty of the master to use due care to furnish a safe place for the servant to work would, under the circumstances here, be discharged by furnishing the servant an ample supply of suitable timbers with which to make the room safe." Thus the court recognized, and properly so, that the furnishing of props rested upon the master in order to provide a safe place for the servant to work. While it is true that the immediate act of making safe the room is in the hands of the miner himself, yet he cannot make brick without straw. Exodus V.: 6-19. If this statute was a single enactment, there would be more force in the contention that it is a matter left open to contract, directly or impliedly, between master and employee, as the duty of discovering the need of props is placed upon the employee, and he must determine when his room is to be safeguarded; but it is a part of a statute containing many other provisions for the safety of miners, and the whole purpose of the legislation is to put an imperative duty upon the master engaged in this dangerous occupation to protect a class deemed incapable of properly protecting themselves without this legislation.

In the Patterson-Poe Case the attention of the court was not called to the difference between violations of statutory duties and common-law duties nor the class of statutes involved, and the court merely applied the general doctrine of assumption of risks without looking into the effect of this statute upon that general doctrine. Since examining this question, however, the court has come to the conclusion that it would not do to follow Patterson Coal Co. v. Poe, and so much of the language of it as indicates that there could be an assumption of risks as therein mentioned is disapproved. The case was correctly decided, as pointed out in the Bubliss Case, but the decision should have been on the ground that the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2. That leaves for consideration the question of whether Johnson was guilty of contributory negligence in working in the mine after the company was in default in its duty to furnish him props. Had he been working under the drummy side of his room, which needed propping, then his case would have been exactly parallel with the Patterson-Poe Case and the Bubliss Case, and the court should have given a peremptory instruction upon the ground of contributory negligence. But this case differs from them in this: Instead of working in the dangerous part of the room, he worked upon the other side of the room, which he considered to be safe. He says that part of the roof was sufficiently propped; and, as near as can be gathered from the evidence, he was not nearer than 12 feet from the drummy part of the roof which was insufficiently propped. He was an experienced miner, and had tested the roof that morning. His evidence shows, also, that it might occur that the drummy part of the roof would fall without affecting the adjacent roof, but it might bring down other parts, as it did in this instance.

The question remains whether his working in the room, a part of which was apparently secure and part of which was dangerous, must be declared, as a matter of law, negligence per se. The court cannot say that, under these facts, the danger was so obvious and imminent that no man of ordinary prudence and care would work there. The exact question is fully discussed in both the Chandler and Bubliss Cases (71 Ark. 518, 77 S. W. 912, and 83 Ark. 567, 104 S. W. 210, respectively), and in Hamman v. Central Coal & Coke Co. 156 Mo. 232, 56 S. W. 1091, and Diamond Block Coal Co. v. Cuthbertson, 166 Ind. 290, 76 N. E. 1060. This question should have gone to the jury under proper instructions.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

MYRTLE HENDERSON, Appt.,

v.

LOUIS F. SPRATLEN.

(— Colo. —, 98 Pac. 14.)

Contract — support — termination.

1. One who is released from his promise to marry a woman, whom he has induced to submit to surgical operations to such an extent that she is unable to support herself, upon consideration that he will support her during life, is not absolved from his promise by her marriage to another person, after the latter's obligation to support her is terminated.

Same — consideration — release from engagement — validity.

2. A contract by one, who, after agreeing to marry a woman, induces her to submit to surgical operations which render her unable to support herself, to support her in consideration of release from his engagement is valid and enforceable.

Same — indefiniteness.

3. A contract to support a woman in consideration of a release from a promise to marry her is not too indefinite and uncertain to be enforceable.

(July 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for the City and County of Denver in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce a promise of support. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Caesar A. Roberts, with Messrs. Clay B. Whitford, Henry E. May, and O. N. Hilton, for appellant:

The contract to care for and support complainant was based upon a sufficient consideration.

Steele, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleged in her complaint, and proved, that the defendant promised to marry her, and at divers and innumerable times thereafter, avowing his sincerity of purpose to marry her, he procured her to cohabit with him; that said cohabitation began in the winter of 1889, and continued up to the month of July, 1893. She also alleges and proves that at the request of the defendant she submitted to several surgical operations, by reason of which she

Case Note. — Release of promise to marry as consideration for contract.

The only other case that has been found on this subject is Snell v. Bray, 56 Wis. 156, 14 N. W. 14, in which it was held that the release of a party to a valid marriage contract by the other party thereto is a sufficient consideration for a promise by the party released to pay to such other party a sum of money, or to do any other lawful act; that such a transaction amounts to a substitution of one contract for another, the consideration of the original contract being the consideration for the substituted contract.

sustained very serious and painful injuries to her person, and that by reason of the said operations she has been sick, sore, and lame, and will continue so to be, and she has also received great and prolonged nervous shocks, and that the said operations and injuries have resulted in shattering and ruining her nervous system, and have rendered her, and still render her, and will always render her, weak, sickly, and wholly unable and unfit to earn a livelihood and to maintain and support herself, and unfit to marry and to perform domestic and wifely duties, that, by reason of the operations aforesaid, and as a result of her being unable to procure proper attention, through the failure of the defendant to perform the terms of his agreement to have her properly taken care of, it will be necessary to have one of her legs amputated. It also appears that in the year 1893 the defendant visited plaintiff at her home in St. Joseph, Missouri, and then and there informed her that he could not marry her because his parents objected to the marriage, and that he then and there promised her, as stated by the plaintiff: "If I would release him from his promise of marriage, he would take care of me and support me just so long as I suffered from this limb or any injuries,"—which said promise on the part of the defendant the plaintiff then and there accepted, although the plaintiff was at that time, and at all times previous thereto, ready and willing to marry the defendant. It developed upon the trial that in the year 1897 the plaintiff had married a man by the name of Lee, and had lived with him for two or three years as his wife, when he procured a divorce. The court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, which it did, and thereupon judgment in favor of the defendant was duly entered. From this judgment the plaintiff took an appeal to the court of appeals.

The allegations of the complaint are sustained by the evidence, and it appeared from the testimony that the defendant had paid to the plaintiff certain sums of money upon account of his contract to maintain and support plaintiff as late as the year 1902. The defendant claims in support of the judgment: (1) That the alleged contract is void as against public policy and good morals; (2) that there is no valid consideration for the contract; (3) that there could be no novation of a void contract; (4) that the contract is too indefinite and uncertain. In support of the defendant's contention that the alleged contract is void as against public policy and good morals, counsel claim that the testimony shows that the promises of marriage as made were in consideration of present and future intercourse and cohabitation, which ended in the summer of 1893, and that a contract of marriage in consideration of sexual intercourse is void and contrary to good morals. But we do not so read the plaintiff's testimony. From the complaint and from her testimony it appears that the cohabitation did not take place until after the promise to marry, so that the consideration for the promise to marry was not that of present or future sexual intercourse.

The court adopted the theory of defendant's counsel, that, assuming the contract to be valid, it was abrogated by the marriage of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover because public policy intervened to prevent. No authorities are cited by counsel holding that a contract such as is shown to have been entered into between the parties here is terminated by the marriage of the woman. It is not contended that the contract by its terms terminated upon the marriage of the woman, but that there must be inserted into the contract, by a broad public policy, words which relieve the man from liability after the marriage of the woman. It is probably true that a married woman cannot maintain an action to compel support under a contract made upon the consideration and under the circumstances the contract sued on in this case was made. But when, as in this case, the obligation of the husband ceases by reason of a divorce, and it appears that the woman is unable to support herself, public policy does not require that the contract to support should be held void. It appears that the plaintiff is unable to support herself, and that she is unfit to work and unfit to marry, or to perform domestic or wifely duties, and by her testimony she places the responsibility for her condition upon the defendant. Someone must support her as she cannot support herself. The testimony shows that she and her mother are living in a condition of almost destitution. The defendant has made a contract to support her. He says that public policy should relieve him from this burden. If he is relieved, the public must take upon itself the burden of her support; but we know of no consideration of public policy that would permit the defendant to thus shift his burden and cast it upon the public. Moreover, long after the plaintiff's marriage, and long after her divorce, the defendant made a payment on account of the contract, from which it may fairly be inferred that he did not believe that he was relieved of his obligation because the plaintiff had married.

The defendant claims, and urges as his second and third grounds in support of the judgment, that there was no consideration for the contract, and that there can be no novation of a void contract. These positions are based upon the ground that the contract of marriage was illegal and void because based upon an illegal consideration, but the testimony does not bear out the defendant's contention that the contract of marriage was based upon an illegal consideration. The testimony of the plaintiff shows that there were no illicit relations between her and the defendant until a long time after the defendant had promised to marry the plaintiff. Then, when the plaintiff, in the year 1893, agreed to release the defendant from the promise of marriage in consideration of his agreement to support and maintain her, and provide her with medical attendance, she was not substituting a valid contract for a void one, but she was making a legal contract and releasing the defendant from a legal contract; and the law authorizes and allows contracts of this character to be made, and, when so made, the substituted contract will be enforced.

The defendant states that the contract is so indefinite and uncertain that it cannot be enforced. We think that objection to the enforcement of this contract is not tenable. The plaintiff has stated what amount is necessary for her support. A jury should determine what amount is reasonably necessary, based upon the testimony, for her support; and this contract should not be held to be unenforceable merely because an amount to be paid was not fixed by the terms of the agreement.

The case should be submitted to the jury, and, because it was taken from the consideration of the jury, the judgment is reversed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, INDIANA. & LOUISVILLE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

TOWN OF SALEM.

(— Ind. —, 82 N. E. 913.)

Railroad crossing — light — authority of municipality.

1. Statutory authority to a municipal corporation to require railroad companies operating roads across its streets to light the crossings at night, provided that it shall have no authority to require the railroad to maintain any different kind of light at 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the crossing from that maintained by the municipality at street crossings, refers simply to the kind of light, and does not compel the requirement of a light of the strength of those maintained at street crossings if one of less power will properly light the crossing.

Municipal ordinance — reasonableness — judicial inquiry.

2. A court will not inquire as to the reasonableness of a requirement which a municipal corporation makes of a railroad company with respect to the lighting of the places where its tracks cross streets if it is within the authority conferred upon the municipality by the legislature.

Same — railroad crossings — lights — certainty.

3. A municipal ordinance requiring a railroad company to maintain at places where its tracks cross public streets, during the passage of trains at night, and for not less than thirty minutes prior thereto, except when the moonlight is sufficient, lights of a certain character and power in such manner as to enable persons passing over the crossings to see the tracks and protect themselves from danger of running trains, is not invalid for uncertainty or indefiniteness.

Railroads — lighting crossings — validity of statute.

4. A statute and ordinance requiring the maintenance by a railroad company at street crossings of lights which are not excessive in foggy or stormy weather are not, because they may be so in clear weather, so unreasonable as to amount to unconstitutional invasion of property rights.

(December 12, 1907.)

Case Note. — Power to compel railroad companies to light their tracks in cities.

This note supplements the note to Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Bowling Green, 41 L.R.A. 422.

An ordinance requiring a railroad company to maintain electric lights where its tracks intersect public streets, even though it lays some expense on the company, does not amount to a taking of property without just compensation. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City (Ind.) 82 N. E. 787.

A statute granting the power to cities to require railroad companies to light their street crossings is not invalid merely because it does not grant the power to all cities and towns in the state, or because every street and railroad intersection in the state is not ordered lighted. Ibid.

The power granted by the legislature to a city to require railroad companies to light their crossings on all nights embraces the power to require lights at all hours of the night or parts of nights. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Crawfordsville, 164 Ind. 70, 72 N. E. 1025.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the penalty for failure to maintain a light at a street crossing. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. C. Field and H. R. Kurrie for appellant.

Messrs. Mitchell & Mitchell for appellee.

Hadley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit by appellee against appellant for the violation of a town ordinance, requiring it to maintain lights at points where its railroad crosses the public streets of said town. The ordinance is in these words:

"Whereas, it is necessary for the safety and security of citizens and other persons from the running of trains through the town of Salem, by railroad companies running and operating railroads through the town, that an electric light be kept and maintained as hereinafter directed at certain crossings where said railroad or railroads intersect certain streets in said town, now, therefore,

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the board require all-night lighting at railroad crossings, the fact that the ordinance exonerates the company from lighting when the moon furnishes the traveler the same amount and strength of light required of the company by the ordinance, and also excuses the company from lighting at all times when the city lights are not lighted, does not render the ordinance void for uncertainty or unreasonableness. Ibid.

The fact that there is a device which can be attached to the railroad track in such a way that a moving train at a distance will ignite a lamp at the crossing, which will continue to burn and light the crossing until the train has passed over and beyond, is no defense to an action against the company for failure to light the street crossings as required by a valid ordinance, where the company has not installed such device, or been obstructed by the city in a bona fide effort to do so. Ibid.

A railroad built by authority of the state, engaged in transporting freight, passengers, and the United States mail between the states, must, so long as Congress does not interfere, submit to a reasonable local regulation requiring it to light its tracks. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City, supra.

Such an ordinance is not invalid merely because passed without affording the railroad company an opportunity to be heard relative thereto. Ibid.

Such an ordinance is not invalid merely because the light at the crossing impairs of trustees of the town of Salem, in Washington county, Indiana, that it shall hereafter be the duty of every railroad company running and operating a railroad through said town to keep and maintain an electric light at every point where the main track of said railroad company upon which it runs any regular train or trains during the nighttime crosses or intersects at grade any public street in said town; such electric light shall be of two thousand (2,000) candle power to light the crossing of such railroad where they are placed and maintained in such a manner as to enable citizens and other persons traveling and passing over such crossings to see the track and protect themselves from the danger of running trains on such railroad; Provided, such lights shall not be required to exceed in power those now in use for lighting the streets of said town; that the town of Salem now maintains and supports electric lights of two thousand (2,000) candle power each, for lighting the streets and intersections thereof.

"Sec. 2. All lights provided in § 1 hereof shall be lighted at night during the passage of every train and for not less than thirty minutes prior thereto. Provided, said lights shall not be required to be kept burning or lighted during such hours or the efficiency of the headlight on the locomotive, and compels the engineer to run slowly or cautiously in approaching it. Ibid.

A requirement in such an ordinance that the power of the light shall not exceed that of the lights used by the city does not make the ordinance so indefinite as to be invalid. Ibid.

The mere fact that the legislature has seen fit to give the city council the power to prescribe the character of the light, and that the latter body has required that the lighting shall be done by electricity, affords no sufficient ground for an overthrow of the ordinance. Ibid.

An ordinance enacted by virtue of statutory authority, requiring a railroad company to light its street crossings within the village in the same manner that the streets are lighted; and providing that, in case the company fails to erect the lights within twenty days from notice of the passage of the ordinance, the lighting committee of the village shall cause the lights to be erected, and the cost thereof shall be assessed on the property of the company, or collected as directed by law,—relates to the comfort, safety, convenience, and good order of the village, is not penal and not subject to the rule of strict construction; and the requirement that the company shall do the lighting within twenty days after notice is not unreasonable. St. Marys v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 60 Ohio St. 136, 53 N. E. 795.

parts of hours when the moon shall be shining so as to give sufficient light to light the crossing as hereinbefore required. And provided, further, such lights shall not be required to be kept burning nor lighted during such hours, or parts of such hours, when the lights in use for lighting the streets of said town shall not be lighted or burning. The purpose of said last provision being to exempt such railroad company or companies from lighting such crossing at any time or times when the streets of said town are not lighted.

"Sec. 3. Any railroad company or railroad companies who shall fail to keep and maintain such lights as hereinbefore provided, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this ordinance, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined and forfeit to said town the sum of ten dollars ($10.00) for each and every offense."

The complaint is in a single paragraph. Defendant's demurrer thereto for insufficient facts was overruled. An affirmative answer in one paragraph was held bad on demurrer, and, the defendant refusing to answer further, judgment was given upon the complaint in favor of the plaintiff for $10 and costs, from which the defendant appeals, and assigns error on all adverse rulings.

The complaint, filed before a justice of the peace, alleges the due incorporation of the town; the defendant's ownership and operation of a railroad through the town; the crossing of three named public streets therein; the proper enactment of the ordinance; the maintenance of the plaintiff of electric lights at street crossings in said town of 2,000 candle power; the three named streets at the railroad crossings are much traveled by the public at all times of the day and night, and are very dangerous without being lighted; that the defendant had failed to put up and maintain lights at its said crossings, as required by said ordinance, and is now running and has continued to run for a long time its cars and locomotives through the town and over said crossings at all times of the day and night. The complaint, as to its formal averments, is good on demurrer, under the ruling in Brookville v. Gagle, 73 Ind. 117; Hardenbrook v. Ligonier, 95 Ind. 70.

In its answer to the complaint the defendant admits that it owns and operates a railroad through the plaintiff city, crossing the three named public streets; that it has but two regular passenger trains and one freight train which pass through said town and across said streets in the nighttime, and no extra passenger and not exceeding two extra freight trains passing through said town after night; that, if defendant is required to maintain lights at said several crossings, and have said lights burning for half an hour before and during the passage of all trains, the aggregate burning time for all trains would not exceed two hours per night on the average; that the present schedule has existed for many years, and there is no probability of its being changed in the near future; that there is, has been, and will be in the near future, very little travel on said streets and across the railroad in the nighttime; that an electric light of 2,000 candle power, which the defendant is required by said ordinance to maintain at each of said crossings, will brightly illuminate said streets for a distance of 300 feet on each side of the crossing, and sufficiently to enable travelers to use said streets for a distance of 600 feet on each side of the crossing. The defendant has no means of its own for the production of electricity. There is but one electric-light plant in the town. The town maintains electric lights of 2,000 candle power at its street crossings, which electricity it obtains from said plant by direct current, under which system it is impossible to extinguish one without extinguishing all lights. The town maintains its lights all night, except on moonlight nights, and the defendant cannot secure 2,000 candle power lights except by connection with said town system, and having it supplied by said direct current, so that it could not turn off its lights at said crossings without extinguishing all the lights in the town. It is impossible, therefore, for the defendant to maintain the lights required by said ordinance without having them burn from seven to ten hours every night, except moonlight nights, and which will impose upon the defendant an expense of $72 per annum for each light; that, if said lights could be extinguished except for the times required by the ordinance at the passage of trains, the expense to the defendant would not exceed $10 per annum per light; that an incandescent light at each of said crossings will clearly illuminate the entire right of way at said points, and defendant can construct and maintain such lights at an expense to it of not exceeding $1 per month for each light; that, by reason of the premises, the ordinance is unreasonable and void in this: (1) The defendant cannot comply therewith without assuming greater burdens than the said town is allowed by law to put upon it. (2) It is the purpose of said town to require the defendant thereby to maintain three high-power lights, and burn them at all times, to relieve it of part of its burdens of street lighting. (3) The said ordinance is so indefinite and uncertain as to be void upon its face. (4) The said town cannot require more of defendant than that it light its right of way at said crossings, while there is danger from a train that is about to use it, and the said ordinance requiring high-power lights is therefore void. (5) The act of the general assembly, in so far as it empowers towns to pass ordinances requiring lights at railway and street crossings at the sole expense of the railroad company, violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The answer in a more concrete form, comes to this: The ordinance under the conditions existing in Salem is unreasonable and void because it is, first, uncertain; and, second, because it requires the defendant to maintain stronger and longer lights than is necessary to light the crossings, thus entailing upon it an annual expense of $72 per light, while the defendant could light the entire right of way at the crossings during all the time the city lights are kept burning, with incandescent lights, at an expense not exceeding $1 per month for each light. The law relating to the powers of municipal legislative bodies is settled in this state to the effect following: (1) All powers possessed by cities and towns are expressly conferred by legislative enactment, or implied when necessary to accomplish some municipal purpose. (2) When a city council or board of trustees of a town has conferred upon it by the legislature an express general power, or when a power is implied as being essential to the carrying out of some express municipal duty, the mode of exercising the power must, as a question of law, be reasonable, or the ordinance will be declared void. (3) When a power is specifically conferred by the general assembly, but the manner of its exercise is not prescribed, the mode of employing it must be reasonable or it will be held invalid. (4) When the legislature, under the sanction of the Constitution, provides that a particular thing may be done, and points out the way for doing it, courts will not strike down the law, or ordinance passed in pursuance thereof, or abridge the authority, because they may deem it to be unreasonable or against public policy. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Crown Point, 146 Ind. 421, 422, 35 L.R.A. 684, 45 N. E. 587, and cases cited; Skaggs v. Martinsville, 140 Ind. 476, 33 L.R.A. 781, 49 Am. St. Rep. 209, 39 N. E. 241; Champer v. Greencastle, 138 Ind. 339, 24 L.R.A. 768, 46 Am. St. Rep. 390, 35 N. E. 14; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 328. The trustees of appellee city derived power to legislate on the subject of lighting railroads at street crossings from § 31 of the towns and cities act of 1905 (Acts 1905, chap. 129, p. 231), which 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

reads as follows: "The board of town trustees shall have the following powers: . . . (14) to require any railroad company, operating a line of railroad over a street of the town, to maintain a street light at such crossing, to be lit at night during the passage of every train, and for not less than thirty minutes prior thereto: Provided, that such board shall have no authority to require such railroad to maintain any different kind of light at such crossing from that maintained by the town at other street crossings." By this statute the legislature has declared that the board of trustees has the right to require railroad companies to maintain lights at the points where their road crosses the town streets, but the same act specifically declares that that authority shall extend only to requiring the same kind of lights maintained by the town at its own street crossings. The statute would mean the same thing if phrased thus: The board of trustees shall have power to require railroad companies to maintain at all points of street intersection by their railroad the same kind of lights maintained by the town at its other street crossings, and no other. We think, however, that the term "kind of light" refers to class, or sort, rather than to grades, or degrees, of the same class; that is, that it refers to such general kind and classifications as electricity, gas, oil, and the like, and not to various grades of such general classes. And, while the town board was without authority to require of appellant a light different in kind from that maintained by the town at its street crossings, it was not compelled to exact of appellant the same degree, or strength, of light in use by the town if it should deem a lesser grade adequate to properly light the crossings. In other words, the town had no authority to require a stronger light, but might have required a lesser degree of the same light from that maintained by the town.

This brings our question within the fourth rule above set out, namely, that, when the legislature grants a specific power, and specifies how it may be exercised, this court cannot question the power, if constitutional, or the reasonableness of the manner of its exercise. Therefore the admissions of the answer, in effect, that the city maintains at its other street crossings lights of the same kind as those required of appellant, preclude us from any inquiry into the reasonableness of the strength of the lights to light the crossings. And, even if the legislature had not foreclosed us, we should hardly feel at liberty to hold that the board of trustees, in this instance, had abused its discretion in the selection of a proper light. The ordinance cannot be held invalid for uncertainty or indefiniteness. There is strong reason for believing that the one before us is the result of a studied and successful effort to cure the infirmities in a former ordinance of the town, upon the same subject, and which was held invalid by this court in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Salem, 166 Ind. 71, 76 N. E. 631. The ordinance held void in the case just cited provided that the lights to be maintained by the railroad company "shall be electric lights of such candle power, not exceeding two thousand (2,000) candle power, and giving such lighting service as the town of Salem maintains." It was held that these words of the ordinance do "not attempt or purport to furnish the standard by which . . . [the railroad company's] guilt or innocence may be determined upon a charge of noncompliance." No such objection can be urged against the ordinance before us. In this the duty of the railroad company is definite and certain. It shall maintain at every point where the main track of the railroad, upon which it runs trains in the night, crosses a street of the town, an electric light which shall be 2,000 candle power strong. Neither is the ordinance assailable for being uncertain and indefinite as to the times when the lights shall be set, or the length of time they shall be kept going, as insisted upon by appellant. The language of the ordinance is, "All lights . . . shall be lighted at night during the passage of every train and for not less than thirty minutes prior thereto,"—except that the company shall not be required to keep its lights burning when said crossings are lighted by the moon sufficiently to enable travelers to see the track and protect themselves from running trains, or when the town's street lights shall not be lighted and burning. The provisos and exceptions are made for the benefit of the lighting railroad company. Such company has control, and of all others knows best when its trains will pass the crossings. It can be no hardship to require it to take notice of the passage of its trains, and no uncertainty, as affects the company, to require it to light the crossings accordingly; and, if it finds it profitable and convenient to extinguish the lights between trains, it may rightfully do so. It would be wholly impracticable for the town to fix certain and definite periods for lighting, since the schedule for the running of trains and orders for special trains would be constantly liable to change. The exigencies of the business requiring more extra trains on one day than upon another, and the running of such trains during the different times of the day and night, would invest the subject with so much uncertainty that the town board might reasonably expect a train to pass at any time of the night, and so would be without any reliable data for periodical lighting. Rather than condemn the ordinance for unreasonableness in its requirements concerning the lighting and burning of the lights, all the exceptions and concessions relating to the subject, and of which appellant complains, are beneficial to the company, and evidently so intended; in the words of the ordinance, "the purpose being to exempt such railroad company from lighting such crossings at any time when the streets of said town are not lighted." We think the case is fully within the rule declared in Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Crawfordsville, 164 Ind. 70, 72 N. E. 1025. A 2,000 candle-power light may be stronger than is necessary to properly light the crossings in ordinary weather, but it is not alleged, and we cannot assume, that it would be excessive in foggy, heavy, or stormy weather, when it is most needed. Hence there is no ground for saying that either the statute which authorizes or the ordinance passed as a police measure to conserve the safety of citizens in traveling the streets of the town, in the nighttime, is so unreasonable in its exaction as to amount to an invasion of constitutional right. It is therefore not in conflict with the Constitution, either state or Federal.

The demurrer to the answer was properly sustained.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 30, 1903, the plaintiff leased to the defendants certain premises to be used lord's knowledge of the tenant's intention to use the premises for an unlawful purpose as affecting their rights and relations. The question of a landlord's criminal liability as affected by his knowledge of the wrongful use of his property has not been examined.

The courts will not enforce the terms of a lease where the demised premises were rented with knowledge on the part of the landlord that they were to be used for an illegal purpose. The authorities cited in the three following groups were all cases where the action was brought for the recovery of rent:

For purposes of prostitution. Dougherty v. Seymour, 16 Colo. 239, 26 Pac. 823; Ralston v. Boady, 20 Ga. 449; Kessler v. Pearson, 126 Ga. 725, 55 S. E. 963, 8 A. & E. Ann. Edelmuth v. McGarren, 4 Daly, 467. See also Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Turner, 6 Bing. N. C. 324.

But it has been held that mere knowledge on the part of the lessor that the lessee intended to use the demised premises in violation of law is not sufficient to render the lease void; in order to have such effect, there must have been also some active participation on the part of the lessor in the illegal purpose. Miller v. Maguire, 18 R. I. 770, 30 Atl. 966; Gorman v. Keough, 22 R. I. 47, 46 Atl. 37; Almy v. Greene, 13 R. I. 350; Allen v. Keilly, 18 R. I. 197, 30 Atl. 965; Updike v. Campbell, 4 E. D. Smith, 570.

A landlord will not be prevented from recovering his rent because, during the term, he acquires knowledge that his house is being used for an illegal purpose, where he had no knowledge thereof at the time of the demise. Kessler v. Pearson, supra; Koester v. State, 36 Kan. 27, 12 Pac. 339. See also Allen v. Keilly, supra.

A lease containing nothing to show that the unlawful sale of liquor was contemplated on the premises is not avoided by the subsequent use of the premises for such unlawful purpose, even though it continues with the landlord's knowledge. Kittredge v. Allemania Society, 3 Ohio N. P. 312.

In Jennings v. Throgmorton, Ryan & M. 251, it is held that a landlord acquiring knowledge that his premises are being used for an illegal purpose may not recover rent accruing from the time of discovering the illegal use. In this case the tenancy was from week to week.

In order to defeat a landlord's right to recover rent on the ground that the premises were let for carrying on an illegal business, it must be shown that the lessor, at the time the lease was made, was a party to the illegal intent, and let the premises in furtherance thereof. Gibson v. Pearsall, 1 E. D. Smith, 90.

In Zink v. Grant, 25 Ohio St. 352, the court, in construing a statute providing that all contracts leasing or renting a build-

$3,636.83. New Murdock, Kansas,
Sept. 22, 1899.

Two hundred seventy days after date, without grace, for value received, we promise to pay to Ladd, Penny & Swazey, or order, thirty-six hundred thirty-six and $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, at the office of Ladd, Penny, & Swazey, Live Stock Exchange, Kansas City, with interest after maturity at 8 per cent per annum until paid.

The makers and indorsers hereof hereby severally waive protest, demand, and notice of protest and nonpayment, in case this note is not paid at maturity, and agree to all extensions and partial payments, before or after maturity, without prejudice to holder.

R. A. Sykes & Son.

Due June 19, 1900. No. of 1012.

P. O., New Murdock, Kan. 1543.

The note was indorsed as follows:

Notice, demand, and protest waived.
Payment guaranteed.

Ladd, Penny, & Swazey.

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. S. S. Ashbaugh and A. E. Helm, for plaintiffs in error:

lottery contracts; and to United States Sav. & L. Co. v. Beckley, 62 L.R.A. 33, as to the governing law with respect to interest and usury. These notes, of course, include bills and notes as well as other contracts. Occasionally, however, questions of this kind arise in such a form as to make them distinctive of the subject of negotiable paper, as, for instance, where the question relates to the law which determines the right of a bona fide holder of negotiable paper to be protected against defenses arising from lack of capacity, illegality of consideration, the reservation of usury, or other defenses available as between the prior parties. To this extent, it has been the intention to include the cases, either in the original note or in the present note.

The question as to where the contract of the primary obligors or that of the secondary obligors is deemed to have been made under a particular state of facts and circumstances is closely related to the subject of this note. For the most part, however, the question depends upon principles that are equally applicable to other classes of contracts and therefore cannot be properly treated in this note. The question, however, as to where the contract of an accommodation party is deemed to be made when he signs the instrument in one state and delivers it there to the accommodated party, who first negotiates the same in another state, is in a sense peculiar to, or at least practically confined to, bills and notes. See, in this connection, case note to Chemical Nat. Bank v. Kellogg, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 299, and especially the case of Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 169 N. Y. 538, 57 L.R.A. 513, 88 Am. St. Rep. 614, 62 N. E. 672, referred to in that note.

General commercial principles as opposed to local law.

local state statute, assume the right to determine for themselves the general principles of commercial law applicable to negotiable paper, without being bound by the local precedents of the state the law of which, if statutory, would concededly govern.

So, in the later case of State Nat. Bank v. Cudahy Packing Co. 126 Fed. 543, the question as to negotiability of a note is declared to be one which pertains to the law merchant, with regard to which the Federal courts are not bound by local decisions unless predicated on a statutory enactment.

The very general adoption by the different states of the uniform negotiable instrument law, however, operates to restrict very materially the freedom of the Federal courts in dealing with these questions.

As also pointed out in the earlier note, some of the state courts assume the same right as the Federal courts to determine the general principles of the law merchant or the common law with relation to bills and notes without being bound by the judicial precedents of the courts of another state whose law, if statutory, would concededly govern. This position, however, so far as it relates to the courts of different states, is contrary to the great weight of authority, or at least to the tacit assumption of the majority of the cases, which make no distinction in this respect between a law of another state which is embodied in a statute and one which is evidenced by the judicial precedents of the courts of that state. In the subsequent case of Midland Steel Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 34 Ind. App. 107, 72 N. E. 290, the court, in discussing this subject, and speaking of the common-law rules of Pennsylvania with respect to the negotiability of paper, said: "The foreign court is the only tribunal competent to decide upon the common or the statute law of its own state, and we fail to see any reason for permitting such decisions to be questioned in the one case and not Negotiability.

As pointed out at page 205 of the earlier note, it is unsatisfactory to attempt any discussion of the question of the governing law with respect to the negotiability of an instrument, in an abstract manner and apart from the ultimate question which depends upon the character of the instrument in that respect. As there pointed out, most of the cases, though there are some exceptions, refer the preliminary question of negotiability to the same law that governs the ultimate question dependent thereon; that is, if the ultimate question relates to the liability of, or defenses available to, the maker or acceptor (the primary obligor), the preliminary question of negotiability as affecting that ultimate question is referred to the same law as the ultimate question, viz., the law of the place of performance of his obligation; upon the other hand, if the ultimate question relates to the substantive liability of, or defenses available to, the drawer or indorser (secondary obligors), the preliminary question of negotiability as affecting that ultimate question is referred to the same law as the ultimate question, viz., the law of the place where the drawer's or indorser's contract is made (that being also the place where it is performable). As shown under subdivision XI. of the earlier note, this principle has in some cases been carried so far as to refer the question of negotiability to the law of the forum where the ultimate question dependent thereon related to the remedy, and was, as such, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

governed by the lex fori. None of the cases included in the present note which pass upon the governing law with respect to negotiability involved any question of remedy depending upon the character of the instrument in that respect, and there is therefore, no opportunity to discuss further the question as to the governing law with respect to negotiability as affecting the remedy.

It will be observed, however, that while in most of the cases subsequently cited which involve the question as to the governing law with respect to negotiability that question was referred to the law of the place of payment of the bill or note (i. e., the law of the place of performance of the maker's or acceptor's contract) if there was any conflict on the subject, that was also the governing law of the ultimate question, which was affected by the character of the instrument in this respect. And in Amsinck v. Rogers, 189 N. Y. 252, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 875, 121 Am. St. Rep. 858, 82 N. E. 134, the court, having referred the ultimate question as to the necessity of protest and notice in order to hold the drawers of a bill to the law of the place where the drawers' contract was made (which was also the place of the performance of his contract), referred the question of negotiability as affecting the ultimate question to the law of the same place.

For reasons now apparent, the further discussion of the cases involving the governing law with respect to negotiability will be in connection with the particular ultimate question dependent upon the character of the instrument in that respect.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A judgment for the bank in this action was reversed on a former hearing in this court. 60 Kan. 134, 76 Pac. 393. On the second trial, in addition to the facts stated in the former opinion, the court found that the office of the payees, where the note was made payable, was in Missouri, and that by the law of that state the note is, and was, negotiable. By reason of the recitals in the note making the time of payment uncertain, it was held to be non-negotiable by this court. The trial court, after an amendment of the petition, having found the additional facts above stated, again rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant now asks for reversal, upon the grounds, first,

Bill or note fraudulently transferred.

In Embricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank [1905] 1 K. B. 677, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 703, the English court of appeal declared, upon the authority of Alcock v. Smith [1892] 1 Ch. 238 (set out at length at page 224 of the earlier note), that the validity of a transfer of a bill of exchange or check, as affecting the title to the same or the proceeds thereof, is governed by the law of the place where the transfer takes place; and accordingly held that the law of Austria, according to which a Vienna bank acquired a good title to a check drawn upon a London bank by purchasing it in good faith, without negligence, after it had been specially indorsed by the payee to a London firm, from a clerk of the payee who had abstracted it from a letter and forged the indorsee's name, should prevail over the law of England, according to which the Vienna bank would not acquire a good title; and that consequently the payee could not recover damages, as for a wrongful conversion of the check, from defendants to whom the Vienna bank indorsed it and who cashed it at the bank on which it was drawn. Vaughan Williams, L. J., expressly stated that the decision in Alcock v. Smith, supra, was limited to the rights of subsequent parties to the instrument itself, and did not establish the proposition that the law of the place by which the transfer takes place would govern the sufficiency of the indorsement as against the original parties, having regard to the contractual liability incurred by them; and intimated that the decisions in Re Marseilles Extension R. & Land Co. L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 598, and Lebel v. Tucker, L. R. 3 Q. B. 83 (see former note, page 225), were authority to the contrary. He added, however, that it may be—and he was disposed to take that view of the contract—that the

that the former decision of this court that the note is non-negotiable is a final adjudication of that matter; and, second, that the finding of the district court relative to the law of Missouri is not sustained by the evidence. This note was made in Kansas, by residents of this state, and was payable, as the evidence now shows, in Missouri. It was indorsed by the payees, before maturity, to the Union Brokerage Company, of Kansas, and was indorsed by that company, in Kansas, to the plaintiff, a national bank of Iowa. The makers had no knowledge or notice of these transfers, and paid the note before maturity to the payees, who had no authority from the holder to receive such payment. Upon these facts alone the judgment should be for the defendants, if we contract of the drawer or acceptor is to pay on any indorsement recognized by the law of England, even though that indorsement be invalid according to what, for convenience, he calls the local law of England. He further said that the question under consideration in the case was not concluded by the provision of subsection 2 of § 72 of the bills of exchange act, 1882, declaring that, "subject to the provisions of this act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance or acceptance supra protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made, provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom." Romer, L. J., said that such subsection recognized the general principles of international law on which the decision proceeded, and that the proviso did not touch the case at bar. Stirling, L. J., who concurred in the decision, remarked that he attached more weight to the statutory provision than the other judges.

Character of parties; liability of irregular indorser.

As pointed out at page 200 of the earlier note, there is a difference of opinion whether the character, and therefore the nature, of the contract, of a party who indorses his name on the back of a promissory note before its delivery or indorsement by the payee, is to be determined by the law of the place where the instrument is made or delivered, or by the law of the place where it is payable.

In Smith v. Myers, 207 Ill. 126, 69 N. E. 858, the court said that, if the instrument in question were a promissory note, the question whether one who signed his name on the back before delivery to the payee was an indorser or guarantor should be determined by the law of Connecticut. The note having been delivered in that state. The court formally refers the holding on this point to the general proposition that, in an action upon a negotiable instrument, the law of the place where the same is de-follow the former decision that the note was non-negotiable. It is claimed by the plaintiff, however, that the additional findings that the note was payable in Missouri, and that it is a negotiable instrument, warrant the judgment for the plaintiff. The new issue, presented upon an amendment allowed by the district court in its discretion, had not before been adjudicated, and was properly tried. Therefore the first ground urged for reversal cannot be sustained. Subject to qualifications not necessary now to consider, the law of the place of performance of contracts governs in determining the liability of the contracting parties, and this principle applies to promissory notes. Randolph, Com. Paper, § 31; 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 324; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 879. "Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought." Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 406, 412, 23 L. ed. 245, 248. We conclude that the negotiable character of this note must be determined by the laws of Missouri, where it was made payable. The question how this law is to be determined has been elaborately argued. Two views have been taken, both well supported by precedents.

livered and negotiated is to control in determining the liability, if any, thereon; and that the place where a contract is made depends, not on the place where it is actually written, but on the place where it is delivered as consummating a bargain. In this case, however, the instrument was apparently payable in Connecticut, so that there was no conflict between the lex loci contractus and lex loci solutionis on this point. The Connecticut statute, which in such a case declares that, whether the indorsement be before or after the indorsement by the payee, it shall import the contract of an ordinary indorsement, was held not to apply for the reason that the instrument in question was not a promissory note within the law merchant, because of the provision therein for payment of taxes as well as principal and interest. The court did not formally refer the question as to the character of the instrument as a promissory note to the law of Connecticut, but apparently disposed of that question on the general principles of the law merchant. This, however, was probably on the assumption that those principles prevailed in Connecticut, and not upon the theory that the local laws of Illinois would govern.

In Nashua Sav. Bank v. Sayles, 184 Mass. 520, 100 Am. St. Rep. 573, 69 N. E. 309, the court applied the law of New Hampshire, that one who signs a note on the back thereof before delivery to payee is liable as a joint maker without a demand on the other maker, it appearing that a bank in New Hampshire sent a blank form of note to a resident of Massachusetts to take up an overdue note held by the bank against him and an indorser, and that he made out a note payable to the order of the bank for part of the amount due on the old note, procured the defendant to indorse the new note on the back and sent it through the mail to the New Hampshire bank, together with a check for the balance. The court said that, upon such facts, there was no doubt that the note in suit first took effect as a binding contract when it was received by the bank in New Hampshire, and that it was unnecessary to consider whether, under the circumstances of the case, the fact that the note was made payable in New Hampshire would make the laws of that state applicable to it.

In Cherry v. Sprague, 187 Mass. 113, 67 L.R.A. 33, 105 Am. St. Rep. 381, 72 N. E. 456, the preliminary question whether an instrument was a promissory note, as well as the ultimate question depending thereon, whether those who signed on the back before delivery to the payee were original promissors, or makers, or indorsers entitled to notice, was referred to the law of South Dakota, the note being payable there, and having also been sent through the mail to South Dakota, although signed in Massachusetts. Here, again, there was no conflict between the lex loci contractus and the lex loci solutionis.

In Hackley Nat. Bank v. Barry (Wis.) 120 N. W. 275, the question whether one who signed his name on the back of a note before delivery to the payee was maker or indorser was referred to the law of Michigan, it appearing that the note was payable in Michigan, and that it was signed by the regular maker in that state and sent by him to the irregular party in Wisconsin, who signed it there, and, by the regular maker's direction, sent the paper to the payee in Michigan. While it is not expressly so stated, it was probably assumed that the irregular maker's contract was in a legal sense made in Michigan, so that in this case also there was no conflict between the lex loci contractus and the lex loci solutionis.

The case of Montana Coal & Coke Co. v. Cincinnati Coal & Coke Co. 69 Ohio St. 351, 69 N. E. 613, however, supports the position that the character of such an irregular party depends on the law of the place where the note is payable rather than on the place where the contract is made by the delivery of the note. In this case the note, which was payable in Kentucky, was indorsed, apparently for the accommodation of the maker, before its delivery to the payee, by one person in Kentucky and by another in Pennsylvania, and was then returned to the maker in Ohio, who there delivered it to the payee in Ohio. The court expressly held that the

The Federal court and the courts of New York, Iowa, Maine, and Georgia have held that, as the law to be applied is the general commercial law or law merchant, it must be sought for, not in the decisions of local tribunals, but in the general doctrines of commercial jurisprudence; that, while following the decisions of the courts of final resort of the state where the note is payable in the construction of its statutes, the courts of the state where the case is tried will be governed by their own precedents in expounding the general common law applicable to commercial transactions. Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580; St. Nicholas Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 128 N. Y. 26, 13 L.R.A. 241, 27 N. E. 849; Roads v. Webb, 91 Me. 406, 64 Am. St. Rep.

246, 40 Atl. 128; Franklin v. Twogood, 25 Iowa, 520, 96 Am. Dec. 73; National Bank v. Green, 33 Iowa, 140; Pattillo v. Alexander, 105 Ga. 482, 30 S. E. 644. Notwithstanding the weight of the foregoing decisions, and the strength of the argument in their support, the rule adopted in a large majority of the state courts, and announced by text writers, is that when it becomes necessary to determine the common law of another state, the decisions of the courts of final resort of that state will be followed, regardless of precedents to the contrary in the state where the trial is held; and that this rule applies to the law merchant as well as to other branches of the common law. This rule is based upon the presumption that the parties have contracted with locus contractus was in Ohio, but that the locus solutionis was in Kentucky, and that the lex loci solutionis governed.

In Columbia Finance & T. Co. v. Purcell, 142 Fed. 984, the question is referred to the law of Pennsylvania as the place where the irregular party's contract was made, although the court said the note was dated and delivered in Kentucky, and was therefore a Kentucky contract.

But the law of the forum governs as to the right to show by parol the true relations as between themselves of the original parties, although the contract was made and payable in another state. Kufman v. Barbour, 98 Minn. 158, 107 N. W. 1128.

Liability of and defenses available to maker or acceptor.

As shown in the earlier note the great weight of authority holds that the substantive questions of liability of, and defenses available to, the maker or acceptor (primary obligors) of a bill or note is governed by the law of the place where the bill or note is payable. Proceeding by the same process of elimination that was adopted in the earlier note, the cases first cited are those in which there was no conflict except between the law of the forum and the law of the state where the note was made and payable:

Thus, the law of Iowa, where a note was made and payable, determines the question whether or not it is negotiable, as affecting the question whether a purchaser in good faith may recover more than he paid for the same against the maker, the note having originated in a fraud. The ultimate question in this case, as well as the question of negotiability, was determined by the law of Iowa rather than by the law of Missouri as the lex fori. Creston Nat. Bank v. Salmon, 117 Mo. App. 506, 93 S. W. 288.

So, the law of another state, where a note is made and payable, relieving the maker from liability, even against a bona fide holder, where his signature was procured by fraud without knowledge of the character of the instrument, will govern in an action in South Dakota. First Nat. Bank v. Doeden (S. D.) 113 N. W. 81. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, in Bailey v. Devine, 123 Ga. 653, 107 Am. St. Rep. 153, 51 S. E. 603, involving the availability of the defense of fraud and duress, the court said that a note made and payable in Colorado by a citizen of Georgia was governed by the law of Colorado; but, in the absence of proof of the law of that state, the court indulged the presumption that the common law was in force there.

So, the negotiability of a note as affecting the substantive liability of the maker to subsequent parties is governed by the law of Montana, where the note is made and payable, rather than by the law of South Dakota, where the action is brought. Baird v. Vines, 18 S. D. 52, 99 N. W. 89.

In Arden Lumber Co. v. Henderson Iron Works & Supply Co. 83 Ark. 240, 103 S. W. 185, the court of Arkansas refused to enforce a stipulation for attorneys' fees in notes made and payable in Louisiana, by the law of which such stipulation is valid; but this decision was upon the ground that it was contrary to the public policy of the forum to enforce such a stipulation, and the decision therefore is a mere exception to, and not denial of, the general principle which refers bills and notes to the law of the place where payable.

In Barry v. Stover, 20 S. D. 459, 107 N. W. 672, the court, while holding that the negotiability of a note payable in Massachusetts was to be determined by the law of Massachusetts irrespective of the state in which it was made, nevertheless held that the question whether the payment to a payee of a non-negotiable note before notice of assignment would constitute a defense must be determined by the law of South Dakota, where the action was brought. It will be observed that, tested by the law of Massachusetts, the instrument involved in this case was not a negotiable instrument, and therefore did not as such carry to subsequent bona fide holders the immunity from defenses between the original parties that would attach to negotiable paper; and it may be that, treating payment as an affirmative defense, the decision referring the point to the law of South Dakota might be justified assuming that the payment was made reference to the law of the place of payment, and that law is applied in accordance with the doctrine of comity. This rule has been approved in this court in its application to other subjects, but it does not appear to have been directly invoked with respect to commercial paper. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408; Alexander v. Barker, 64 Kan. 396, 67 Pac. 829; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 74 Kan. 83, 86 Pac. 156. The opinion in Midland Sav. & L. Co. v. Solomon, 71 Kan. 185, 79 Pac. 1077, clearly states the principle upon which contracts solvable by the laws of another state are enforced here.

Following the rule generally prevailing, we should now hold the note in question to be a negotiable instrument, if the law of Missouri is as the district court found it to be. That finding, however, is challenged upon the ground that it is not supported by the evidence; and, as the evidence consists of the statutes of Missouri, and decisions of courts of that state, pleaded as facts, the sufficiency of the proof to sustain the finding is fairly presented for review here. Belknap Hardware Mfg. Co. v. Sleeth, 77 Kan. 164, 93 Pac. 580. The statute pleaded and read in evidence is as follows: "Every promissory note for the payment of money to the payee therein named, or order or bearer, and expressed to be for value received, shall be due and payable as therein expressed, and shall have the same effect and be negotiable in like manner as inland in that state (which, however, does not appear from the opinion). The court, however, in declaring that, while the validity and interpretation of a contract may be controlled by the laws of a sister state, yet that, in determining what shall be good defenses to actions instituted in South Dakota, its courts must administer its own laws, and not those of other states, seems to have fallen into a contradiction, and its generalization, at least, is not sustained by the authorities.

As shown at page 208 of the earlier note, while the law of the place where a contract of indorsement is in a legal sense made governs as to the liability of the indorser to subsequent parties, that law does not govern as to the liability—even to indorsees—of the maker of a note or the acceptor of a bill (the primary obligors), since the governing law of his contract depends upon the facts at the time his contract is made, and his liability cannot be increased or diminished by the law of the place where a subsequent indorsement is made, except as the character of the indorsee as a bona fide holder may depend on the law of that place (as to which, see subdivision VII. of the earlier note). It will be observed that in First Nat. Bank v. Doeden, supra, the law of the place of payment, as to the question of negotiability, is held to prevail over the law of the place of indorsement, as well as over the law of the place where the note is made, and the law of the forum.

So, the fact that a note made and payable in another state is assigned by persons other than the maker in Kentucky does not operate to make the contract so far as the makers are concerned subject to the law of Kentucky requiring the words "peddlers' notes" to be placed on certain notes. Arnett v. Pinson, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 36, 108 S. W. 852.

The later cases sustain the rule as stated at page 209 of the earlier note, that the law of the place where a note or bill is payable, rather than the law of the place where the same as made or drawn, or accepted (if the place of acceptance and the place of payment are different), governs so far as the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

essential liability of, and the defenses available to, the maker or acceptor (the primary obligors) are concerned (excluding mere formal requisites, capacity of parties, etc.)

This rule, it will be observed, is applied in SYKES v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK not only to the ultimate question as to the liability of the maker, but also to the preliminary question of negotiability as affecting that ultimate question.

So, the law of Pennsylvania, where a note is payable, rather than the law of Indiana, where it is made, governs as to the substantive liability of the maker to a subsequent holder, and also as to the question of negotiability as affecting such liability. Midland Steel Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 34 Ind. App. 107, 72 N. E. 290.

So, the question whether failure of consideration is available to the maker as a defense against a subsequent holder of a note made in Mississippi, but importing that it is negotiable and payable in Alabama, depends upon the law of Alabama as the place of performance. Lienkauf Bkg. Co. v. Haney (Miss.) 46 So. 626.

In Price v. Gatloff, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 110 S. W. 332, the question of negotiability as affecting the liability of the maker to a subsequent bona fide holder was referred to the law of Iowa, it appearing that the notes were payable at a bank in that state, and that they were sent in blank from that state to the maker in Kentucky, who signed them and returned them through the mail to the payee in Iowa. While the court did not expressly refer the decision to the rule that the law of the place of payment prevails over the law of the place where the contract is made, that would seem to be implied, and the court apparently assumed that the maker's contract was to be regarded as having been made in Kentucky.

In Johnson County Sav. Bank v. Kramer (Ind. App.) 86 N. E. 84, the court said that a contract of acceptance of a bill, having been made in Indiana, was governed by the law of that state, which prevents the acceptor of a bill from availing himself of the defense of lack of consideration as against a subsequent indorsee for value in good faith; bills of exchange." Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889. § 733. The decision of the supreme court of Missouri, a part of which was set out in the petition, and all of which was read in evidence, is the opinion in Stillwell v. Craig, 58 Mo. 24. The action was upon a promissory note "payable in instalments not to exceed 10 per cent on each share (of the stock for which it was given), at thirty days' notice of call from the board of directors." The opinion says: "Our statutory requisites for negotiable paper are fully met in this instrument. . . . But the defendants insist that it lacks, in two particulars, the certainty essential to make it a promissory note, viz., as to amount, and as to time of payment. . . . As to time of payment, the law is less exacting. . . .

and thus apparently referred the question to the lex loci contractus rather than the lex loci solutionis. In this case, however, the bills were not only accepted in Indiana, but were addressed to the drawee in that state, so that Indiana was clearly the law of the place of performance of the acceptor's contract, and the result was therefore the same as if the decision had been expressly referred to the lex loci solutionis. Indeed, on the facts as stated by the court at the beginning of the opinion, it is extremely doubtful whether the acceptor's contract must not be regarded as having been made in Iowa, it appearing that a company in that state drew drafts to its own order directed to the drawee in Indiana, who in the latter state, accepted the same by signing his name on the face thereof, and, as the court said, "delivered them at said Iowa City."

In Krantz v. Kazenstein, 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 275, the sufficiency of a power of attorney in a note purporting to authorize the entry of a judgment in Pennsylvania by confession was held to be governed by the law of that state, although the contract was made in New York.

The validity and enforceability of a note payable in Illinois with power of attorney to confess judgment is to be determined by the law of Illinois, which permits confession of judgment whether the note was made in that state or not. Vennum v. Mertens, 119 Mo. App. 461, 95 S. W. 292.

Liability of and defenses available to drawer or indorser.

The later cases recognize and apply the general principle stated and formulated at page 212 of the earlier note, to the effect that the contract of the drawer or indorser (the secondary obligors) is not only a separate contract which has a situs of its own independent of that of the maker or acceptor (the primary obligor), but also that his obligation is to pay, in the event of the default of the primary obligor, not at the place of payment expressly or impliedly named in the bill or note, but at the place where, in a legal sense, his contract was made. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Contingencies in this particular must be exceedingly remote, in order to vitiate the paper for negotiable capacity. In Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 26 Vt. 77, a note for $21, payable 'in such portions and at such time or times as the said company may, agreeably to their act of incorporation, require,' was held to be a promissory note for the sum specified, so as to determine a question of jurisdiction; but a doubt was expressed whether it would be such in a commercial sense. The doubt, however, as it seems to me, is not justified by the reasoning of the opinion, or by the authorities which it cites. In Goshen Turnp. Co. v. Hurtin, 9 Johns. 217, 6 Am. Dec. 273, a similar instrument was held to be a good promissory note, as being 'pay-

This general principle is comprehensively stated in Amsinck v. Rogers, 189 N. Y. 252, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 875, 121 Am. St. Rep. 858, 82 N. E. 134, and Sullivan v. German Nat. Bank, 18 Colo. App. 99, 70 Pac. 162, and exemplified and applied in cases subsequently cited in this note as well as in the earlier note.

By the application of this principle, the validity of indorsements, made in Texas as a part of a gambling transaction, of certificates of deposit '(negotiable paper) issued in Colorado, was held in Sullivan v. German Nat. Bank, supra, to be governed by the law of Texas.

As the place of performance of the indorser's contract is the place where in a legal sense his contract is made, it is obvious that, if the indorsement is in a legal sense made in the state in which the bill or note is payable, the indorser's contract will be governed by the same law as that of the maker or acceptor. Ordinarily an indorser's contract is deemed to be made not necessarily in the state in which he writes his name on the back of the paper, but in the state in which the instrument is delivered, so as to become a binding contract on him. In Colonial Nat. Bank v. Duerr, 108 App. Div. 215, 95 N. Y. Supp. 810, however, the law of New York, which in case of an alteration in negotiable paper permits a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, to enforce payment of the paper according to its original tenor, was applied as against one who indorsed his name on a note in New York and there delivered it to the maker, who, after making an alteration therein, negotiated it in Ohio, where, as the court said, it had "its first inception as a legal contract," notwithstanding that the note was dated in Ohio and was also payable there. This decision apparently rests on the ground that the contract of indorsement was deemed to have been made in New York notwithstanding that, until the delivery in Ohio, the contract was not binding upon the indorser. This view of the place of the making of the indorser's contract is perhaps supported by the case of Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 169 able in money, and payable absolutely, and not depending on any contingency.' In the element of certainty as to time of payment I can perceive no difference in principle between such a note and one payable on demand. Hence, if the note under consideration be transferable at all, I have no hesitation in saying that it is negotiable, at least to the extent of authorizing a suit jointly against makers and indorser." Pages 30, 31 of 58 Mo. The clause in the note in question here, upon which it was held by this court in the former decision to be non-negotiable, was this: "The makers and indorsers [hereof] hereby severally waive protest, demand, and notice of protest and nonpayment in case this note is not paid at maturity, and agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity, without prejudice to holder." In the opinion in City Nat. Bank v. Gunter Bros. 67 Kan. 227, 72 Pac. 842, the precedent followed in the former decision of this case, it was said: "In the note in question payment is first fixed at 182 days after the date, but, as will be observed, a later provision makes the time indefinite by stipulating that it may be changed and extended either before or after maturity. If the time is to remain fixed until maturity, when another time is to be fixed by the parties, or if payment is made to depend upon events which necessarily must occur, and the time of payment is ultimately certain, other considerations would arise; but here payment is not ultimately certain, for the

N. Y. 538, 57 L.R.A. 513, 88 Am. St. Rep. 614, 62 N. E. 672; but is of doubtful soundness (see authorities referred to in case note in Chemical Nat. Bank v. Kellogg, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 299, and also Nashua Sav. Bank v. Sayles, 184 Mass. 520, 100 Am. St. Rep. 573, 69 N. E. 309, and Montana Coal & Coke Co. v. Cincinnati Coal & Coke Co. 69 Ohio St. 351, 69 N. E. 613.)

Other applications of the general principle which regards the drawer's or indorser's contract as distinct from that of the maker's or acceptor's to questions of substantive liability of the drawer or indorser will be found at page 213 of the earlier note.

The principle has also been frequently applied to the determination of governing law with respect to the conditions precedent to the liability of the drawer or indorser. Thus, in Amsinck v. Rogers, supra, by a specific application of this principle, it is held that the duty to cause protest and notice of presentment and nonpayment, in order to fix the liability of the drawers of a bill of exchange upon parties in Austria, drawn, indorsed, and transferred in New York, is governed by the law of New York rather than by the law of Austria; and it was further held that the question whether the bill of exchange was a negotiable instrument as affecting the duty to cause protest and give notice of presentment and nonpayment was also to be determined by the law of New York, so that, the instrument being negotiable by that law, protest and notice were essential to bind the drawer, notwithstanding that by the law of Austria the instrument may have had the character of a "commercial order" for the payment of money, as to which no protest is necessary.

So, the law of Pennsylvania, where indorsement is made, governs as to the necessity of demand and protest, and also as to the necessity of exhausting the maker's resources, in order to hold the indorsers, though the note was dated and delivered in Kentucky, and is, as a result, a Kentucky contract. Columbia Finance & T. Co. v. Purcell, 142 Fed. 984.

rule of West Virginia, where the note was made (no place of payment being mentioned), would have governed as to the necessity of protest if that law had been proved; but, in the absence of proof indulged the presumption that the common law prevailed in that state. It does not appear where the note was indorsed.

As pointed out in the earlier note, however, the question as to the maturity of the paper, even as affecting the liability of the drawer or indorser, is necessarily governed, not by the law of the place of performance of the drawer's or indorser's contract, but by the law of the place of payment of the bill or note itself.

Thus, in Hammond v. American Exp. Co. 107 Md. 295, 68 Atl. 496, an action against the drawers, the court clearly implied that the law of England, if proven, would have governed as to the time of the maturity of drafts drawn in Maryland upon a drawee residing in Dublin who accepted them payable in London. In the absence of proof of the law of England, however, the court indulged the presumption that it was the same as the law of Maryland on the point.

So, in Vaughan v. Potter, 131 Ill. App. 334, the court said that, while the contract of the maker was a Missouri contract and that of the indorser (it being conceded that he made the indorsement in Illinois) an Illinois contract, yet the time of the maturity of the paper entered into both contracts, and the law of the place of payment of the note (Missouri) governed the question of the proper time of presentment and demand.

As shown at page 218 of the earlier note, while the courts are substantially agreed that the necessity of giving notice of dishonor in order to hold drawer or indorser is to be determined by the law of the place where the bill was in a legal sense drawn, or the bill or note indorsed, as the case may be, there is a conflict of authority upon the question as to the governing law in respect of the time (i. e., time after maturity as fixed by the law of place of payment of the primary obligor's contract) and sufficiency of the notice in order to hold the secondary time named in the paper is subject to change at any time, at the volition of some of the parties to the paper." Page 231 of 67 Kan. In Stillwell v. Craig, supra, the note was payable in instalments which would not affect its negotiability (Dan. Neg. Inst. § 48), and these instalments were to be paid in thirty days after a call by the board of directors of the payee; that is, in thirty days after demand. As was said of a like provision: "It was in effect payable on demand or in instalments on demand." White v. Smith, 77 Ill. 351, 353, 20 Am. Rep. 251.

The language of the supreme court of Missouri, quoted above, "I can perceive no difference in principle between such a note and one payable on demand," is significant, showing the interpretation placed upon the language of that instrument, holding it to be, in effect, a demand note. The language of the note in this case will not bear that interpretation, and the opinion in Stillwell v. Craig, supra, does not, in our view, sustain the finding of fact in this case with respect to the law of Missouri. It is true that it may indicate a trend in that direction, but this is not sufficient to prove the fact pleaded. The same court, in a recent case, in considering the effect of a decision of a sister state when offered in evidence to prove the common law of that state, said: "A close analysis of the Arkansas cases cited leads us to conclude that the supreme court of Arkansas never went so far as appellant contends. The very most that can be said was that that learned court was 'heading' in that direction. But, as seen by our own decisions, and pointed out in Grattis v. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. supra (153 Mo. 380, 48 L.R.A. 399, 77 Am. St. Rep. 721, 55 S. W. 108), courts do not always go on the way they are headed, and it is not always safe to say that a court will reach a goal to which its face is turned and its steps directed. Indeed, we may allow to the supreme court of Arkansas the same right and disposition to establish a growth in the law, or reconstruct its views, that we arrogate to ourselves." Root obligor; and, as there stated, the weight of authority, in America at least, of the earlier cases, is that the time (in the sense just indicated) and sufficiency of the notice are governed by the law that determines its necessity,—that is, by the law of the place where the bill was drawn, if it is a question of the drawer's liability, or by the law of the place of indorsement, if it is a question of the indorser's liability.

In the later case of Merchants' Bank v. Brown, 86 App. Div. 599, 83 N. Y. Supp. 1037, however, involving the question as to the manner of giving notice where the indorser was dead, the court said that the

v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 195 Mo. 348, 372, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 212, 92 S. W. 621. 629. The decision of the Kansas City court of appeals in City Nat. Bank v. Goodloe-McClelland Commission Co. 93 Mo. App. 123, fully sustains the finding; but that is an intermediate court, and its decisions do not settle the law of that state. Its jurisdiction is limited, both in territory and amount in controversy, and its decisions involving an amount in excess of $2,500 are subject to review in the supreme court. We have the highest respect for that tribunal. The great learning and ability of its judges is unquestioned; but we cannot admit its opinions to determine that the common law of that state, as a fact, is different from what we have declared the common law to be here. "The decision of the Kansas City court of appeals in Goodland v. Bank of Darlington, 74 Mo. App. 365, is alone cited in support of this contention. A fixed and settled rule of decision in a state court or last resort establishes the law of the state in such manner as to bind the Federal courts in all matters controlled by the state law; but the opinions of intermediate appellate courts, like the Kansas City court of appeals, while entitled to great respect and regarded as persuasive authority, are not controlling upon the Federal courts, because they do not settle the law of the state." Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Lombard, 68 C. C. A. 89, 109, 132 Fed. 721, 741. See also Hennessy v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 145 Mo. 104, 41 L.R.A. 385, 68 Am. St. Rep. 554, 46 S. W. 966. Other Missouri decisions read in evidence related to the effect of the mortgage security, and do not govern this question. The statute quoted above (Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 733) is probably only declaratory of the common law (First Nat. Bank v. Payne, 111 Mo. 291, 33 Am. St. Rep. 520, 20 S. W. 41), and does not materially differ from our own.

Upon a careful examination of the evidence offered upon the subject, we conclude that the finding that the note sued upon was and is negotiable is not supported by the proof. In the absence of such proof it note, having been made in Canada, and being by its terms payable there, was a contract governed by the law of Canada, without otherwise discussing the question as to the governing law or recognizing the distinction between the original contract and the indorsement. It does not appear where the indorsement was made, but, as the indorsee was the bank at which the note was payable, it seems quite probable that the indorsement was also made in Canada, in which event there would be no conflict between the decision in this case and the rule sustained by the weight of authority on this point.

will be presumed that the law of Missouri is the same as our own.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. S. MANKER et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

L. M. TOUGH.

(— Kan. —, 98 Pac. 792.)

Agent — sale of real estate.

1. An agent employed to sell real estate, and not authorized to execute a contract of sale, or to execute an instrument of conveyance, is only an agent to find a buyer.

Sale — joint adventure — principal and agent — distinction.

2. A contract between a real-estate agent and a landowner that, if the agent should find a purchaser for the land, he should have, as compensation for his services the amount the land should sell for above a certain price, is an agency contract, and not a joint adventure.

Broker — license — effect on contract.

3. Where, under the statute which authorizes cities of the third class to impose a license tax upon "real-estate agents," the council of such a city enacts an ordinance imposing a license tax upon the business of "real estate," and a real-estate agent thereafter continues to conduct his business within said city without a license, and, in such business, makes a contract to find a buyer of real estate for a compensation, such ordinance does not render the contract illegal and void.

Municipal ordinance — construction.

4. In a civil action to which the city is not a party, where a breach of such ordinance is invoked for the purpose of avoiding a contract between the parties, the ordinance will be strictly construed.

Appeal — review — findings of fact — discretion.

5. The allowance or denial of a motion for a new trial, filed after a general verdict in a district court, is largely a matter of judicial discretion as to the findings of fact and the weight of evidence involved in the verdict; but alleged errors of law occurring upon the trial are not matters of discretion, and are fully subject to review in this court.

ERROR to the District Court for Scott County to review an order granting a new trial after verdict for plaintiffs in an action brought to recover commissions for the sale of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Smith, J.:

The defendant in error employed the plaintiff firm of real-estate agents to sell a large tract of land for him, and contracted to pay them for their services therein the amount for which the land was sold in excess of $6 per acre. The contract of employment was oral. The plaintiffs found a purchaser, and brought the purchaser and the seller together, and they entered into a written contract, duly executed, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to sell and convey by warranty deed 2,880 acres of land, by quitclaim deed 320 acres, and by relinquishment 160 acres, aggregating 3,360 acres, for which the purchaser agreed to pay $23,520, and to pay $5,000 cash, $3,000 of which was paid at the time of the execution of the contract. Promissory notes, payable at specified times, and all bearing interest and secured by a mortgage on the land, were to be given for the remainder of the purchase price. A definite date for the consummation of the transaction was also included in the contract. Afterwards, by the mutual agreement of the purchaser and the seller, but without the consent or concurrence of the plaintiffs, the contract was canceled, and the $3,000 which had been paid thereon was returned by the seller to the purchaser. Thereafter the plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the seller the sum of $3,360, being equivalent to $1 per acre, as compensation for their services. The making of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant is virtually admitted by the pleadings. The plaintiffs allege that the defendant agreed to pay them for their services the amount for which the sale should be made in excess of $6 per acre provided they found a purchaser who was able and willing to buy the land. The answer, however, alleges that he agreed, if the plaintiffs should find a purchaser for the lands, and should close up and complete a sale thereof, he would allow them as compensation for their services any amount they obtained therefor above $6 per acre. The case was tried in the district court of Scott county to a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed. A motion for a new trial was filed by the defendant, and was sustained by the court. To reverse this order the plaintiffs bring the case here.

Messrs. David Ritchie and Ed. R. Bane, for plaintiffs in error:

To entitle plaintiffs to their commission it was only necessary to establish that the purchaser and seller were brought together through their efforts, and entered into an enforceable contract.

The contract was one of agency.

Messrs. J. S. Simmons and R. D. Armstrong, for defendant in error:

A contract to sell land, against which the vendee can successfully plead the statute of frauds, is not a valid contract which will entitle the broker employed to produce a purchaser to recover.

Wilson v. Mason, 158 Ill. 304, 49 Am. St. Rep. 162, 42 N. E. 134; Francis v. Baker, 45 Minn. 83, 47 N. W. 452; Flynn v. Jordal, 124 Iowa, 457, 100 N. W. 327.

The ordinance in question should be liberally construed.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury was properly instructed as to the burden of proof in the case, and it is not contended by the defendant that there was not some evidence to support every material issue of fact. The court sustained the motion for a new trial only upon the ground of errors of law occurring at the trial, as will hereinafter more fully appear. It follows that the court approved the verdict of the jury as to the facts involved, and we shall therefore regard it as a fact that the contract was as alleged by the plaintiffs. Indeed, where one employs another to sell land for him, and does not confer authority to execute a contract of sale or to execute an instrument of conveyance, the contract necessarily is that the agent should find a purchaser ready, willing, and able to make the purchase at the price and on the terms prescribed by the seller to the agent. The court, on sustaining the motion for a new trial, filed a statement of his reasons for making the order, which is made a part of the record. They are as follows: "(1) I conclude, as a matter of law, that in a contract such as the one in question, where agent's compensation was to be such sum as might be derived from the sale above a fixed price, the relation of principal and agent is not created, and does not exist, and that the transaction partakes of the nature of a joint venture, in which neither one may profit to the exclusion of the other, unless the sale shall fail by reason of the fault or neglect of the owner. (2) I conclude that the contract entered into between Tough and Sample was nonenforceable, for the reason that the contract provided for a relinquishment, on the part of Tough, of a homestead entry upon government land, and for a mortgage on the part of Sample on such land after he should have acquired homestead interest therein,"—neither one of which provisions could be enforced specifically, and the latter of which is especially contrary to law. (3) I conclude that the term 'real estate,' as used in ordinance No. 67 to define a business, includes within itself the usual and reasonable acceptance 'real-estate agents,' and that, while such term may include other business than real-estate agents, the fact that the ordinance goes beyond statutory authority will not vitiate it, in so far as the ordinance is within the scope of granted authority; and that such ordinance was sufficient to impose a license-tax upon persons engaged as real-estate agents within the limits of Scott City, and that the plaintiffs, by their failure to obey such license, are not in a position to recover this action. (4) I am of the opinion that the willingness of Sample to buy the land in question is immaterial, beyond the fact that he signed the contract upon which plaintiffs rely; but, if it should be for any reason held otherwise, then substantial error was committed against the defendant in the progress of the trial by excluding the deposition of Kelly. (5) From which conclusions it must follow as a matter of course that I believe the verdict to be contrary to law, and that it must be set aside and a new trial granted. (6) That the new trial was granted upon the grounds stated in the above and foregoing statement, and none other."

The contract, as pleaded by the plaintiffs, and which the general verdict determines to be the true contract, is, we think, a contract of agency, and not a joint venture, and, except as to the basis of payment, is not unusual. It does not differ materially from the usual contract with real-estate agents to sell land. We cannot therefore concur with the court in the first reason for granting a new trial. Neither can we concur in the second reason assigned by the court. Whether the contract between the seller and the purchaser was enforceable or not is not material to this case. The seller was able to make just such a conveyance to the purchaser as in their written agreement he agreed to make. The purchaser in return was able to make just such a mortgage as he agreed to make and the seller agreed to accept. Indeed, it appears from the evidence produced by defendant that, at the time their contract was abrogated by mutual consent, the seller had prepared the deeds of conveyance, and the purchaser had prepared his notes and mortgage. The only apparent obstacle to the closing of the deal is that the purchaser had changed his mind, and to avoid proceeding preferred to lose, if necessary, the $3,000 paid. Also there appears to have been no contention that he was not financially responsible. As to the fourth ground for sustaining the motion, we agree with the court as to the immateriality of the deposition, other than the portion thereof admitted in evidence, of the witness, Kelly, but this does not furnish a reason for granting a new trial. There remains, then, only to consider the meaning of the term "real estate" as used in ordinance No. 67 of Scott City as applicable to this action. The court admitted the ordinance in evidence, and afterwards withdrew it from the consideration of the jury. In the third conclusion the court indicates that the latter action was erroneous. Scott City is a city of the third class, and § 1127, Gen. Stat. 1901, provides: "The city council shall have authority to levy and collect a license tax on . . . real-estate agents." Ordinance No. 67, § 1, reads: "That, on and after the 1st day of September, 1901, it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, to engage in any of the branches of business or industry, within the corporate limits of the city of Scott City, Kansas, set forth in this ordinance, without first having obtained a license therefor, signed by the mayor and countersigned by the clerk of said Scott City, Kansas, and sealed with the city seal." Section 3, amended (omitting all enumerations but the following), reads: "That the license tax on the following professions and businesses shall be for . . . real estate . . . $2.00 per year." Section 5 reads: "Any person violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) and, upon conviction thereof before the police judge, shall be fined in a sum not less than $5 nor more than $50." It is admitted by the plaintiffs that they were real-estate agents doing business in Scott City, and that the contract in question was made therein, and that they had paid no license fee and had secured no license for such business. Also that, if the ordinance, strictly construed, applied to their business, and required of them the payment of the license fee, they cannot recover in this action; and that the order of the court in granting a new trial by reason of the exclusion of said ordinance from the consideration of the jury is right. They contend, however, that the statute only authorized the city to impose a license tax upon "real-estate agents," and that the city council had not acted upon that grant of authority, but had assumed to impose a license tax upon the business of "real estate;" further, that the ordinance is penal in its nature, and must be strictly construed. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the intention of the council is apparent, and was to tax the business of real-estate agents; that the business of real-estate agents is commonly designated as the "business of real estate" or the "real-estate business."

If the ordinance in question imposed a license tax upon "real-estate agents," it would be within the express statutory grant of power, and this case would involve the identical question decided in Yount v. Denning, 52 Kan. 629, 35 Pac. 207. In that case the ordinance imposed a license tax upon the business of "real-estate agents," and also, in substance, provided that no person or firm should conduct or carry on such business within the city of Winfield without first having obtained a license so to do and having paid the license tax. That ordinance also, as the one in this case, prescribed a fine for a violation of its provision. It was held therein that a firm of real-estate agents who, without obtaining the license, had contracted in the city of Winfield to sell a tract of real estate for a certain commission, and who had performed their part of the contract, could not maintain an action to recover the stipulated compensation for their services for the reason that the contract was made in violation of law. Also that any remedy upon a contract made in violation of a city ordinance is denied for the benefit of the city in the collection of its revenues. The above case was decided in January, 1894. In different forms it was twice afterwards in this court, and it has been cited with apparent approval several times in this and other courts of last resort. Denning v. Yount, 62 Kan. 218, 50 L.R.A. 103, 61 Pac. 803; Denning v. Yount, 66 Kan.

766, 71 Pac. 250; Mayes v. Cherokee Strip Live Stock Asso. 58 Kan. 717, 51 Pac. 215; Mayer v. Hartman, 77 Kan. 788, 90 Pac. 807. The decision is stare decisis upon the facts involved. Moreover, it must be said to be in accord with the long-recognized principle that no action can be maintained to enforce a contract made in violation of law. This statement of the law was an enlargement of the original doctrine as to a contract to do an act which would be a crime or misdemeanor under the common law, or against public policy, or a trespass upon the private rights of a third person. Courts differ widely as to whether the power granted by statute to a city to impose a license tax upon an occupation or business includes, in the absence of any intimation of authority so to do, the power to prohibit the prosecution of the occupation or business unless a prescribed license tax be first paid. But the decisions of this court, supra, at least assume that the power to prohibit is embodied in the power to impose the license tax.

Still questions will continue to recur. Why should one party to a contract be allowed to avoid the payment of debts he has contracted to pay and thus gain an unconscionable advantage because the other party deliberately, or through inability or mere oversight, has failed to discharge an obligation to the city when there is available to the city both a civil remedy for the wrong and a penal remedy against the wrongdoer? Was it any benefit to the city, in Yount v. Denning, supra, that one party was relieved from paying the other an agreed compensation for services actually rendered, or in Mayer v. Hartman, supra, that one party was enabled to cheat his neighbor out of coal worth nearly $1,000? Is not the penalty entirely disproportionate to the offense, especially as, when it has been suffered, neither the civil nor the penal action by the city has been abated? In the present state of the law, if these questions are not to continue to arise, it devolves upon the legislature to modify the law. As the law has been construed for a long time by this and most other courts of last resort, it appears to furnish an inducement to evil-disposed persons to watch opportunities to contract with anyone upon whom a license tax has been imposed, at a time when, for perhaps only a day, he has neglected to pay his tax, and thus acquire merchandise or service without payment therefor. The denial of a remedy upon the illegal contract is, in effect, tantamount to a penalty or fine in the amount the party, by the terms of the contract, is entitled to recover. By constitutional provision the "proceeds of fines for any breach of the penal laws, shall be exclusively applied in the several counties in which the . . . fines [are] collected to the support of common schools." Article 6, § 6. And "an act of the legislature giving to an informer who has sustained no loss one half of such proceeds is unconstitutional and void." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 22 Kan. 1. The rule, then, that allows one party to a civil action to penalize for his own benefit the other party for an act which occasioned him no loss would seem to be exotic to the jurisprudence of this state, but to have been ingrafted thereon.

As to whether a penal ordinance should be strictly or liberally construed, there is some diversity of opinion in other courts. See also Meriam v. New Orleans, 14 La. Ann. 318; Zorger v. Greensburgh, 60 Ind. 1; State v. Carpenter, 60 Conn. 97, 22 Atl. 497; Davis v. Darling, 80 Hun, 299, 30 N. Y. Supp. 323; United States v. Harris, 177 U. S. 305, 44 L. ed. 780, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609; Sarlis v. United States, 152 U. S. 570, 38 L. ed. 556, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720; United States v. Reese, 5 Dill. 405, Fed. Cas. No. 16,137; Re McDonough (D. C.) 49 Fed. 362; United States v. Starn (D. C.) 17 Fed. 435; French v. Foley (D. C.) 11 Fed. 801; Fahnestock v. State, 102 Ind. 156, 1 N. E. 372; Lair v. Killmer, 25 N. J. L. 525; State v. Lovell, 23 Iowa, 304; Daggett v. State, 4 Conn. 60, 10 Am. Dec. 100; Johnson v. Southern P. Co. 54 C. C. A. 508, 117 Fed. 467. In this state the doctrine of strict construction was early adopted in Snyder v. North Lawrence, 8 Kan. 82. This case is cited in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Long, 27 Kan. 696, where the construction of a penal statute was involved, indicating that the same rule of construction should prevail. In Swift v. Topeka, 43 Kan. 671, 8 L.R.A. 772, 23 Pac. 1075, a city ordinance is construed liberally for the purpose of maintaining its validity, but strictly according to its letter to relieve one charged with a violation thereof. In the Snyder Case the ordinance provided, among other things, that "no one should, without license, keep, hire out, or cause to be run, 'any hackney coach, carriage, omnibus, or dray.'" In the agreed statements of facts it was stated that defendant had kept a certain wagon, drawn by four horses, which was used in the transportation of property and for transferring goods of grocers and merchants within the city, and that he had paid no license tax therefor. It was undoubtedly urged in that case, as it is in this, that the defendant was, by the intent and spirit of the ordinance, required to pay a license tax. Indeed, it would have been no strained construction to say that a wagon, drawn by four horses and used for the transportation of property, and for transferring goods for grocers and merchants within the city, was a dray. Yet it was not within the letter of the law. Neither in this case is the business of real-estate agents within the letter of the law which imposes a license tax upon the business of real estate. The Snyder Case was one that arose in the city court for the enforcement of the ordinance, while the case at bar is between two citizens, one of whom invokes a violation of the ordinance for the purpose only of relieving him of his obligations under a contract. In consonance with the general doctrine in a number of the cases cited, it is said in Lair v. Killmer, supra: "In defining the crime and the punishment, penal statutes are to be taken strictly and literally. A penal law cannot be extended by construction. The act constituting the offense must be both within the spirit and the letter of the statute."

We conclude that the admission, that the plaintiffs were engaged in the business of real-estate agents in Scott City, and had not procured a license for said business, and had made the contract in question in said city as such agents, does not prove that the making of such contract was a penal offense under the ordinance of the city; that the ruling of the court withdrawing ordinance No. 67 from the consideration of the jury was not an error of law. True it is that the allowance of a motion for a new trial is a matter largely in the discretion of the district court, and especially so where questions of fact and the weight of evidence are involved. In this case by positive intimation the court approved all findings of fact involved in the general verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiffs which, under the instructions of the court, involved a finding that the failure to complete a sale of the land resulted from the fault or inability of the defendant "to do the things necessary by him to be done." The questions involved, then, as stated by the court, were purely questions of law, and the rulings of the court upon questions of law are not matters of discretion.

The order granting a new trial is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded, with instructions to overrule the motion and to render judgment for the plaintiffs in accordance with the general verdict.

Porter, J., specially concurring:

Aside from the ordinary rules for construing penal statutes and ordinances, a court would be justified, in my opinion, in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

construing the ordinance in question with the utmost strictness. Its enforcement is not demanded in order to carry out the purpose for which the legislature authorized its enactment, but solely to enable one person to avoid the payment of a just debt. In the recent case of Fossett v. Rock Island Lumber & Mfg. Co. 76 Kan. 428, 430, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918, 92 Pac. 833, 834, it was said: "The doctrine of Yount v. Denning, 52 Kan. 629, 35 Pac. 207, that a person who fails to pay an occupation tax cannot recover for his services is adopted for the protection of the licensing power of the state, not primarily for the benefit of some other person who has had dealings with him and who seeks to avoid the payment of what would be otherwise justly due,"—citing Wicks v. Carlisle, 12 Okla. 337, 72 Pac. 377. The decision in Yount v. Denning, supra, holding that the failure to pay a license tax renders a business or occupation unlawful, and that the failure can be interposed as a defense in an action to recover for services rendered or property sold, may accord with the weight of authority, but its reasoning has never seemed conclusive, and it is doubtful if it has met with the general approval of the profession in this state. There is nothing in any of the statutes granting to cities the right to levy and collect an occupation tax which conveys the slightest intimation of an intention on the part of the legislature to delegate to cities the power to declare a business unlawful for the failure to pay such a tax. The various statutes authorizing the cities of the three classes to impose license taxes all read about alike, and simply declare that the mayor and council may levy and collect a license tax upon and regulate certain occupations, and that the licenses shall be regulated by ordinance, and shall not be issued for a longer period than one year. There is implied the authority of the city to provide penalties for the enforcement of the ordinance and the collection of the tax. But ordinances to be valid must be reasonable, and courts have the power to declare them unreasonable. If a city were to ordain that a merchant who has failed to pay a license tax shall henceforth be denied the right to engage in such business in the city, or that his stock of goods be confiscated, it would not stand the test of the courts for a moment. And this is the place where the decision should have turned the other way in Yount v. Denning, supra. License ordinances usually provide a penalty by way of a fine for a failure to comply with their provisions, and sometimes provide, also, for the collection of the tax in an action of debt. Therefore the additional penalty, forfeiting property and contract rights, is wholly unnecessary to enable the city to collect its revenue. So serious a penalty for the neglect to pay a mere nominal license tax is out of all proportion to the offense. Besides, to allow another person, whose rights have in no way been prejudiced, to take such unconscionable advantage of the omission and avoid the payment of a just debt shocks the sense of justice. Following the law as declared, however, this court recently, in Mayer v. Hartman, 77 Kan. 788, 90 Pac. 807, felt obliged to affirm a judgment permitting a man who had purchased several car loads of coal to keep the coal and escape payment for it because the merchant who furnished it to him had failed to pay a city license tax. It would seem that any city could better afford to lose a year's revenue from occupation licenses than to permit one such instance of a failure of justice. Yount v. Denning, however, is the law of the state. It has stood for fourteen years, during which the legislature might at any time have enacted a simple statute providing that the failure to pay a license tax on a business otherwise lawful, and which requires neither supervision nor regulation, shall not render it unlawful. Until the situation is relieved by the legislature the courts should construe a license ordinance, when interposed for such a purpose, with the greatest strictness.

Benson, J., concurring specially:

The law of the state allowed the council to levy and collect a license tax on real-estate agents. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1127. The ordinance offered in evidence undertook to levy such a tax upon persons engaged in the business of "real estate." This expression is vague and indefinite, and the ordinance does not carry into effect the express power to levy a tax on real-estate agents, given by the statute. For this reason the ordinance was invalid, and the failure to pay the tax was not a defense to the claim for commissions, and the court erred in the third reason given for sustaining the motion for a new trial. The ordinance being properly excluded, the possible effect of the failure of the plaintiff to pay a tax levied under a valid ordinance is a question not presented in this record, and I prefer to express no opinion upon it.

I concur in the views expressed in the opinion of the court upon the other points involved, and concur in the result reached.

LANE & LIBBY.

Master — arranging apparatus — liability to employee.

1. One engaged in discharging coal from vessels, who provides suitable apparatus for the work, is not responsible to an employee for the manner in which it is set up by the men employed in doing the work; and therefore he is not liable for injury to an employee caused by the fall of the apparatus because it was fastened to a decayed cleat on the mast of the vessel, without stays to prevent its falling if the fastenings should give way.

Same — subsequent employment.

2. One employed to assist in unloading a cargo of coal from a vessel after the apparatus for doing the work is set up has no greater rights against the employer with respect to the safety of the manner in which the work is done than though he was employed at the time it was done.

(December 18, 1907.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to an order of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County granting a nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph E. Moore and C. M. Walker for plaintiff.

Messrs. Benjamin Brooks, Edward C. Stowe, and M. O. Garner for defendant.

Emery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence adduced by the plaintiff shows the following: The defendant company was engaged in the coal business at Vinalhaven, where it owned and occupied a wharf for the unloading and storage of coal from vessels and for other purposes. A vessel, not owned by the defendant, having arrived at this wharf with coal consigned to the defendant, and to be unloaded, two men, Young and Dyer, in the employ of the de-

Note. — See case note to Leishman v. Union Iron Works, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 500, as to responsibility of master for appliances constructed by employees as part of the work; and subject note to Haskell v. Cape Ann Anchor Works, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 220, as to the duty of master to furnish safe appliances as affected by the fact that defective appliances are prepared by fellow servants.

defendant, went to the wharf and vessel, and set up tackles and other appliances, furnished by the defendant, for hoisting the coal out of the hold of the vessel and conveying it to the coal shed. They rigged up an iron triangle over the hatch and wheeling platform between the fore and the main mast, supported by a rope or span passing through blocks at the head of each mast and down near the foot of the mast. At the foot of the mainmast this supporting rope was made fast around the mast itself. At the foot of the foremast it was passed under a hook or snatch, and made fast to a cleat on the mast. This cleat was designed and used to hold the foresail halyards supporting the foresail when hoisted. To this triangle, thus supported, a gin block was attached through which passed the hoisting rope connecting the hoisting buckets with the hoisting power on the wharf.

After rigging up these appliances, as above stated, these two men, with others in the employ of the defendant, began the work of discharging the coal; Dyer going into the hold to shovel coal into the bucket, and Young going on the platform to wheel the coal to the shed, as hoisted. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant a few hours later to join this crew, and began wheeling coal on the platform along with Young. This work of unloading the coal was begun in the afternoon of one day. At about 11 o'clock of the next forenoon, as a bucket of coal was being hoisted, it caught under the hatch, and the consequent strain pulled the cleat off the foremast, allowing the tackle or triangle to fall upon the plaintiff, to his injury.

Nothing but the cleat gave way. None of the ropes, blocks, etc., proved insufficient. The giving way of the cleat was the sole cause of the injury. Upon subsequent inspection the cleat was found to be decayed on the inside next the mast.

It does not directly appear who set the discharging crew at work, or who directed Young and Dyer to set up the appliances for unloading; but it is to be presumed that some agent of the defendant having authority did so. It does not appear that any directions were given to any of the men how to set up the appliances, or how, where, or to what to make them fast, or what precautions to take against the giving way of any fastening. The superintendent of the defendant company was about on the wharf occasionally, but there is no evidence that he gave any directions, or that he or any other officer of the defendant company knew how the appliances were arranged or secured. So far as appears, that was left to the workmen themselves.

There were available several other supports of greater strength than the cleat to which the ropes sustaining the triangle, etc., could have been fastened. Indeed, Dyer, one of the two men setting up the appliances, suggested another support, but Young, who seems to have been the foreman of that work, nevertheless selected the cleat. There was no allegation nor evidence that either Young or Dyer was incompetent or too habitually careless to be intrusted with such work.

The plaintiff claims that, upon the above statement, the defendant company was guilty of negligence toward him, an employee, in not having the sustaining ropes more securely fastened, and in not having preventive stays rigged to hold up the triangle, etc., in case anything broke or gave way. No other negligence is alleged or claimed. Granting, arguendo, these omissions to be negligence, it remains to be considered whether the negligence was that of the defendant in the performance of its duty to the plaintiff, or was the negligence of fellow servants of the plaintiff for which the defendant would not be liable.

In this case it was the duty, and the whole duty, of the defendant to the plaintiff to exercise due care in the supply and maintenance of suitable and sufficiently strong platforms, ropes, and other appliances for discharging coal from vessels with safety to its employees by the exercise of due care on their part, and to exercise due care for the employment of competent and ordinarily careful men for the work. This duty the defendant seems to have performed, or at least there is no evidence of nonperformance, and hence performance is to be presumed. Nason v. West, 78 Me. 253, 3 Atl. 911. The platform, the triangle, blocks, pulleys, ropes, etc., necessary for the work proved to be suitable and sufficient. These appliances were not fixed, but were movable, to be set up and fastened anew to different supports for the discharging of each new cargo of coal as it arrived. The support, whether cleat, windlast, rail, or mast, to which the appliances, the apparatus, should be fastened for support, was not part of them. That would be left behind when these should be taken down and removed.

The setting up and making fast these appliances, including the selection of the place or object to which to make them fast, for the purpose of discharging a particular cargo of coal, was part of the operation or work of discharging coal to be done by the workmen sent to discharge the cargo. Negligence in this setting up, fastening, and generally making secure, including securing by preventive stays if necessary, was the negligence of those workmen, for which, under the settled law of this state, the defendant is not responsible. Dube v. Lewiston, 83 Me. 211, 22 Atl. 112; Atkins v. Field, 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375; Rounds v. Carter, 94 Me. 535, 48 Atl. 175; Small v. Allington & C. Mfg. Co. 94 Me. 551, 48 Atl. 177; Pellerin v. International Paper Co. 96 Me. 388, 52 Atl. 842; Amburg v. International Paper Co. 97 Me. 327, 54 Atl. 765; Lombard Water-Wheel Governor Co. v. Great Northern Paper Co. 101 Me. 114, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 180, 63 Atl. 555.

That the plaintiff's employment to assist in discharging the coal was after the platform, etc., were set up does not make the defendant liable for such negligence. The defendant was, for the reason, under no greater obligation to him than to the others. Killea v. Faxon, 125 Mass. 485; O'Connor v. Rich, 164 Mass. 560, 49 Am. St. Rep. 483, 42 N. E. 111. The latter case was cited in Beal v. Bryant, 99 Me. 112, 58 Atl. 428, where it was said at page 119 of 99 Me.: "It matters not that the stage was already secured in position before the plaintiff was set to work discharging the coal. 'An employer, under such circumstances, owes one who is about to enter his service no duty to inspect all the work which has been done by his servants previously, and which may ordinarily be intrusted to them without liability to his fellow servants.'"

In Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874, the defendant did not furnish suitable and sufficient ropes for holding up the platform, etc., for loading paving blocks on a vessel, but it was recognized in that case (90 Me. 115) that, where "the master does not undertake the duty of furnishing or adapting the appliances by which the work is to be performed, but this duty is intrusted to or assumed by the workmen themselves within the scope of their employment, he is exempt from responsibility, if suitable materials are furnished and suitable workmen are employed by him, even if they negligently do that which they then undertake." Also, at page 116 of 90 Me. that, "when the selection of materials or construction of the appliances to the business is such that it may properly be left to the workmen in their capacity as workmen and within the scope of their employment, and it is so left by the master, he is relieved from responsibility for their negligence as in the case of a mason or carpenter building a house where in the progress of the work a staging is being frequently changed or enlarged."

In Beal v. Bryant, supra, the defendant did not furnish suitable or sufficiently strong ropes for holding up the platform used in discharging coal from a vessel; but the court in that case said, by way of caution: "The adjusting and securing the platform in place was incidental to and a part of its contemplated use, one of the ordinary duties of the workmen and a part of the work which they were engaged to do. In doing this they acted as fellow servants of the plaintiff, and the defendants would not be liable for their negligence in the manner of doing it."

In Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. 98 Me. 353, 64 L.R.A. 551, 57 Atl. 85, a movable ladder, furnished by the defendant for the plaintiff, its employee, to stand upon while at work, was decayed and fell under his weight. Had the ladder fallen because not properly set up, or properly secured at top or bottom by a fellow workman of the plaintiff, the case would have been like this, and it is evident the master would not have been responsible.

It follows that the defendant in this case is not shown to be responsible for the plaintiff's hurt, and that he must look to those whose negligence was the cause. Atkins v. Field, 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375.

Exceptions overruled.

WILLIAM G. MCINTYRE et al.

(199 Mass. 436, 85 N. E. 426.)

Assignment for creditors — sale of property — rights of assignor.

1. An assignor for creditors cannot complain that the property was sold to a corporation for shares of its stock where the Case Note. — Right of assignor to complain of sale made by assignee for creditors.

An extended search fails to disclose any other cases passing on the question whether or not an assignor has the right to complain of a sale made by the assignee, under conditions similar to those in WHITMAN v. MCINTYRE; that is, where the assets of the assignor were admittedly insufficient to meet the outstanding claims of the creditors, and the latter themselves had agreed to take the proceeds of the sale in payment of their respective claims.

Nor have very many cases been found where the circumstances were somewhat more favorable to the assignor; that is, where the assets exceeded the liabilities, or where, in other words, he still had a pecun-property was not sufficient to satisfy in full the demand of creditors, and they consented to take the stock in payment of their claims.

Same — breach of trust.

2. An assignor for creditors cannot set aside a sale for the property to a corporation because an agent of the assignee, who was managing the property, was a stockholder in the purchasing corporation, and, before the deed was executed, he increased his holdings out of stock issued to pay for the property, and one of the assignees became a stockholder, and both were elected directors of the purchasing corporation,— lary interest in the property. It would seem, however, that, where the assignor still has an interest in the property and a possibility of there being a balance in his favor, there can be very little doubt as to his right to complain of a sale made by the assignee, if such sale was contrary to his interests.

In Bush v. Halsted, 121 App. Div. 538, 106 N. Y. Supp. 133, where attorneys of a trustee to whom an insolvent had made an assignment for the benefit of creditors conducted the sale of property in such a manner that it should be for the joint benefit of themselves and the purchaser, it was held that the invalidity of the sale might be asserted by the insolvent as well as by the trustee, since the former's assignment provided for the return to him of any surplus after payment of the creditors, besides there being by statute a reverter to him.

In Glenn v. Mickey, 130 Pa. 586, 18 Atl. 939, where assigned real estate was sold as a whole for a price less than the amount of the bids from responsible bidders in parcels, the conveyance thereof was restrained, and a resale ordered at the instigation of the assignor.

In Graves v. Long, 87 Ky. 441, 9 S. W. 297, it was held that a person who had assigned his property to a trustee for the benefit of creditors had such an interest in the property as entitled him to except to the report of its sale on the ground of non-compliance with a statute which, in effect, required property sold to be first valued, and allowed a redemption if it did not bring a certain fraction of that valuation.

Where, however, an assignor advises a purchaser to buy, and promises not to object to the sale if the land is struck down to him, and the purchaser thereupon does so and makes a part payment on the faith of the promise, the assignor is estopped from contesting the sale on the ground of inadequacy of price. Re Seybert, 5 Kulp, 172.

In Arcenaux v. His Creditors, 6 La. 6, it was held that an insolvent cannot complain of a judgment homologating a tableau of distribution presented by his syndics, and thereby defeat the distribution among his creditors of any sum of money in the syndics' hands, on account of irregularities in the sale of the surrendered property, of overcharge made by the syndics, or their failure to charge themselves with any sums at least where the assignor was insolvent, so that the trust was a creditors' trust, and they did not object to such proceeding.

Same — interest — burden of proof.

3. An assignor for creditors has the burden of showing that he is entitled to interest on funds which the assignee kept on deposit in the bank, and the amount of it.

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court of Hampden County for the opinion of the full bench of a suit to com-for which they are legally chargeable. The court said: "If the sale has been illegally conducted, it can only be set aside, and the property recovered, by a proper suit against proper parties; and we are not aware that the homologation of the tableau could preclude the insolvents, or affect any right to which this irregularity might give a rise, or to any claim he might have against the syndics after the creditors were all paid, if he could show that from their neglect in giving proper credits, or from illegal charges, they have destroyed or administered what he might be entitled to after his creditors are fully paid."

In McHenry v. McVeigh, 56 Md. 578, a person went into insolvency and conveyed his property to the trustee appointed by the court; the trustee made sale of the property under order of the court, and the same was ratified nisi; the order nisi was duly published; but, the purchaser and the insolvent petitioner having both filed objections to the ratification of the sale, the sale was set aside, and from this order the trustee appealed. The court, in reversing this order, said: "A sufficient case had not been made for this action. The purchaser had signed the memorandum of sale, and was bound for the price he agreed to give for the property. The creditors had none of them complained that the price was inadequate. The petitioner did complain, but he gave no reason for supposing the property would bring more at another public offer, or that the sale was not fair, and did not invite full competition. Had the order only suspended the final ratification of the sale for the period named, to give the petitioner an opportunity to secure the consent of his creditors to the withdrawal of the petition, and the reconveyance of the property to him, such action would have been unobjectionable. But the creditors had a vested interest in the property, through the trustee, and the sale that was effected, and their rights ought not to have been jeopardized, by subjecting them to possible loss, by the expenses of a new advertisement and a new sale, and the possible sale for a less sum. The trustee representing the creditors, and also personally interested as the bonded trustee, with right to fair compensation for his services, was in the proper discharge of his duty, and the exercise of an undoubted right to appeal from the decision made."

pel an accounting by the trustees under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry F. Buswell and J. M. Browne & Son for plaintiff.

Messrs. Spellman & Spellman. for defendants:

The plaintiff has no interest in the assets of the estate, and is entitled to no relief.

Morse v. Hill, 136 Mass. 60: Re Shotwell, 49 Minn. 170, 51 N. W. 909, 52 N. W. 1078; Nabours v. McCord, 97 Tex. 526, 80 S. W. 595; Leavell v. Leavell, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 889.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was reserved for the full court by a single justice on the pleadings, the master's report and supplemental report and the exceptions thereto, such decree to be entered "as equity may require."

The bill is a bill to compel an accounting by the defendants McIntyre, Callender, and Chapin as trustees under a deed and assignment made to them by the plaintiff for the benefit of his creditors, and by one Coats, who is alleged to have been wrongfully employed by them to carry on the business of the trust. It also seeks to set aside a conveyance made by the trustees to the Gowdy Distilling Company, the other defendant, and to have the property reconveyed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has deceased since the suit was begun, and it is prosecuted by his executor.

The principal part of the property conveyed to the trustees consisted of a distillery in Agawam carried on by the plaintiff under the name of the H. Porter Company, and of the personal property belonging to and connected therewith. The assignment provided, amongst other things, that the trustees could carry on the distillery if they could do so at a profit; and if, at the end of a year, they found that the condition of the estate was such that the debts could not be paid without a sale of the property, then they could sell it and convert it into money. The trustees came to the conclusion at the end of the year, and rightly, as the master has found, that the condition of the estate required that the property should be sold, and, after some negotiations, they sold the distillery to the Gowdy Distilling Company, receiving in payment therefor 200 shares of the capital stock of that company of the par value of $100 each. The plaintiff alleges, in substance, that the trustees did not conduct the business in a prudent and businesslike manner or in accordance with the terms of the trust: that they wrongfully agreed with Coats to carry on the business of the distillery; that the debts could have been paid or reasonably provided for without a sale of the distillery; that the sale to the distilling company was fraudulent and collusive and was voidable by reason of the fact that Chapin and Coats were directors and stockholders in that company; that the sale was not for money as, according to the terms of the assignment, it should have been; and that what was received for the sale and conveyance was much less than the value of the property conveyed. The plaintiff also contends that the trustees were negligent in not making some arrangement for payment by the banks where they were deposited of interest on the trust funds, and in not providing for the sale and application of certain collateral from which the dividends received were less than the rate of interest on the notes and demands secured by the collateral.

It will be seen that the most of these contentions and objections relate to matters of fact. In regard to such matters the master's findings will not be disturbed unless clearly erroneous. The master finds generally "that, in connection with the appointment of the attorneys, the conduct of the business, the sale of the distillery and other property, and the management of the trust generally, there was no actual fraud, bad faith, or collusion on the part of the defendants, or any attempt to profit in any improper way individually or collectively at the expense of the estate, or against the rights of the plaintiff." He finds more particularly in regard to the appointment by the trustees of the firm of E. M. Coats & Company as their agents and attorneys for the purpose of carrying on the distillery and managing the business, that the appointment was agreed to by Whitman, and that in making the appointment "the trustees acted wisely, in good faith and for the best interests of the estate, and, in the performance of the duties assigned to them, the said firm and the defendant Coats have dealt honestly with all parties concerned and without any improper advantage to themselves." We see nothing to impugn the correctness of these findings.

It cannot be said, we think, that the trustees managed the trust in an imprudent and unbusinesslike manner, and the master has not so found. The parties, and especially the plaintiff, may have been disappointed, as not infrequently happens in such cases, in their expectations as to the amount of the estate and what would be realized from it; but that furnishes no ground, of course, for holding the trustees liable. At the time the distillery was taken over by the trustees it was being operated at a loss, and was very much run down and out of repair. It was thought that, by making necessary repairs, it could be brought up to a state of efficiency and a profit made, and the trustees expended a considerable sum upon repairs. The master has found that the expenditure was necessary and proper. The trustees were disappointed in making a profit; but there is nothing to show that they did not exercise a sound business judgment in what they did, or that in selling the product or disposing of any of the other property the estate suffered any loss in consequence of what they did or omitted to do. We do not think, therefore, as already observed that it can be said that the trustees did not carry on the business in a prudent and business-like manner.

As to the sale to the Gowdy Distilling Company, the master finds that the stock of that company was worth at the time of the sale from $75 to $100 per share, and that the property conveyed did not exceed in value $20,000, including the good will and trademark, which he finds was once valuable, but, owing to changes in the conditions of business, had lost most of its value. He also finds that at no time would the assets have been sufficient to meet the outstanding claims of the creditors who had become parties of the third part to the assignment, and who, with the plaintiff, were the only parties interested in the sale, so as to leave any balance payable to the plaintiff. And he finds still further that the creditors aforesaid consented to the sale and agreed to take their proportional part of the stock on account of and in payment of their respective claims. As to them, therefore, the sale was in effect a sale for money, and the plaintiff has no just ground for complaint that the sale was for stock in the Gowdy Distilling Company, and not for money even if we assume that the sale could not otherwise be fairly regarded as a sale for money.

We see no ground on which the sale can be avoided by the plaintiff because of the relation of Coats and Chapin to the transaction. The general rule is well settled that a trustee cannot directly or indirectly himself be a purchaser of the trust property or derive any personal advantage or profit from the management of the estate. But in the present case Coats occupied no fiduciary relation whatever to the plaintiff, and, so far as he acted as agent and attorney for the trustees, the master has found, as already observed, that he dealt honestly with all parties concerned. Chapin was trustee under the assignment; and, if he had purchased the property for himself directly or indirectly, or for the bank of which he was cashier, the plaintiff could have the sale set aside, or, if he had derived any personal profit or advantage from the management of the estate, he could be compelled to account for it. But the sale was not to Chapin nor to the bank, but was to the distilling company. The terms of sale were agreed upon between the trustees and the directors of the distilling company with the consent and approval of all other parties interested, except the plaintiff. Chapin was not a director of, or a stockholder in, the distilling company at the time when the terms of the sale were agreed upon. He was elected a director before the deed was executed, presumably to represent the interests of his bank which was a creditor and of other creditors, and he became a stockholder. Coats, who was a stockholder in the distilling company and a large creditor of the plaintiff, was also elected a director at the same time. The master does not find that it was understood and agreed as a part of the terms of the sale that Chapin should become a stockholder in and should be elected a director of the distilling company, and we are not called upon, therefore, to consider what the effect if any of such a finding would be. The sale could not be carried through unless the capital stock of the distilling company was increased; and at some time, it does not appear, when, except that it was before the execution of the deed, Chapin and Coats undertook to provide for $5,000 of this increase, and Chapin agreed to take personally some of the stock. Coats took $2,500 of the $5,000, and Chapin the balance, which he obtained from his bank. Subsequently, on a final settlement of the matter between him and the bank, the bank took 20 shares of the stock and Chapin took the remaining 5, for which he paid the bank. There is nothing we think in these transactions or in the other circumstances attending the sale, which gives the plaintiff the right to have the sale avoided. The trustees sold the property as they had the right and it was their duty to do. The sale was approved by all parties interested except the plaintiff. He was not consulted,—possibly because his condition was such that it would have been useless to consult him. There is no reason to believe, if that is material, that the failure to consult him operated to his detriment. The trustees did not advertise the property, but there is nothing to show that it could have been sold on any more favorable terms, or that all parties concerned acted otherwise than in entire good faith. The master finds that, at the date of the assignment, Whitman was insolvent, and that at no time since have the assets been sufficient for the payment of

W. in said real estate was conveyed through a third person to the petitioner.

The question is as to the meaning of said deed of Lucius Simonds. A cardinal rule in the interpretation of conveyance is that every deed should be so construed as to give effect to the intent of the parties, unless inconsistent with some rule of law or repugnant to the terms of the grant. Packard v. Old Colony R. Co. 168 Mass. 92, 46 N. E. 433. The first step, then, is to ascertain the meaning of the words used in the deed. In our present republican civilization, where primogeniture does not prevail, the mind does not readily adjust itself to a purely arbitrary preference of older to younger children. In the absence of some particular reason, the custom of people, as well as the provision of the statutes, is for an equal division among children. To the ordinary understanding the meaning conveyed by the language of the habendum clause is that the son is to have an estate for life, and that thereafter all his children, grandchildren of the grantor who reach the age of twenty-one years, regardless of the time when any one of them may attain majority, shall share equally. If after the words, "age of twenty-one years," there had been inserted the words, "whether before or after the death of the said Charles A.," there could be no possible dispute as to the meaning of the grantor. Yet these words only accentuate the meaning which the expression actually employed conveys in the common conception of mankind. One way to test the meaning of the language used is to suppose that, immediately after the delivery of the deed, Charles A. Simonds had died. If this event had thus happened, there would then have been no one of his children of a sufficient age to become immediately entitled to the estate. If it be assured that a contingent remainder is created, in the case supposed, it must fail and the estate revert, for the reason that a contingent remainder must take effect immediately upon the termination of the prior estate, or fail altogether. It is plain, therefore, that the deed cannot be construed as creating a contingent remainder in such children of Charles A. Simonds as shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, without wholly defeating, in the contingency suggested, the intent of the grantor. Another criterion of the signification of the words is to ascertain how they would be interpreted if found in a devise to trustees. No doubt can be entertained that in such an instrument it would be held that the children who reached majority, either before or after the termination of the life estate, would take. Astley v. Micklethwait, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 59. But further language of the deed is decisive that it was not intended to create a contingent remainder. The grantor, in the body of the instrument, at the close of the description, reserves to himself for his life the right to cut wood and timber on the granted premises, and, as a part of the habendum clause, expressly states that neither he nor those claiming under him by grant or descent have "any estate, right, title, or interest of, in, or to the aforesaid premises, with the appurtenances, except as aforesaid." The position and subject-matter of this clause show that it refers only to the reservation excepted out of the conveyance and immediately preceding the habendum clause. Hence the intent of the grantor is made clear by emphatic phrase, that no possibility of reversion is left in himself. But, if it be held that a contingent remainder was created by the deed, and Charles A. Simonds had died before any of his children had attained majority, there would then be a reversion of the entire estate in the grantor, for the reason that it would not be possible for the remainder to take effect instantly on the termination of the prior estate. But this would be directly contrary to the express terms of the deed.

It is perhaps possible that the intent of the grantor may be given effect by holding that the deed created a vested remainder in all children of Charles living at the delivery of the deed, subject to open and let in after-born children, and to be devested by death during minority. Riley v. Garnett, 3 De G. & S. 629; Bromfield v. Crowder, 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 313; Edwards v. Hammond, 3 Lev. 132; Muskett v. Eaton, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 435; Jull v. Jacobs, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 703; Pearks v. Moseley, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 714; Blanchard v. Blanchard, 1 Allen, 223. See, however, Inman v. Rolis [1893] 3 Ch. 518. But it is not necessary to place the decision upon this ground, or to strain the language from its natural import to effectuate the intent of the instrument. Nor are we required to discuss Festing v. Allen, 12 Mees. & W. 279, and analyze the many cases in which it has been followed or criticized. See Cunliffe v. Branker, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 393; Browne v. Browne, 3 Smale & G. 568; Patching v. Barnett, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665.

On other reasoning, the intent of the grantor can be carried into effect.

The granting clause of the deed is in the ordinary form of a quitclaim deed, and is adapted to a conveyance to uses. It is to "Charles A. Simonds, his heirs and assigns." This conveyed the fee. The habendum clause grants a life estate to Charles A. Simonds with an estate in fee to such of his children as attain majority. This is an attempt to create one estate in fee simple to commence in the future at the time of an occurrence not sure to come to pass, that is on their reaching twenty-one upon another estate in fee simple. This can be done by way of a use. No set form of words is required in a conveyance to uses, and the present deed is not wholly inapt, even if this were the precise intent of the draftsman. Leonard v. Southworth, 164 Mass. 52, 41 N. E. 126; Thatcher v. Omans, 3 Pick. 521; Carr v. Richardson, 157 Mass. 576, 32 N. E. 958. The use was not immediately executed by the statute of uses, for the reason, as before pointed out, that the grantor contemplated the possibility of a gap intervening between the termination of the life estate in his son and the commencement of the fee in his grandchildren. It was possible that none of the latter might have been in position to take at the termination of the life estate. It would then have operated probably as a springing use, not coming into existence in derogation of any other estate, nor necessarily at the termination of the first estate created by the deed, but upon the happening of an independent though uncertain future event, namely, when any of the class named reached the age answering to the description of the cestui que use and were thus able to take. It has turned out to be the fact that it was not possible, at the termination of the life estate, to determine all who might ultimately answer the terms of the description, although two were then certain. It must operate, therefore, as a shifting use. The fee vested in Charles A. Simonds and his heirs and assigns to hold first for the use of Charles A. Simonds during his life, and then for the use of such of his children as should attain majority. When all who constitute this class are finally determined the use shifts to them in fee, being executed by the statute of uses. Second Cong. Soc. v. Waring, 24 Pick. 304; Re Lechmere, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 524; Miles v. Jarvis, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 633; Dean v. Dean [1891] 3 Ch. 150; Blackman v. Fysh [1892] 3 Ch. 209; Re Wrightson [1904] 2 Ch. 95.

There is nothing at variance with this view in the well-settled rule that a limitation, if it can so operate, is to be construed as a remainder, and not as an executory devise, even if the rule be conceded to apply with equal force to springing and shifting uses. That rule is adduced to give effect to the intent of the maker and carry out the terms of the instrument. Its invocation here could only thwart that intent and defeat those terms. Hence it has no application. Nor is the use of the word "remainder" in the habendum clause decisive that a technical remainder was intended. The whole clause must be construed together, in order to ascertain its sense, and its true significance must be declared even though a popular rather than a strict meaning be attached to particular words. Dole v. Keyes, 143 Mass. 237, 9 N. E. 625.

Exceptions overruled.

ADDIE SHIGLEY, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF WASECA, Resp.

(— Minn. —, 118 N. W. 259.)

Municipal corporations — powers — legislative control.

1. Municipal corporations are created by the legislature as proper and convenient agencies in the work of government. Their powers, duties, and liabilities, in so far as they relate to governmental matters, are subject to legislative regulation and control.

Same — streets — negligence.

2. The liability of a municipality to individuals for damages for injuries caused by the negligence of the municipal authorities to keep the streets in proper repair arises out of the fact that it has the exclusive control of the streets, and has the power to provide the means for the proper performance of the duty of keeping them in safe condition.

Same — liabilities — legislative regulation.

3. The legislature may relieve a public corporation from such liability, or it may impose or recognize the liability upon such conditions as it thinks advisable. When conditions are thus imposed, an action cannot be maintained without showing performance of the conditions.

Same — defective streets — notice — legislative regulation.

4. The legislature may legally provide that ten days' written notice to the city, prior to the accident, of the existence of a defect in a street or sidewalk, shall be a condition precedent to liability for damages caused thereby to individuals.

Same — liabilities — municipal regulation.

viduals caused by the defective condition of a street or sidewalk is a matter which belongs properly to the government of municipalities, and may be determined and regulated in a home-rule charter.

(November 13, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Waseca County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by a defective sidewalk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. S. Maloney and John J. Isker, for appellant:

The charter provision is unconstitutional and void as being in contravention of the public policy and the laws of the state.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal from an order sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of a defective sidewalk presents the question of the validity of a provision in the home rule charter of the city of Waseca, adopted in May, 1904, pursuant to chapter 238, p. 349, Gen. Laws 1903, enacted under the authority of § 36 of article 4 of the state Constitution.

The complaint does not allege that written notice of the defect in the sidewalk had been given the city prior to the accident. The city charter provides that "said city shall be absolutely exempt from liability to any person for damages for injuries suffered or sustained by reason of defective streets or sidewalks within said city, unless actual notice in writing of such defect in said streets or sidewalks shall have been filed with the city clerk within, at least ten days before the occurrence of such injury or damage. In the absence of such notice, the city shall not be liable for any injury or damage on account of such defects, and in all cases such notice shall describe with particularity the place and nature of the defects of which complaint is made." The effect of this provision is to charge the city with liability only for accidents which occur after it has had ten days' actual written notice of the existence of the defect.

Municipal corporations, including chartered municipalities, are agencies in the work of government. They are created by the legislature, and to them it delegates certain clearly defined portions of the sovereign power. Except as restrained by constitutional provisions, these auxiliary agencies of government are under the absolute control of the legislature. Powers and duties may be imposed and taken away at the legislative will. The duty of caring for the streets and highways rests primarily upon the legislature of the state. It has, however, always been customary, as a matter of convenience and in the interest of good administration, to delegate to municipalities, counties, and townships the duty of overseeing and caring for the highways and streets within their limits. This arrangement is purely optional with the legislature. The duty is a governmental one, and the rule is almost universal that public quasi corporations, such as counties and townships, are not liable to individuals for damages resulting from the careless and negligent manner in which the duty of caring for the highway is performed. Probably the same rule applied to chartered municipalities under the English law, and certainly such is the rule at the present time in the New England states. But in the Central and Western states chartered municipalities are now held liable for damages resulting to individuals from defects in streets of which they had actual or constructive notice for such a time as to justify the conclusion of negligence. In a few states this liability is imposed by statute, while in many others it is held to exist independently of statute. Various theories have been advanced to support this liability. Thus, it has been often said that when a municipal corporation accepts a charter, by which it acquires special powers and privileges in return for its assumption of some of the duties which rest primarily upon the legislature, its relation to the legislature becomes in that respect contractual, and for the violation of the duty which it has contracted to perform it is liable for damages thereby resulting to individuals. This theory is not very satisfactory, and probably the liability might better be said to arise out of the fact that the municipality has the exclusive control of the streets and highways within its limits, with power to provide means for the proper performance of the duty of keeping them in safe condition.

The liability, then, is inferred or implied from the imposition upon the corporation of duties accompanied by the power and authority necessary for the proper performance of such duties. The legislature may delegate the power over streets and highways to municipalities, or it may create a special body within the municipality and vest it with full power over the streets. Manifestly, by virtue of its plenary power over the highways and over all the agencies of government which it has created, it may properly determine whether such agencies shall or shall not be liable to individuals for damages resulting from the careless and negligent manner in which such delegated duties are performed. An individual has no right of action against the state for its failure to construct and maintain the highways in proper condition, and, as against the will of the state, he has no greater right against an agency of the state to which it has delegated the performance of such duties. But the state may, if it chooses, authorize a right of action if the municipality neglects the proper performance of its duties; and, as we have seen, an intention to authorize such an action is inferred when a chartered municipality is given full power of control over the streets and highways within its limits. A right of action against the municipality is thus a matter of legislative favor, and may be granted absolutely or conditionally. When it has been held to exist by implication, it may be taken away by the legislature, without violating any constitutional right of the individual. Obviously, then, the right of action may be made to depend upon compliance with certain conditions.

We are familiar with provisions which require the giving of a notice of a claim for damages which shall describe the time, place, and manner of the action, and compliance with this condition has always been held necessary to the maintenance of an action. It is also the settled rule that, in an action against a municipality, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that the municipality had notice of the existence of the defect for such a time prior to the action as is necessary to make the failure to repair negligence. Ordinarily this notice may be actual or constructive, but in some instances the legislatures have thought it advisable, in order to protect the municipalities from the results which sometimes follow the application of the doctrine of constructive notice, to provide that actual notice of the existence of the defect must be shown to have been given the municipal authorities. The statute considered and sustained in Hurley v. Bowdoinham, 88 Me. 293, 34 Atl. 72, made it incumbent upon one injured by reason of a defective culvert in a highway to prove, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action, that the proper municipal officers of the town had twenty-four hours' actual notice of the defect. A former statute had required the plaintiff to show that the town had "reasonable notice of the defect," and by the amendment "the legislature manifestly designed to prescribe a more definite requirement respecting notice and impose a more rigorous limitation upon the traveler's right to recover for injuries received." See also Rogers v. Shirley, 74 Me. 144; Smyth v. Bangor, 72 Me. 249; Gurney v. Rockport, 93 Me. 360, 45 Atl. 310. The statute considered in Allen v. Cook, 21 R. I. 525, 45 Atl. 148, provided that a city should not be liable for injuries to persons or property caused by snow or ice obstructing any part of its highways, unless notice in writing of the existence of the particular obstruction had been given to the surveyor of highways at least twenty-four hours before the injury was caused. This statute was held to exempt the city from liability, except in cases where the notice was given as required. In Houston v. Vatter, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 298, 74 S. W. 806, a provision in the legislative city charter that the city should not be liable to any person for damages caused by defects in the streets unless such defect had remained for ten days after special notice in writing to the mayor or street or bridge committee was held valid. "While this provision of said charter," said the court, "may appear to be unreasonable in its sweeping and stringent restriction of the liability of the city for injuries caused by its negligence, it is plain and unambiguous in its terms, and stands as an insuperable barrier against any recovery by the plaintiff in this case, since the undisputed evidence shows that the requisite notice of the defective condition of the crossing was not given and the unsafe condition was not due to any affirmative act on the part of the city."

The effect of such requirements has been fully considered by the courts of New York. The statute under consideration in McNally v. Cohoes, 127 N. Y. 350, 27 N. E. 1043, provided that the city should not be liable unless actual notice of the defective condition of the street had been given to the proper authorities at least twenty-four hours previous to the injury. It was held that the purpose of this statute was to prevent recovery upon constructive notice, and that there could be no recovery in any case unless the statute was complied with. See also Smith v. Rochester, 79 Hun, 174, 29 N. Y. Supp. 539, 1d. 150 N. Y. 581, 44 N. E. 1128. The question of the constitutionality of a statute requiring such notice was fully considered in MacMullen v. Middletown, 187 N. Y. 37, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391, 79 N. E. 863. It was held that the duty imposed upon a municipality to care for its streets and sidewalks is governmental, and not private or local, in its nature; that liability to individuals for the failure to properly perform the duties may be created or denied by the legislature; and that, if created, its enforcement may be surrounded by any conditions or restrictions which the legislature chooses to impose. A city charter which imposed upon the common council the duty of keeping the streets in good order, and provided that no civil action should be maintained for damages for injuries to the person, sustained in consequence of the existence of snow or ice upon any sidewalk or street, unless written notice thereof relating to the particular place was actually given to the common council, and there was a failure or neglect to cause such snow or ice to be removed or the place otherwise made reasonably safe within a reasonable time after the receipt of such notice, was held constitutional, as the legislature had power to provide that the liabilities should be conditional upon the notice in writing being given.

In Goddard v. Lincoln, 69 Neb. 594, 96 N. W. 273, it was held that, as the liability of the city for injuries resulting from defective streets or sidewalks rests exclusively upon express or implied provisions of the statute, it was competent for the legislature to provide against such liability or create it under such conditions and limitations as it saw fit to impose. The statute which provided that cities of the first class should not be held liable for such injuries unless notice in writing of the defect had been given to the city clerk at least five days before the accident occurred, was held not to contravene the provisions of the constitutional Bill of Rights, which guaranteed to every person a remedy for any injury done to him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation. "It was competent," said the court, "for the legislature to relieve such cities from the duty of maintaining their walks, and from all liability for injuries resulting from their unsafe condition. If the right to recover for such injuries might have been withheld entirely, one seeking to recover for such injuries certainly cannot complain of the conditions with which the legislature has seen fit to accompany the right."

It is thus clear upon principle and authority that the legislature may grant or deny to individuals a right of action against municipal corporations for injuries resulting from the negligent manner in which streets and highways are maintained. Having this power, it may grant the right of action upon any conditions which it chooses to prescribe. It may therefore provide that the city shall not be liable unless it has had actual notice of the existence of the defect in the street for a designated or reasonable time before the accident. It follows that the legislature may determine the manner in which such notice shall be given, and that a general statute enacted by the legislature which contained the provision which we have quoted from the charter of the city of Waseca would be constitutional.

The question then remains whether the provision in question is one which may properly be placed in a home-rule charter enacted under legislative and constitutional authority. The power to frame a city charter, which is granted by the Constitution, extends to all powers properly belonging to the government of municipalities, and this necessarily includes all subjects appropriate to the orderly conduct of municipal affairs. In State ex rel. Getchell v. O'Connor, 81 Minn. 79, 83 N. W. 498, and State ex rel. Ryan v. District Ct. 87 Minn. 146, 91 N. W. 300, it was held that the constitutional provisions contemplated that the legislature should prescribe limits within which such charters may be framed; that is, prescribe limits beyond which a charter may not go. Within such restrictions, the right to regulate any subject, which properly relates to municipal government is secured to the people of the particular locality. In State ex rel. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. District Ct. 90 Minn. 457, 97 N. W. 132, it was held that a provision in the charter of the city of Duluth requiring the presentation of all claims to the city council for adjustment and allowance was a proper subject for charter supervision, and "it would seem to follow logically that it was also proper to continue the subject, and provide the manner in which the determination of the city council allowing or disallowing a claim might be removed to the district court for judicial investigation and determination." In Grant v. Berrisford, 94 Minn. 45, 101 N. W. 940, 1133, it was held that the subject of contractors' bonds to secure the performance of contracts with a city and the payment of laborers and material, including the contents of the bonds and conditions and limitations as to their enforcement, was germane to the subject of municipal legislation and superseded the provisions of the general laws on the subject. In Peterson v. Red Wing, 101 Minn. 62, 111 N. W. 840, it was held that the subject of notice to a municipality of claims for damages incurred by reason of defects in the streets as a condition precedent to maintaining an action therefor was relevant to the subject of municipal legislation, and that the provisions of the charter with respect to that subject superseded the general law. The principle was also applied in Turner v. Snyder, 101 Minn. 481, 112 N. W. 868, where it was held that the provisions in the charter of Crookston upon the subject of local assessments for street improvements superseded the provisions of the general law.

There can, therefore, be no serious question as to the right to insert in a municipal home-rule charter a provision prescribing the conditions under which an individual may maintain an action against the city for personal injuries caused by the failure of the authorities to keep the streets and highways in proper condition. Under the common law of the state, a person so injured cannot recover damages unless he can prove that the municipality had notice of the defect. He may, however, establish this essential element of his right of action by facts which charge the municipality with constructive notice. This charter changes the general rule to the extent of requiring actual notice in writing. The written notice need not, of course, have been 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

given by the injured party. It does not relieve the city from liability in all cases, although it manifestly places a very serious obstacle in the way of the injured party. The policy of such a limitation may be open to serious question; but that is a matter to be determined by the legislature and the voters of the particular city. The legislature has not deemed it advisable to restrict the city in this respect, and, as the subject is clearly one proper for municipal legislation, the charter provision has the force and effect of a direct act of the legislature, and is therefore effective.

The order sustaining the demurrer is affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

BUFFALO COUNTY TELEPHONE COMPANY

v.

BART TURNER, Appt.

(— Neb. —, 118 N. W. 1064.)

Telephone — rent — payment — rule — reasonableness.

1. A rule of a rural telephone company that telephone rent must be paid six months in advance is reasonable; and a subscriber refusing to comply therewith is not entitled to service from the company.

Same — counterclaim.

2. Nor will the existence of a counterclaim or setoff asserted by the subscriber, a large part of which is exorbitant and illegal, justify him in demanding that he be given service without prepayment of charges as other subscribers pay.

Same — defective service — repairs.

3. A telephone subscriber is presumed to know that his telephone is liable to get out of order, and, if it is situated in the country, that some time may elapse before it can be repaired; and such subscriber is only entitled to a deduction from his bill subsequent to the expiration of a reasonable time after the company had notice of the trouble and failed to repair it.

Case Note.— Reasonableness of regulation of public service corporation requiring payment of rentals in advance.

The right of a telephone company to demand payment of rentals in advance is recognized in Malochee v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 49 La. Ann. 1690, 22 So. 922.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Buffalo County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin interference with plaintiff's telephone appliances. Affirmed as modified.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Fred A. Nye, for appellant:

A telephone system is a common carrier, and as such must serve the public and its subscribers with indiscriminate and impartial facilities for the transmission of intelligence.

State ex rel. American U. Teleg. Co. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 36 Ohio St. 296, 38 Am. Rep. 583; State ex rel. Webster v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404, 22 N. W. 237; Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. State. 55 Neb. 627, 45 L.R.A. 113, 76 N. W. 171; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 775.

If failure to pay is due to the company's refusal to render the patron the service he is entitled to, it affords no ground for the company to discriminate.

Mr. Warren Pratt, for appellee:

The telephone company had the right to adopt reasonable rules for the conduct of its business.

The requirement that the charges be paid six months in advance is not unreasonable.

But a rule of a water company requiring water rentals to be paid annually in advance is rendered unreasonable by a further requirement that one year's rent shall be paid in any event irrespective of the length of time water may be used. Rockland Water Co. v. Adams. 84 Me. 472, 30 Am. St. Rep. 368, 24 Atl. 840.

So, a rule requiring payment of semi-annual water rentals in advance is vitiated by a provision that thirty days' default therein will cause a discontinuance of serv-

The company did not have to allow any setoff, but was entitled to its rentals, and had the right to enforce payment thereof by discontinuing service.

Rushville Coö. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin, supra.

Root, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the telephone business in the vicinity of Kearney. Its stockholders, officers, and subscribers are farmers, who are served by connecting the phones with party wires which converge at Kearney and are there connected with a local switchboard owned, controlled, and operated by the Kearney Telephone Company. Plaintiff pays said company a fixed sum for connecting the phones of its subscribers to complete service. Plaintiff charges $1 per month, payable six months in advance, for the use of its phones. Plaintiff's business does not warrant the continuous employment of an electrician or mechanic to repair its phones, but, as repairs are called for, it disconnects the faulty instrument and has it repaired in Kearney. Defendant is a stockholder in and a customer of plaintiff. In June, 1905, his phone did not give satisfaction, and one of plaintiff's officers took it to Kearney for repairs. The instrument was not returned for a week, and defendant, at the suggestion of one of the plaintiff's directors, brought the instrument home with him one day when in Kearney on other business, and for this he insisted that he should receive from plaintiff $3 and an allowance of 25 cents for the week that he did not have the use of the phone. When the semiannual rental of $6 became due in January, 1906, defendant refused to pay it unless given credit for $3.25, and in March plaintiff disconnected defendant's phone. Defendant paid said rent, and there was no further difficulty until an attempt was made to collect the second installment of rent for said year. Defendant refused to pay because plaintiff would not alice, which will not be resumed until a charge of $1 is paid for turning on the water. American Waterworks Co. v. State. 46 Neb. 194, 30 L.R.A. 447, 50 Am. St. Rep. 610, 64 N. W. 711.

It is a reasonable regulation for a gas company to require, as a prerequisite, security or a deposit of money to secure the payment for gas to be consumed. Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479; Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. 52 Mich. 499, 50 Am. Rep. 266, 18 N. W. 236; Owensboro Gaslight Co. v. Hildebrand, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 983, 42 S. W. 351.

But such rule must apply equally to all applicants in order to be upheld. Owensboro Gaslight Co. v. Hildebrand, supra.

low him for the time his phone was out of commission, nor his charges for services hereinbefore referred to, plus a charge of $1.50 for reconnecting the phone in March, 1906. Defendant would not permit plaintiff's employee to take its phone out of his house. The employee disabled said instrument, and later the line from defendant's phone to the party wire was disconnected. Defendant repaired the phone, reconnected it with the party line, and insisted upon service through the switchboard of the Kearney company; and plaintiff brought this action for an injunction against defendant. The district court perpetually enjoined defendant from in any manner meddling with the appliances of plaintiff, and from making or permitting any connections of the phone in defendant's house with the lines of plaintiff, or from using said phone in connection with said lines. Defendant appeals.

1. It is apparent that neither party to this controversy is entirely without fault. Plaintiff is a public service corporation, and should render to each individual in situation to patronize it equal service and upon the same terms. Defendant was not notified that, if he did not pay his rental as demanded, the service would be discontinued, and the actual work of disconnecting was done after dusk and so adroitly in one instance that no one other than a skilled lineman could detect the severance of the lead wire. On the other hand, plaintiff is a small concern, evidently created for neighborhood accommodation, and not as a source of profit to its stockholders. Its resources are slender, and its ability to serve its customers and keep its plant in condition for efficient service depends upon prompt payment of the rentals charged. If a considerable fraction of its subscribers become contentious and refuse to pay the tolls and charges unless counterclaims for faulty service or for insignificant acts performed for its benefit are deducted from the rental, plaintiff would be without means to pay for switching charges and maintenance of its lines and instruments. Vanderberg v. Kansas City Missouri Gas Co. 126 Mo. App. 600, 105 S. W. 17; Rushville Coöp. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin, 27 Ind. App. 62, 59 N. E. 327. Although defendant was not specifically informed that, if he did not pay, he would not be permitted to receive service, we are of opinion that he did not know who was responsible for the discontinuance of the service and the reasons therefor.

Defendant's demand to be paid $3 for bringing the instrument from Kearney to his home was exorbitant, and was properly disallowed. It appears from the evidence that none of the other stockholders or the directors of the company had ever charged for like services, and, had defendant intimated that he did not intend to abide the custom, some other stockholder or one of the directors, all of whom resided in the neighborhood, would have returned the phone to his place. Also the demand for a rebate of 25 cents was uncalled for. A telephone subscriber must be presumed to know that the instrument is liable to get out of order, and, if situated in the country, that a reasonable time must pass to secure its repair. There is nothing in the record to warrant a holding that the delay of one week was unreasonable in the instant case; and, unless the delay was unreasonable, he would not have been entitled to any allowance for impaired service. Eastern Kentucky Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Hardwick, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 582, 106 S. W. 307. The subsequent charges are based upon the efforts of defendant, forcibly and against the will of plaintiff, and while defendant was in default in the payment of his rental for that very term of six months, to compel plaintiff to give him service; and we do not think that he is entitled to collect from plaintiff therefor.

Defendant insists that, as plaintiff had not formally adopted a rule that if subscribers did not pay in advance they would not be given service, the case of Rushville Coöp. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin, supra, does not apply. We are of opinion that, in the circumstances of all of the parties to this squabble, it was not necessary for plaintiff to prove the formal adoption of said rule. There is no evidence in the record to indicate that plaintiff arbitrarily discriminated against defendant, or that the same remedy would not have been applied to any other contumacious subscriber. Defendant occupies the unenviable distinction of being the only subscriber who absolutely refuses to pay for the use of a phone and service. Nor is this case within the principle of State ex rel. Webster v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 128, 52 Am. Rep. 404, 22 N. W. 237. In the cited case the relator had refused to pay an accrued charge and his phone had been taken out. He thereafter tendered the regulation charge for reinstalling said instrument, and it appeared that he was able, ready, and willing to pay according as other subscribers paid, and the rules of the respondent did not exact a prepayment of charges. In the instant case defendant is able, but neither ready nor willing, to pay the charges according to the rule of plaintiff; nor has he tendered the payment exacted from all subscribers alike.

2. In one particular the decree, we think, is erroneous. Plaintiff charges that defendant and members of his family, in the use of the phone, would take down the transmitter when other patrons on the party lines were called, and would listen to conversations not intended for them; that they would sing and whistle into the receiver, and break in on conversations between the other subscribers, and so conduct themselves as to become a nuisance. There is a general finding for plaintiff, and a perpetual injunction against defendant. There is not one scintilla of evidence to sustain the charges above referred to. The evidence shows that plaintiff maintains the only telephone service available for defendant, and he should not be precluded from its benefits if he will pay therefor. Defendant, by tendering $6 to plaintiff, will be entitled to telephone service for six months, and thereafter, by paying that sum twice a year, may have the continued use of plaintiff's telephone, provided that he and the members of his family conduct themselves within the reasonable rules of plaintiff in that use.

The decree should be modified, by finding in favor of defendant as to the charges of misconduct in the use of the telephone, and so that he may receive service from plaintiff by paying in advance every six months therefor and abiding by the reasonable rules of the corporation. As thus modified, the decree should be affirmed; and we so recommend.

Fawcett and Calkins, CC., concur.

Per Curlam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the decree in this case is modified, by finding in favor of defendant as to the charges of misconduct in the use of the telephone, and so that he may receive service from plaintiff by paying it $6 semi-annually in advance therefor and abiding the reasonable rules of said corporation. As thus modified, said decree is hereby affirmed.

Arbitration — third arbitrator — notice of action.

1. No valid award can be made without notice to the parties of the selection of the third arbitrator and of the time and place of meeting to make the award, where arbitrators who have failed to agree select a third arbitrator in accordance with the terms of the arbitration agreement.

Same — setting aside — effect.

2. The original rights of parties who have entered into an arbitration agreement are not affected by a judgment setting aside an award because the arbitrators acted without giving the necessary notice to the parties.

(November 11, 1908.)

Case Note. — Necessity of notice of appointment of umpire or third arbitrator, and of proceedings before him.

In Day v. Hammond, 57 N. Y. 479, 15 Am. Rep. 522, the distinction between an umpire and a third arbitrator, although the terms are used indiscriminately in many cases, is stated to be that the former acts in consequence of a disagreement of the original arbitrators and not in conjunction with them, the powers of the original arbitrators ceasing upon his appointment, while a third arbitrator acts conjointly with the original arbitrators.

And in either case, unless expressly waived, the parties are entitled to notice of the appointment of an umpire or third arbitrator, and to a rehearing before him; and an ex parte award by him will be void. Gaffy v. Hartford Bridge Co. 42 Conn. 143; Walker v. Walker, 28 Ga. 140; Byrne v. Usry, 85 Ga. 219, 11 S. E. 561; Daniel v. Daniel, 6 Dana, 93; Selby v. Gibson, 1 Harr. & J. 362, note; Day v. Hammond, 57 N. Y. 479, 15 Am. Rep. 522; Elmendorf v. Harris, 23 Wend. 628, 35 Am. Dec. 587; West Jersey R. Co. v. Thomas, 21 N. J. Eq. 205, for same case upon second and third appeal, 23 N. J. Eq. 431. 24 N. J. Eq. 567; Wheaton v. Crane, 27 N. J. Eq. 368; Re Grening, 74 Hun, 62, 26 N. Y. Supp. 117; Schmitt Bros. v. Boston Ins. Co. 82 App. Div. 234, 81 N. Y. Supp. 767; *Wood v. It was said in Haven v. Winnisimmet Co. 11 Allen, 377 that, "in the absence of any agreement or assent by the parties to the controversy dispensing with a full hearing by the umpire, it is his duty to hear the whole case and to make a distinct and independent award thereon as the result of his judgment. He stands, in fact, in the same situation as a sole arbitrator, and he is bound to hear and determine the case in like manner as if it had been originally submitted to his determination.

And, in Ingraham v. Whitmore, 75 Ill. 24, the court said that, unless a hearing before the umpire is expressly dispensed with, he must hear the evidence of the parties, as he stands in the position of a sole arbitrator; and the original arbitrators are not required to join with him in making an award.

By statute, in Texas, notice of the appointment of an umpire in an arbitration proceeding and a rehearing before him are APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Guilford County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to set aside an award. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

The facts necessary to a disposition of this appeal are: In an action pending in the superior court of Guilford county, A. L. Brooks, Esq., was duly appointed receiver of the estate of B. F. Fisher, deceased. In the discharge of his duties it became necessary for him to settle with the defendant John N. Staples a claim, presented by said defendant, against the estate of said Fisher, for professional services rendered said Fisher prior to his death. For the purpose of fixing the amount due said defendant, the receiver, with the assent of Mrs. Isabelle Fisher in her capacity of administratrix and individually, and said John N. Staples entered into an agreement in writing to submit the question "as to the amount said Staples is entitled to as counsel for the said Fisher," in certain litigation referred to, "and as counsel for Isabelle Fisher and her children after the death of said Fisher," to Clement Manly, Esq., and Judge R. C. Strudwick; "and, in the event the said Manly and Strudwick cannot agree upon the amount, they are empowered to choose a third arbitrator, and the award of a majority of them shall be the amount to which the said Staples shall be entitled." This agreement, bearing date April 12, 1906, is signed by the receiver.

required. Warren v. Tinsley, 3 C. C. A. 613, 2 U. S. App. 507, 53 Fed. 689.

An umpire's award, if made without notice to the parties of the proceedings and an opportunity given for a rehearing of the controversy, will be void, notwithstanding the award is based upon the evidence submitted to the original arbitrators. Taber v. Jenny, 1 Sprague, 315, Fed. Cas. No. 13,720; Frissell v. Fickes, 27 Mo. 557; Haven v. Winnisimmet Co. 11 Allen, 377, 87 Am. Dec. 723; Re Grening; Selby v. Gibson; Daniel v. Daniel; Byrne v. Usry; Wheaton v. Crane; and Coons v. Coons,—supra; Small v. Courtney, 1 Brev. 205; Falconer v. Montgomery, 4 Dall. 232, 1 L. ed. 813; Passmore v. Pettit, 4 Dall. 271, 1 L. ed. 830.

And this is true, notwithstanding the arbitrators and the umpire met together, and, in the presence of the parties, the arbitrators stated the evidence to the umpire. Falconer v. Montgomery and Passmore v. Pettit, supra.

So, an award of a third arbitrator is void if made without notice to the parties, notwithstanding he met with the original arbitrators and heard the evidence presented. Slater v. La Grande Light & P. Co. 43 Or. 131, 72 Pac. 738.

The selection of a third arbitrator, under a submission providing that the agreement of two shall be binding, does not authorize an award without notice to the parties and an opportunity to be heard. Linde v. Republic F. Ins. Co. 18 Jones & S. 362.

In Eaton v. Campbell, 8 N. S. 314, an award by an umpire in a proceeding under rule of court, rendered without notice to or hearing of the parties, was referred by the court to the umpire with instructions to cite the parties before him so as to enable them to be heard.

An award of an umpire will be set aside, when rendered in the absence of a party's witnesses, where notice to produce witnesses was given on Saturday at 4 P. M. and the hearing was to take place the following Monday morning. Proudfoot v. Trotter, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 163.

to hear his evidence avoids an award rendered upon the arbitrators' statement of the evidence. Re Salkeld, 12 Ad. & El. 767; Re Jenkins, 1 Dowl. N. S. 276.

And a demand of notice of the appointment of, and a hearing before, an umpire, if one shall be appointed, will render void an award by an umpire without such notice and rehearing. Chenowith v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 232.

So, the expressed desire of a party to be heard, if an umpire is appointed, vitiates an award of the latter rendered without an opportunity given the former to be heard. Ingraham v. Whitmore, 75 Ill. 24; Alexander v. Cunningham, 111 Ill. 511.

A protest against a third arbitrator rendering an award upon a statement of the evidence by the arbitrators, without notice to the parties, renders his subsequent award void. West Jersey R. Co. v. Thomas, 21 N. J. Eq. 205, for same case upon second and third appeal, 23 N. J. Eq. 431, 24 N. J. Eq. 567.

But an umpire's award is not invalidated by reason of his taking the evidence from the statements of the arbitrators, where, after his award was made, a party to the proceeding applied for a hearing before him, such request coming too late. Hall v. Lawrence, 4 T. R. 589.

The refusal of an umpire to hear a party's evidence will not vitiate an award where the submission provided that the evidence taken before the arbitrators might be the basis of his award. Re Firth, 19 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 169.

However, it has been held that an award rendered by an umpire will be valid, even though based upon the evidence submitted to the original arbitrators, where, with knowledge of his appointment, a party does not make application for a rehearing before him. Finney v. Miller, 1 Bail. L. 81; Sharp v. Lipsey, 2 Bail. L. 113; Re Tunne, 5 Barn. & Ad. 488; Knowlton v. Homer, 30 Me. 552.

And the doctrine just stated was applied where the submission provided that, upon the disagreement of the arbitrators, they might select a third, "who, either individu-

Colonel Staples, and by Mrs. Fisher. Pursuant to said agreement, the arbitrators met and heard testimony, examined papers, etc., submitted to them. One of them took notes of the evidence. After hearing the evidence and examining the papers, they failed to agree upon an award. Pursuant to the power conferred upon them, they selected R. B. Reid, Esq., as "a third arbitrator." Mr. Reid met with the other arbitrators at a time and place agreed upon. No notice was given the said receiver, Colonel Staples, or Mrs. Fisher of said meeting, or the time and place thereof. The two original arbitrators agreed that, as they had heard, all of the evidence, they would state the same to Mr. Reid, in the presence of each other. This was done, and an award was concurred in by Mr. Manly and Mr. Reid, to which Judge Strudwick declined to assent. The award fixing the amount to be paid Colonel Staples was drawn up and signed by Mr. Manly and Mr. Reid, April 18, 1908. Mr. Brooks, the receiver, before receiving notice of the award, through his partner paid a portion of the amount awarded to be due Colonel Staples. The plaintiff was, by order of the court, substituted as receiver in the place of Mr. Brooks, and brings this action to set aside the award, for that no notice was given to the parties of the time and place of the meeting of the arbitrators, after the selection of Mr. Reid as third arbitrator; and that Mr. Reid did not hear the evidence upon which he joined in the award. Defendant Staples contended that the award was valid, and, if not so, that it had been ratified by Brooks, receiver. The case was brought to trial, and, upon the issue directed to the validity of the award, his Honor charged the jury that, if they believe the evidence, they should answer the issue "No;" and, as to the issue in regard to the alleged ratification, that Brooks, receiver, had no power, after June term, 1906, to ratify the award, and there was no evidence of any ratification. The jury answered the issue as instructed, and judgment was rendered setting aside and vacating the award. To all of which defendant Staples duly excepted. He asked the court to instruct the jury, if they believed the evidence, to answer the issue "Yes." To the refusal to do so he excepted and appealed, assigning as error the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested, and the instructions given.

ally or in conjunction with the other two," should determine the controversy. Ranney v. Edwards, 17 Conn. 309.

The right to notice of the meeting of an umpire with the arbitrators is waived by a party presenting himself before them without objection; and the umpire may take the facts as found by the arbitrators, and need not call and re-examine the witnesses. Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. 58 S. C. 299, 36 S. E. 714.

So, a party waives his right to a rehearing when he informs an umpire that he is satisfied to have his determination rest upon the written evidence submitted to the arbitrators. Crabtree v. Green, 8 Ga. 8.

So, a party's statement to an arbitrator that he is advised not to attend before an umpire, together with the delivery to the former of a written statement to present to the umpire so that he will not overlook certain claims of the party, constitutes a waiver of the right to notice of the appointment of and proceedings before the umpire. Graham v. Graham, 9 Pa. 254, 49 Am. Dec. 557, same case on second appeal, 12 Pa. 128.

But the waiver of the right to be heard before an umpire will not be presumed. Alexander v. Cunningham, supra.

A party is not estopped by a delay of two weeks, during which he proceeded under an award, to assert its invalidity because he did not have notice of the appointment of and proceedings before an umpire, where, although he was dissatisfied with the award, he did not take steps to have it set aside, supposing he was bound by it. Wheaton v. Crane, 27 N. J. Eq. 368. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But a waiver by a party of his right to appear before the original arbitrators is not a waiver of his right to be heard before an umpire; and an award rendered by the latter without notice to the party is void. Re Martin, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 28, and Brown v. Lyddy, 11 Hun, 451.

There are cases holding that notice is unnecessary. Thus, an umpire, where the submission does not require a rehearing before him, may, if he thinks proper, take the disputed points upon the statement of the arbitrators, without a rehearing thereon. Blood v. Shine, 2 Fla. 127.

So, in Kile v. Chapin, 9 Ind. 150, the court said that, even when the umpire acts on the narration of the arbitrators without hearing the evidence, his award is good.

And a submission to two arbitrators with power to call in a third implies that a decision of two of them is to be binding; and an umpire may act upon a statement by the arbitrators as to the evidence, without calling witnesses thereto. Greenwell v. Embree, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 313. However, nothing appears in the opinion as to whether the parties had notice of the appointment of the third arbitrator.

But, notwithstanding an umpire may act upon a statement of the evidence by the original arbitrators, he cannot, where the parties are ignorant of his appointment and have no notice thereof, privately hear such statement and render an award thereon. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 449.

Messrs. John A. Barringer and William P. Bynum, Jr., for appellants:

The award was valid without notice of the time and place of leaving.

Zell v. Johnston, 76 N. C. 302.

Messrs. King & Kimball, Stedman & Cooke, and Justice & Broadhurst, for appellee:

The award was invalid and void because of the acts of the third arbitrator or umpire and of the original arbitrator, in not giving notice to, or hearing, the parties before passing judgment.

Elmendorf v. Harris, 23 Wend. 628, 35 Am. Dec. 587; Day v. Hammond, 67 N. Y. 479, 15 Am. Rep. 522; Briggs v. Smith, 20 Barb. 413; Jordan v. Hyatt, 3 Barb. 284; Kyd, Awards, 95; Russell, Power & Duty of Arbitrator, p. 228; Alexander v. Cunningham, 111 Ill. 511; Gaffy v. Hartford Bridge Co. 42 Conn. 143; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 24 N. Tilly, 1 Harr. & J. 361; 3 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 638, 639, 645, 653.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right of the plaintiff to the relief demanded, and the ruling of his Honor, depends upon the answer to questions, in regard to which there is no conflicting evidence. Does the failure of the arbitrators to notify the parties of the appointment of Mr. Reid as "third arbitrator," and of the time and place of their meeting with him to finally hear and determine the matters submitted to them, and the failure of Mr. Reid to hear the evidence from the witnesses, invalidate the award? The questions do not appear to have been decided by this court. In Russell, Arbitration, 3d ed. 320, cited with approval in Gaffy v. Hartford Bridge Co. 42 Conn. 143, it is said that it is the duty of the umpire to re-examine such witnesses as the parties choose to produce, and as to such points as they choose to raise, although the same witnesses have been examined as to the same points before the arbitrators. He may not take the evidence, or any part of it, from the notes of the arbitrators, unless there be a special provision in the submission, or a clear agreement between the parties permitting such a course. In Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 572, it is said: "When the new arbitrator was chosen, the complainants had the right to adduce additional testimony and additional arguments, and that, unless the right was clearly waived by their agreement or conduct, notice of the appointment of a third arbitrator and opportunity to be heard were essential preliminaries to a valid award. This doctrine is founded in natural justice, and is not denied to be law." Elmendorf v. Harris, 23 Wend. 628, 35 Am. Dec. 587; Alexander v. Cunningham, 111 Ill. 511; Day v. Hammond, 67 N. Y. 479, 15 Am. Rep. 522, in which it is said: "Parties are always entitled to a hearing before arbitrators, unless that hearing is waived; and that if an umpire or other arbitrator is called in, in case of disagreement, the same rule as to a right of rehearing applies. The waiver of this right must be distinct and unequivocal." In a well-considered opinion, reviewing the authorities, Keith, P., says: "We deduce from the authorities the general rule that, where two arbitrators who differ have the power to appoint a third, who shall have authority to decide between them, it is necessary to inform the parties in interest of his appointment and give them a reasonable opportunity to produce evidence before them touching the matters in controversy." Coons v. Coons, 95 Va. 434, 64 Am. St. Rep. 804, 28 S. E. 885. In 3 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 660, the editor says that, after a disagreement between the original arbitrators, the special arbitrator, acting with them, or upon his sole responsibility, may proceed to a consideration of the case as presented by the original arbitrators, and make an award thereon without hearing the evidence anew or additional evidence, unless such rehearing be specially requested by one of the parties or required by the terms of the submission; but he further says this rule does not apply unless the parties have been notified of the appointment of the special arbitrator or umpire, and of the proceedings by him, and have been accorded reasonable opportunity to make such demand. In the note he says: "In the absence of such notice and opportunity to be heard or to demand a rehearing no authority to proceed exists,"—citing numerous cases. Some distinction has been made between the duty and power of an umpire and a "third arbitrator." It is unnecessary to consider this question, because Mr. Reid was, by the terms of the submission, made "third arbitrator," and comes clearly within the decisions cited. Whether the award may be attacked for failure to give the notice and hear the evidence by the third arbitrator collaterally, or only by a direct proceeding to set it aside, is not presented upon this appeal. This is a direct proceeding for that purpose.

It is insisted that, however the question may have been decided in other jurisdictions, this court, in Zell v. Johnston, 76 N. C. 302, held the award valid. In that case Judge Rodman puts the decision on the ground that, conceding the rule as to notice, when the parties have presented their claims and evidence they are not entitled to notice of the time when the arbitrators will meet to consider and dispose of the case. He also says that the defendant clearly waived any other notice that he had. The decision is not in conflict with the uniform current of decisions on the question in other jurisdictions. His Honor's instruction on the first issue was clearly correct. We find no evidence of a ratification by the receiver, if it be conceded that he had the power to ratify, which is very doubtful. We concur with his Honor's instruction in that respect. It is conceded by all parties that the arbitrators, and each of them, acted in good faith, and no suggestion is made to the contrary. They inadvertently overlooked the necessity of notifying the parties of Mr. Reid's appointment, and the time and place of their meeting, to determine the matter submitted to them. We think that their course in that respect was in accordance with the custom with us, but the uniform current of authority is that notice must be given of the selection of the third arbitrator or umpire, and that the rule is founded in wisdom. Its observance secures to the parties an opportunity to present their evidence and arguments to the final arbiter of their rights, and tends to secure acquiescence in this mode of trial favored by the law, because it is inexpensive, expeditious, and usually works substantial justice. The gentlemen who consented to act and the "third arbitrator" were doubtless discharging "a friendly office," without compensation. The judgment of his Honor, for the reasons assigned, was correct. The other exceptions in the record are immaterial in the view which we take of the case.

Of course the parties, and their rights in respect to the subject-matter of the arbitration, are not affected by the award or the judgment setting it aside. They are relegated to their original status. It may be well enough to say that the form of his Honor's instruction to the jury does not conform to many decisions of this court; but, as there was no contradictory testimony, and no inference to be drawn from it contrary to the legal conclusion stated by his Honor, no harm could come to defendant.

The judgment must be affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

GARRETT YEAGER et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

JOHN P. TUNING et al.

(— Ohio, —, 86 N. E. 657.)

Easement — telephone line.

1. The right of an owner of an estate to erect and maintain, or to cause to be erected and maintained, a line of telephone poles over the estate of another for the benefit of the former, is an easement.

Same — creation.

2. An easement can be created only by deed or by prescription.

License — easement — distinction.

3. A parol agreement by several adjoining landowners to erect and maintain telephone poles on their respective lands, and to contribute equally to the expense of stringing wires thereon, and of operating a telephone line, does not create an easement, but is merely a parol license, and is revocable by any one of such owners, although in reliance thereon the poles have been erected and the line constructed.

Headnotes by the COURT.

Case Note. — Revocability of license to maintain burden on land after license has incurred expense.

This note does not include the cases on the question whether a license will ripen into an irrevocable right by lapse of time. As to void parol conveyance of an easement as foundation for easement by prescription, see case note to Lechman v. Mills, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 990.

As shown by the cases cited in the note to Pifer v. Brown, 49 L.R.A. 497, to which this note is supplemental, the weight of authority is that the incurring of expense in reliance upon a parol license to impose a burden upon the land of another will not prevent the revocation thereof. This doctrine has been applied to parol licenses to cast water upon the lands of the licensor,—Jones v. Stover, 131 Iowa, 119, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 154, 108 N. W. 112; Huber v. Stark, 124 Wis. 359, 109 Am. St. Rep. 937, 102 N. W. 12, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 340; to mine coal,—Entwhistle v. Henke, 211 Ill. 273, 103 Am. St. Rep. 196, 71 N. E. 990, affirming 113 Ill. App. 572; to erect or rest a structure upon land of the licensor,—Shipley v. Fink, 102 Md. 219, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 62 Atl. 360; Brown v. New York, 78 App. Div. 361, 79 N. Y. Supp. 943 (affirmed without opinion in 176 N. Y. 571, 68 N. E. 1115); Allerton v. Steele, 59 App. Div. 622, 69 N. Y. Supp. 594; Kommer v. Daly, 104 App. Div. 528, 93 N. Y. Supp. 1021; to build a railroad track upon licensor's land,—Johanson v.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gallia County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to compel the replacing of certain telephone poles and wires and for an injunction restraining further destruction or interference with such line, which had been appealed from the Court of Common Pleas after that court had also sustained the demurrer. Affirmed.

Statement by Summers, J.:

It is averred in the petition that the plaintiffs and the defendants mutually agreed orally to construct a telephone line over and across their respective lands and to their respective residences thereon to enable them to have telephonic communication with each other and with persons on other lines with which such line might be connected; that each agreed, at his own expense, to erect and maintain a certain number of poles, and that the plaintiffs and defendants agreed to contribute equally money to purchase and string the wires and to contribute equally sufficient money to repair and maintain the line; that the line was constructed as agreed; that it was of a permanent nature and of the value of $250; that each of the parties expended about $15 additional for telephone boxes and other appliances, and that the line was in use for about three years, and until shortly before the filing of the petition, when certain of the defendants cut the wires and cut down certain of the poles and rendered the line

Atlantic City R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 767, 64 Atl. 1061; to erect telephone poles in a highway where licensor owns the fee therein,—Andrews v. Delhi & S. Teleph. Co. 36 Misc. 23, 72 N. Y. Supp. 50 (affirmed without opinion in 66 App. Div. 616, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1129); Little v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 96 App. Div. 559, 89 N. Y. Supp. 136; to string telephone wires on poles of a telegraph company, where license is for no stated time.—Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carver (Tex. Civ. App.) 74 S. W. 55; to construct a sewer or drain over licensor's premises.—Pifer v. Brown, 43 W. Va. 412, 49 L.R.A. 497, 27 S. E. 399; Hicks Bros. v. Swift Creek Mill Co. 133 Ala. 411, 57 L.R.A. 720, 91 Am. St. Rep. 38, 31 So. 947; Fonda, J. & G. R. Co. v. Olmstead, 84 App. Div. 127, 81 N. Y. Supp. 1041; to maintain a dam,—Hicks Bros. v. Swift Creek Mill Co. supra.

So, the passive acquiescence by the licensor in the expenditure of a considerable sum of money by the licensee in the construction of an irrigating ditch will not prevent a revocation of a parol license by a grantee of the licensor. Ewing v. Rhea, 37 Or. 593, 52 L.R.A. 140, 82 Am. St. Rep. 783, 62 Pac. 790. This doctrine is applied in Fowler v. Delaplain (Ohio) 87 N. E. 200.

A parol license to connect a tile drain with that of the licensor which empties upon the land of another, even though executed, is revocable where the latter, as soon as he learns of such license, refuses longer to permit the licensor to empty water onto his land. Knoll v. Baker, 34 Ind. App. 124, 72 N. E. 480.

So, an executed license to connect with and empty water into a tile drain upon the licensor's land so long as it shall be satisfactory to the latter is revocable at pleasure. Thompson v. Normanden, 134 Iowa. 720, 112 N. W. 188.

And the court, in Turner v. Mobile, 135 Ala. 73, 33 So. 132, in holding a parol license to erect a wharf to be revocable notwithstanding the expenditure of money by the licensee in the erection thereof, said such a license is always revocable at pleasure, and neither imports title of any sort, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nor, when acted upon, involves any matter of estoppel in pais against the licensor.

A parol license to install a set of drug-store fixtures in the licensor's building, to remain permanently therein, and the rental therefrom to be divided between the licensor and the licensee, being within the statute of frauds, is revocable upon reasonable notice. Adams v. Weir (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 726.

A parol license that a wall of a building might remain upon the licensor's property until he demanded it is revoked by the death of the latter. Chaves v. Torlina (N. M.) 99 Pac. 690.

A parol license to impose a burden upon the land of another is revoked by a conveyance of the premises by the licensor. Smyth v. Brooklyn Union Elev. R. Co. infra. and Hicks Bros. v. Swift Creek Mill Co. supra.

Assuming that the interest or right in question is nothing more than a license, it would seem to be immaterial, so far as the question of revocability is concerned, whether it is created in writing or by parol, though the fact in that respect may affect the question whether the interest or right created is merely a license.

So, this doctrine of revocability has been applied to a written license to construct a switch track for the licensor's benefit.—Rodefer v. Pittsburg, O. V. & C. R. Co. 72 Ohio St. 272, 70 L.R.A. 844, 74 N. E. 183; and to a written license to maintain elevated tracks in a street the fee of which rests in the licensor.—Smyth v. Brooklyn Union Elev. R. Co. 121 App. Div. 282, 105 N. Y. Supp. 601; however, in the last case the court of appeals, in holding that the instrument in question created an easement and not a license, stated that the decision of the lower court would be correct if a license was created.—193 N. Y. 335, 85 N. E. 1100.

Thus, a written license to construct a side track upon the licensor's land, for his benefit, the licensee to have the right to remove it upon thirty days' notice, is revocable at the licensor's pleasure without reimbursing the licensee for his expenditures. Belzoni in places useless; and they pray for a mandatory order requiring the replacing of the poles and the restoring of the line, and for an injunction against the destruction or interference with the line in the future. The case went to the circuit court on appeal, where a demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed.

Mr. R. M. Switzer, for plaintiffs in error:

The right given by each of the parties on and over his premises, when acted upon, became as to him an irrevocable license in favor of all the other parties.

Messrs. H. C. Johnston and E. D. Davis for defendants in error.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the plaintiffs are entitled to a specific performance of the agreement, then they have an easement created by parol in the lands of the defendants. An easement is a

Oil Co. v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (Miss.) 47 So. 468.

The court observed, in the case last cited, that, even when based upon a valuable consideration, or when great expense had been incurred by the licensee, it had declined to follow the rule that such a license was thereby rendered irrevocable. To the same effect, see Kommer v. Daly, supra.

There are cases, however, holding that the expenditure of money in reliance upon a license to impose a burden upon the licensor's land thereby renders it irrevocable whether created by parol or in writing. Thus, this doctrine has been specifically applied to a written license to construct a telegraph line upon a railroad right of way,—Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 68 L.R.A. 968, 64 C. C. A. 285, 129 Fed. 849; to a written license to erect a retaining wall upon licensor's land,—Patterson v. Burlington (Iowa) 119 N. W. 593; to a written license, for a valuable consideration, to construct a tram road,—Hiers v. Mill Haven Co. 113 Ga. 1002, 39 S. E. 444; to a parol license to construct an irrigation ditch,—Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. 516, 113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 83 Pac. 808, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 704; to a parol license, for a valuable consideration, to use a stairway on licensor's land in order to obtain access to the licensee's building,—Dodge v. Johnson, 32 Ind. App. 471, 67 N. E. 560; Kastner v. Benz, 67 Kan. 486, 73 Pac. 67; to a parol license to dig a ditch in order to drain land purchased from the licensor, the licensee making valuable improvements upon his land in order to enjoy the license,—Brantley v. Perry, 120 Ga. 760, 48 S. E. 332.

A parol license to construct a drain over, and to cast refuse from a creamery upon, the licensor's land, which also benefits the latter by draining a portion of his land, becomes irrevocable when the licensee expends money upon his own and the licensor's land in reliance upon the license. Ruthven v. Farmers' Co-op. Creamery Co. (Iowa) 118 N. W. 915.

A license to construct and maintain a spur track over land of the licensor for his benefit in removing timber therefrom, to continue until the timber on adjoining land may be removed, is not revocable as soon as the timber has been removed from the licensor's land; but will continue no longer than is necessary to remove the timber contemplated when the license was granted. Sumpter R. Co. v. Gardner, 49 Or. 412, 90 Pac. 499.

So, a parol license to dump débris from a mine upon licensor's property, even though the licensee claims to have expended a large sum of money in improving his property upon the faith thereof, is revocable at pleasure, where it does not appear but that he may have been amply remunerated for his outlay by valuable mineral obtained from his mine, notwithstanding the rule adopted by the court is that valuable improvements upon the strength of a parol license render it irrevocable. Miser v. O'Shea, 37 Or. 231, 82 Am. St. Rep. 751, 62 Pac. 491.

But, as the right to recover damages for the destruction of a tile drain by a licensor exists only by reason of the fact that the licensee has incurred expense thereunder, a recovery of damages by the licensee is a revocation of the license; and he cannot afterwards insist that the license is irrevocable. Oster v. Broe, 161 Ind. 113, 64 N. E. 918.

It was held in Dawson v. Western Maryland R. Co. 107 Md. 70, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 809, 68 Atl. 301, that the doctrine that equity will not permit the revocation of a license without compensating the licensee for his expenditures does not apply to the assignees of the licensee, who acquire no right under the license by the transfer to them of the licensee's property.

As to the effect of a license to display advertisement or sign on walls of a building, see case note to Levy v. Louisville Gunning System, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 359.

As to the effect of the incurrance of expense under a parol license to drain water upon licensor's property, see case note to Jones v. Stover, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 154.

As to the time in which a building may be removed after the revocation of a parol license, see case note to Shipley v. Fink, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002.

right without profit, created by grant or prescription, which the owner of one estate may exercise in or over the estate of another for the benefit of the former. A license is a personal, revocable, and nonassignable privilege, conferred either by writing or parol, to do one or more acts upon land without possessing any interest therein. Greenwood Lake & Pt. J. R. Co. v. New York & G. L. R. Co. 134 N. Y. 435, 31 N. E. 874. Section 4198, Rev. Stat., provides that "no lease, estate, or interest, either of freehold or term of years, or any uncertain interest of, in, or out of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be assigned, or granted, except by deed, or note in writing, signed by the party so assigning or granting the same, or his agent thereunto lawfully authorized, by writing, or by act and operation of law." This statute would seem to settle the question of the right to a decree for specific performance against the plaintiffs; but it is contended that it is the well-settled law of this state that such an agreement is a parol license, and that such license, when executed, is irrevocable. Mr. Freeman in a note to Lawrence v. Springer, 31 Am. St. Rep. 705-715; says: "At common law a parol license to be exercised upon the land of another creates an interest in the land, is within the statute of frauds, and may be revoked by the licensor at any time, no matter whether or not the licensee has exercised acts under the license, or expended money in reliance thereon. In many of the states this rule prevails, while in others the licensor is deemed to be equitably estopped from revoking the license, after allowing the licensee to perform acts thereunder, or to make expenditures in reliance thereon. These two lines of cases cannot be reconciled; for one of them holds that an interest in land cannot be created by force of a mere parol license, whether executed or not, while the other declares that, where the licensee has gone to expense, relying upon the license, the licensor may be estopped from revoking it, and thus an easement may be created. The former line of cases, it seems to us, is founded upon the better reason. They decide that a parol license to do an act on the land of the licensor, while it justifies anything done by the licensee before revocation, is revocable at the option of the licensor; and this although the intention was to confer a continuing right, and money has been expended by the licensee upon the faith of the license. Such license cannot be changed into an equitable right on the ground of equitable estoppel." To the same effect are Browne, Stat. of Fr. § 31; Jones, Easements, § 84; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. 666.

In Lawrence v. Springer, 49 N. J. Eq. 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

289, 31 Am. St. Rep. 702, 24 Atl. 933, Beasley, Ch. J., says: "It has not been, and it cannot be, denied that such a grant as the one in question cannot be enforced in a court of law. Such easements, being incorporeal, lie in grant, and their creation requires an instrument under seal. Nor is it questioned, nor questionable, that a parol imposition of a servitude of this kind upon land is in flat contradiction of the statute of frauds. It is true, indeed, that in one class of cases, as is well known, courts of conscience have felt dispensed from putting in force the provisions of that act. This has been the course pursued where a parol agreement for the purchase of lands, or of some interest in them, has been performed to the extent of possession having been taken in part execution of such contract. But, while this is the undeniable rule in equity, it should be ever borne in mind that its introduction has been regretted by the wisest judges. 'The statute,' says Lord Redesdale, 'was made for the purpose of preventing perjuries and frauds; and nothing can be more manifest to any person who has been in the habit of practising in courts of equity than that the relaxation of that statute has been a ground of much perjury and much fraud. If the statute had been vigorously observed, the result would probably have been that few instances of parol agreements would have occurred. Agreements from the necessity of the case would have been reduced to writing. Whereas it is manifest that the decisions on the subject have opened a new door to fraud.' And these strictures are pointed with the emphatic declaration that 'it is therefore absolutely necessary for courts of equity to make a stand, and not carry the decisions further.' Lindsay v. Lynch, 2 Sch. & Lef. 4. And, in the same vein, Judge Story (2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 766) says that 'considerations of this sort have led eminent judges to declare that they would not carry the exceptions of cases from the statute of frauds farther than they were compelled to do by former decisions.' To the same purpose are the criticisms of Chancellor Kent in Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. 149, and of Chancellor Zabriske in Cooper v. Carlisle, 17 N. J. Eq. 529." Pomeroy, in his work on Specific Performance of Contracts, referring to the doctrine of the irrevocability of a parol license when executed, says that it is opposed to the common-law doctrine concerning licenses as it prevails in England and in most of the American states. In Rodefer v. Pittsburg, O. V. & C. R. Co. 72 Ohio St. 272, 70 L.R.A. 844, 74 N. E. 183, the opinion of Andrews, J., in Crosdale v. Lanigan, 129 N. Y. 604, 26 Am. St. Rep. 551, 29 N. E. 824, was quoted from at length with approval, and it is unnecessary to repeat here what was said there. In that opinion he says that it is plainly the rule of the statute, as well as the rule required by public policy, that such a license, though executed, is revocable. See also Hicks Bros. v. Swift Creek Mill Co. 133 Ala. 411, 57 L.R.A. 720, 91 Am. St. Rep. 38. 31 So. 947; Pitzman v. Boyce, 111 Mo. 387, 33 Am. St. Rep. 536, 19 S. W. 1104; Thoenke v. Fiedler, 91 Wis. 386, 64 N. W. 1030; Stewart v. Stevens, 10 Colo. 440, 15 Pac. 786; St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 112 Ill. 384, 54 Am. Rep. 243. The cases are too numerous to cite, but may be readily found by reference to the reports and text-books already cited.

The early cases were grounded on some early English cases which were overruled in the leading case of Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & W. 838. The cases of Wilson v. Chalfant, 15 Ohio, 248, 45 Am. Dec. 574, and Hornback v. Cincinnati & Z. R. Co. 20 Ohio St. 81, are cited as supporting the doctrine of the irrevocability of such a license. The former seems to have been based upon precedents that were in accord with the early English decisions, which, as we have seen, have been overruled. The later case is not authority for the doctrine, but is a case of a parol agreement for the purchase of an interest in lands which has been performed to the extent of possession having been taken in part execution of the contract. The later case decided by the supreme court commission (Wilkins v. Irvine, 33 Ohio St. 138) is not in accord with the earlier doctrine, but is in accord with the modern doctrine, and it is there held that "a written license, without seal and unacknowledged, to enter upon and embed water pipes in the land of another, with privilege to enter and repair them, creates no interest in, nor encumbrance upon, the land, such as will disable the owner thereof from making a good and sufficient deed conveying a good title thereto." It may be added that in that case the written license had been executed. And in the opinion it is said (page 144): "It gave the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company no dominion over the land, nor did it create, in its favor, an easement in the land. If its terms had been violated by Brooks or his grantees, the jurisdiction of a court of equity could not have been successfully invoked to enforce a specific performance. The remedy, if any it had, would have been an action for damages."

Judgment affirmed.

property in this state for more than sixty years. Wilson v. Chalfant, 15 Ohio, 248, 45 Am. Dec. 574. It is in the strictest sense stare decisis, and is no longer an open question for the courts. If there is any demand for a change of the law, the legislature alone is competent to decide whether a change so vital to property rights which have been acquired under the existing rule should be made.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

H. J. MILLS, Respt.,
v.

SEATTLE, RENTON, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(50 Wash. 20, 96 Pac. 520.)

Carrier — ticket — transportation to destination.

1. One holding a street car ticket entitling him to transportation to any one of several points at different distances along the line from the starting point, who boards a car plainly marked as going only as far as the nearest stop to which the ticket entitles him to ride, is not entitled to damages in case the car stops at that point and goes back, and he is ejected therefrom without undue force after being refused a transfer to another car.

Same — passenger — ejection.

2. A street car company cannot eject a trespasser from its car while the car is in motion, so as to endanger life or limb, or wilfully or unnecessarily assault him.

Same — assault — scope of employment.

3. A street car company is liable for the act of one employed to care for its cars, who unlawfully assaults a passenger while attempting to eject him from the car at the express or implied request of the conductor, but not if his act is of his own volition, and beyond the scope of his employment.

(July 11, 1908.)

Case Note. — Rights of passenger who boards car or train destined for a point short of his destination.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henry, 84 Tex. 678, 16 L.R.A. 318, 19 S. W. 870, it was held that a ticket which was good for a continuous passage only did not entitle a passenger who voluntarily took passage upon a train which he was informed would not go through to his destination, to be carried the remainder of the journey on the train which he ought to have taken in the first instance.

In Johnson v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 63 Md. 106, it appeared that plaintiff purchased an excursion ticket which provided that it was good "for a continuous trip only," and "not good to stop off," and APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for assault by defendant's servants upon plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sachs & Hale for appellant.

Mr. John E. Ryan, for respondent:

When one gets upon a train by mistake, and without inquiring as to its destination, the conductor, when he sees that the passenger is on the wrong train, owes him the duty of informing him of his mistake; and, if the conductor fails to inform him, and accepts his ticket as though the train went to his destination, then he is accepted as a passenger to said destination, and the rule requiring diligence on the part of the passenger is waived.

South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Huffman, 76 Ala. 492, 52 Am. Rep. 349; Boehm v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 91 Wis. 592, 65

that he boarded a train which did not run to his destination, and was not advertised to so run, all of which he well knew at and before the time he entered the train. It was held that he could properly be removed from the train upon his refusal to pay fare or produce a proper ticket.

In Townsend v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 4 Hun, 217, where it appeared that plaintiff took passage on a train which regularly ran to a point short of his destination; that it was customary for passengers going beyond this point to take the next train going in that direction; that plaintiff's ticket was taken up by the conductor on the first train, and he was ejected from the second train because he had no ticket,—the company was held liable. There was no contention that he should have taken a through train in the first instance.

In Mahoney v. Detroit Street R. Co. 93 Mich. 612, 18 L.R.A. 335, 32 Am. St. Rep. 528, 53 N. W. 793, plaintiff boarded a street car which did not go to the end of the line, but stopped at the company's barns; he alighted, telling the conductor that he wished to go further, but without asking for a transfer ticket. It was held that he could be lawfully ejected from the next car which he took going toward his destination if he refused to pay fare thereon, and that the second conductor was not obliged to take his statement as evidence of his right to ride.

In Appleby v. St. Paul City R. Co. 54 Minn. 169, 40 Am. St. Rep. 308, 55 N. W. 1117, it was held that where the passenger was justified in assuming that the street car on which he paid his fare was to go to the end of the line, but it was stopped and taken off at the power house after the conductor had disappeared, so that he could not get a transfer ticket, he had a right to complete his journey on the next car going in the 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Though plaintiff was upon the train by mistake, he was entitled to the treatment due a passenger.

Rudkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates a line of electric railway between the city of Seattle and the town of Renton, in King county. Cars starting out from the city of Seattle run to different points or stations on the line of the road, such as Graham avenue, Ocean beach, Rainier beach, and Taylor's mill. Each car has a notice at same direction, without again paying fare.

As was said in Roberts v. Koehler, 12 Sawy. 252, 30 Fed. 94: "A ticket for transportation on a railway between certain termini, which is silent as to the time when or within which it may be used, does not authorize the holder to stop over at any point between such termini, and resume his journey thereon, on the next or any following train. The contract involved in the sale and purchase of such a ticket is an entire one, and not divisible. It is a contract to carry the passenger through to the point of his destination as one continuous service, and not by piecemeal, to suit his convenience or pleasure." And as stated in Dietrich v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 71 Pa. 436, 10 Am. Rep. 711, and the cases there cited, it is well settled that one who buys a railroad ticket is bound to inform himself of the rules and regulations of the company governing the transit and conduct of its trains. It would seem, therefore, that the rights of a passenger who boards a car or train destined by the rules and regulations of the company for a point short of his destination would not be enlarged by the fact that the car or train was not marked. But the fact that its destination was plainly marked upon such car or train might estop him from claiming that he was upon the wrong train by his mistake, or by misdirection of the company's employees.

Upon the question of the rights of a passenger on the wrong train by his own mistake, see case note to Robertson v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588.

As to the duty of a passenger on the wrong train through misdirection of the carrier's servants, see case note to St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. White, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 110.

the front and rear of the car, showing its destination. The 5-cent fare limit is Graham avenue. Beyond this point, tickets to Seattle and return are sold by the conductors on the several cars. Return trip tickets are not sold to each individual station or stopping place, but one general form of ticket is used for all stations to which the rate or fare is the same, and the tickets are good to the farthest station from the city of Seattle. Thus, passengers purchasing tickets to Seattle and return from Brighton beach, Ocean beach, and Rainier beach will all receive the same form of ticket, and there is nothing on the face of the ticket to mark or indicate the passenger's destination. On the morning of March 25, 1907, the plaintiff in this action took passage on one of the defendant's cars at Rainier beach, and purchased a ticket to Seattle and return. On the evening of that day he boarded another of the defendant's cars at the city of Seattle for the return trip to Rainier beach. The notice at the front and rear of the car thus boarded showed that the destination of the car was Ocean beach, a point about 2 miles nearer Seattle than Rainier beach, and such was its destination in fact. No questions were asked by the plaintiff as to the destination of the car, and no information was given by him as to his own destination. The conductor took up the tickets, and, when the car reached Ocean beach, the plaintiff was informed that the car had reached its destination, and was about to return to the barn, and that he, the plaintiff, must leave the car. The plaintiff refused to leave the car, but demanded from the conductor a transfer or other evidence of his right to take another car to his destination at Rainier beach. This the conductor refused to give, and had no authority to give under the rules of the company. After remaining at Ocean beach for about five minutes, the car started back towards the barn with the plaintiff still on board. Up to this point there was no conflict in the testimony, and no question of fact for the jury to pass upon. When the car had returned to a point near Brighton beach, about 2 miles from Ocean beach, a conflict arose between the plaintiff and the conductor of the car, or a greaser in the employ of the defendant, or between the plaintiff and both the conductor and the greaser, as a result of which the plaintiff was ejected from the car, and assaulted. This action was instituted to recover damages for the wrongful ejection and for the assault, and, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the present appeal is prosecuted.

duties of common carriers and their passengers, were excepted to, and the giving of these instructions is assigned as error: "I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that if you find, from a fair preponderance of the evidence in this case, that the plaintiff, on or about the 25th day of March, 1907, had in his possession a ticket entitling the plaintiff to ride as a passenger upon one of the defendant's cars from the city of Seattle to Rainier beach, and that it was printed upon the face of the ticket that the plaintiff was entitled to passage from the city of Seattle to Rainier beach, and if you further find that he went in the car of defendant in good faith, believing that he was entitled to ride upon the car of defendant upon which he entered as a passenger from the city of Seattle to Rainier beach, then he became a passenger of defendant from the city of Seattle to Rainier beach for hire, and was entitled to be transported by defendant as a passenger, and was entitled to all the rights and duties and privileges of a passenger for hire upon that street railway line from the city of Seattle to Rainier beach." These several assignments must be sustained. The appellant was not required to run all of its cars the entire length of its line, nor to provide for the transfer of passengers from one car to another. It might run its cars to such points or stations as would best subserve its own convenience and the convenience of the traveling public, and require passengers to take such cars only as would transport them to their destination without change. This the appellant did, and no more. The respondent took the wrong car by mistake, without fault on the part of the appellant or its agents, and for this mistake and the injury flowing therefrom he alone is responsible. As soon as the car destined for Ocean beach had reached its destination, and the respondent was informed of that fact and requested to leave the car, it was his duty to do so, and, as soon as he was given a reasonable opportunity to leave the car, and refused, the relation of carrier and passenger ceased, and the respondent became a trespasser from that time forward. The appellant thereafter owed him such duty as it owes to trespassers, and none other; and these facts appearing from the uncontroverted testimony, the court should have so charged the jury. These errors call for a reversal of the judgment, but not for a dismissal of the action. As a trespasser, the employees of the appellant might use such force as was reasonably necessary to eject the respondent from the car, in case he refused to leave of his own accord, but they could not lawfully eject him while the car was in motion, so as to endanger life or limb, nor could they wilfully or unnecessarily assault him with impunity. The rights of common carriers and their employees in ejecting trespassers from cars were thus stated in Clark v. Great Northern R. Co. 37 Wash. 537, 79 Pac. 1108, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 760: "The true rule is that, in removing trespassers from a train, the employees of the company may use such force as appears reasonably necessary, under all the circumstances, to accomplish the end in view; and, if the trespasser offers forcible resistance, a jury should not weigh with too much nicety the degree of force resorted to." In this case there was some testimony tending to show that a wilful and unprovoked assault had been committed, and the weight of this testimony was for the jury. The appellant requested the court to charge the jury that it was in no event liable for the assault committed by the employee called the greaser. This employee had nothing to do with the operation of the cars, or with the receiving or discharging of passengers, and for an assault committed by him of his own volition and without the scope of his employment the company, of course, would not be liable. If, on the other hand, this employee was assisting the conductor in ejecting the respondent from the car at the express or implied request of the conductor, the appellant would be liable for his acts in that connection.

The other assignments are not of sufficient importance to call for consideration or discussion; but, for error in the instructions complained of, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON EX REL. J.
G. WOLFE, Resp.,
v.

JOHN PARMENTER, Appt.

Statutes—sufficiency of title—error.

1. A provision of a statute exempting certain property from taxation is not insufficiently covered by the title, which states that it relates to revenue and taxation, by the fact that it further states that it is an amendment of a statute, designated by a chapter and year of passage, which designation is clearly erroneous, the statute referred to being on an entirely different subject.

Tax—exemption of credits—constitutionality.

2. A constitutional provision that all property shall be taxed does not preclude an exemption of credits, where the Constitution also provides that the assessment shall be uniform and equal, and at a just valuation of the property.

Same—exemption of money.

3. Money cannot be exempted from taxation under a constitutional provision requiring all property to be taxed.

Same—credits.

4. Constitutional provisions that a deduction of debts from credits may be allowed in assessing taxes, and that all property must be taxed, do not recognize credits as property, so as to prevent the legislature from exempting credits, where the Constitution also provides that taxation shall be equal and uniform.

Same—separable provision.

5. The inclusion of money, which cannot be exempted from taxation, in a provision of a statute exempting credits, which may properly be exempted, does not invalidate the entire exemption.

(August 1, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lincoln County in favor of relator in a mandamus proceeding to compel the listing of certain items for taxation. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. A. Pettijohn for appellant.

Messrs. Martin & Wilson for respondent.

Messrs. J. H. Easterday, Peters & Powell, and Hudson & Holt, amici curiæ:

Note.—The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the question of the constitutionality of exemption of credits from taxation, as an extensive search has failed to disclose any other case presenting that question. It will be observed that the court, in STATE EX REL. WOLFE v. PARMENTER, does not deduce the power to exempt credits from taxation, notwithstanding a constitutional provision that all property should be taxed, from any conclusion upon the question whether the taxation of both credits and the property represented by them would be double taxation, in violation of constitutional provisions requiring uniformity and equality in the assessment of taxes. Therefore, cases discussing the question of double taxation would be of no assistance in arriving at a decision as to the constitutionality of the exemption of credits. And the same may be said of those cases involving the deduction of the debts owed by the taxpayer from his taxable property.

Double taxation is not contemplated by the Constitution.

Lewiston Water & P. Co. v. Asotin County, 24 Wash. 377, 64 Pac. 544; Ridpath v. Spokane County, 23 Wash. 436, 63 Pac. 261.

Taxation which attempts to tax credits fails to meet the constitutional requirements of uniformity, equality, and justness, because, in so far as such a tax is enforced against credits, it results in double taxation.

Notes, accounts, mortgages, etc., have been considered subjects for express exemption from taxation by law writers and courts, even where, under their Constitutions, it was expressed that "all property, real and personal," is subject to taxation.

If the act should be unconstitutional in part, it would not, for that reason, be invalid as to the rest.

Clerical errors in titles to amendatory acts are immaterial, provided the court can determine with certainty the statute, section, or law intended to be revised.

Messrs. James B. Howe and R. G. Sharpe also amici curiæ.

Hadley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted in the superior court of Lincoln county, and it is in the nature of an action in mandamus to require the assessor of that county to list for taxation purposes, for the year 1908, mortgages, notes, accounts, moneys, certificates of deposit, tax certificates, judgments, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bonds, and warrants. In terms the petition asks for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the assessor from allowing the above-mentioned items to become exempt from taxation; but, in effect, the relief sought is affirmative and in the nature of mandamus. The assessor demurred to the petition, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of a writ. The demurrer was overruled, and, in the absence of further pleading, judgment was entered commanding the assessor to list and assess all the items specified above. The assessor has appealed.

It is urged, in support of the demurrer, that it was the duty of appellant to refuse to list the items mentioned by reason of the act of the legislature as found in chapter 48, at page 69 of the Session Laws of 1907. Section 1 of that act is as follows: "That section 3 of 'chapter 83 of the Laws of 1897, amended June 12, 1901,' is hereby amended to read as follows: Sec. 3. Personal property, for the purpose of taxation, shall be construed to embrace and include, without especially defining and enumerating it, all goods, chattels, stocks, or estates; all improvements upon lands, the fee of which is still vested in the United States, or in the state of Washington, or in any railroad company or corporation, and all and singular of whatsoever kind, name, nature, and description, which the law may define or the courts interpret, declare, and hold to be personal property, for the purpose of taxation, and as being subject to the laws and under the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, whether the same be any marine craft, as ships and vessels, or other property holden under the laws and jurisdiction of the courts of this state, be the same at home or abroad: Provided, that the ships or vessels registered in any customhouse of the United States within this state, which ships or vessels are used exclusively in trade between this state and any of the islands, districts, territories, states of the United States, or foreign countries, shall not be listed for the purpose of or subject to taxation in this state, such vessels not being deemed property within this state: Provided, that mortgages, notes, accounts, moneys, certificates of deposit, tax certificates, judgments, state, county, municipal, and school district bonds and warrants shall not be considered as property for the purpose of this chapter, and no deduction shall hereafter be allowed on account of an indebtedness owed." It will be seen that the effect of the closing proviso of the section is to exempt from taxation the items there enumerated. If, therefore, the statute is a valid one, the appellant did his duty; but, if it violates constitutional limitations, the judgment of the court was right. The constitutionality of the statute is the only question involved in this appeal.

It is contended that the act is invalid because of insufficiency of the title. The title is as follows: "An Act Amending an Act Entitled, 'An Act to Amend Section 3, of Chapter 83 of the Laws of 1897 Relating to Revenue and Taxation,' Passed the Senate and the House, June 12, 1901, Notwithstanding the Veto of the Governor, and Declaring an Emergency." If it is necessary to pay strict regard to everything contained in this title, then it is singularly involved. Reference to chapter 83, p. 221, of the Laws of 1897, to which the title refers as the law amended by this act, discloses that it treats of monuments and notices upon mining claims. It is manifest that the reference to the former statute is a pure error, as the two acts relate to subjects entirely separate and distinct. This title does, however, further state the subject as "relating to revenue and taxation," and the body of the act clearly and succinctly treats of that subject alone. The subject of exemption from taxation treated in the body of the act is included in the general subject specified in the title. We think the erroneous reference to the former statute must be treated as mere surplusage, and, inasmuch as, without that part of the title, there is a clearly-stated and single subject, which is followed by a clear treatment of that subject in the act itself, the statute becomes an independent one, and has the effect of amending any existing statute upon the subject, and of repealing by implication any previously existing provisions in conflict with it. We therefore hold that the act is not invalid by reason of its title.

It is further urged that the act violates §§ 1 and 2 of article 7 of the state Constitution. Section 1 contains, among other things, the following: "All property in the state not exempt under the laws of the United States or under this Constitution shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." Section 2 is, in part, as follows: "The legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state, according to its value in money, and shall prescribe such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property: Provided, that a deduction of debts from credits may be authorized." It is argued that the exemption of the items mentioned in the statute violates the constitutional provision of § 1, quoted above, which requires that all property in the state shall be taxed except such as is exempt under the laws of the United States, or under the Constitution of the state. It is contended that credits such as mortgages, notes, and accounts are property, and cannot be excluded by the legislature from the subjects of taxation. The argument assumes that all property in the state cannot be taxed without the taxation of credits. Is the assumption correct? The Constitution simply requires that all property shall be taxed, but the method of doing it is left to the legislature. If the method devised by the legislature reaches all property in fact, then there is no violation of the Constitution. It is possible to assess the same property in different ways, any one of which would subject the entire property to the tax. For example, one person may own the fee title to real estate, and another may own an easement or a leasehold therein. All of these are property, but it cannot be successfully maintained that all of them must be taxed in order to satisfy the Constitution. The state taxes the land as an entirety, and leaves the owners of the several interests to make such adjustments as they choose. The constitutional requirement that all property shall be taxed is certainly satisfied through a method by which the total of all wealth in the state is once taxed. Double taxation should be avoided as far as possible, and, in any event, the Constitution should not be so construed as to require it. In an effort to tax all property it is, however, difficult to avoid double taxation in some particulars. The complexity of established business methods is such that property appears and then reappears in representative forms. The actual property of a corporation reappears in the hands of its stockholders in the shape of corporate stock. That the taxation of the corporate property and also of its capital stock amounts to double taxation was recognized by this court in Lewiston Water & P. Co. v. Asotin County, 24 Wash. 371, 64 Pac. 544. The court observed in that case as follows: "But, as we have seen, the assessment of the capital stock of a domestic corporation which has all its property in which the capital stock is invested already assessed is duplicate taxation, and this latter result will not be inferred without specific legislation. It may be further observed that § 1676, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, in providing the method for the assessment of domestic corporations such as this, does not contemplate duplicate taxation." See also Ridpath v. Spokane County, 23 Wash. 436, 63 Pac. 261. All the provisions of the Constitution on the subject of taxation cannot be fully and literally met. For purposes of present consideration, these provisions may be stated as follows: "All property" shall be taxed. The assessment shall be "uniform and equal," and a "just valuation" shall be placed upon all property, so that every person shall pay a tax in proportion to the value. No method of taxation in its results can fully accomplish all that the Constitution declare shall be done. As near an approach to a full compliance as is reasonably possible is all that can be expected of the legislature. One requirement of the Constitution is as mandatory in its nature as another. It is just as imperative that taxation shall be uniform and equal upon all property as it is that all property shall be taxed. It is manifest that a system which subjects some property to double taxation is not uniform and equal. Any method which can be devised by the legislature must necessarily be defective in some particulars, and must fail to meet with exactness every standard set by the Constitution. Any method adopted by the legislature which reasonably comprehends the taxation of all property once in some form, and which seeks to accomplish uniformity by avoiding double taxation as far as possible, should receive judicial sanction, for the reason that the constitutional provisions are harmonized by such a method as fully as complete harmony thereunder can be accomplished.

It will be seen that the items specified by the statute of 1907, which shall not be considered as property for the purposes of assessment and taxation, may all be classified as "credits," except the item of "moneys." So far as credits are concerned, if it is demonstrable that the total wealth of the state can be once taxed without the taxation of credits in any form, we think the Constitution is satisfied without the taxation of credits. The multiplicity of credits does not add to the property wealth of the state. If A. buys of B. a piece of real estate, and agrees, by promissory note or otherwise, to pay $5,000 therefor, there is, as a result, in the hands of B. a credit in the amount of $5,000; but there is not thereby created $5,000 more property or wealth. By the transaction the land has passed from B. into the possession and control of A., and is taxable the same as if it had remained with B. The credit in the hands of B. is a matter of no value or consequence except for the prospect or faith that A. will, in the future, deliver to B. $5,000 in actual money or other property. That money or property that may in the future come to B. is still in the hands of A., or someone else from whom A. will procure it, and it is meanwhile taxable at some place, wherever it may be, no matter who possesses it or controls it, whether within or without this state. The credit in the hands of B. is simply the right to demand the delivery of $5,000 worth of property at some time in the future. To tax both this right and the property which it represents is clearly double taxation. A similar illustration applies to a loan of money. At this point it is proper to remark that we think moneys cannot properly be classified with credits, as is done in the statute of 1907. Money in practical commercial operations possesses such value by way of immediate purchasing or exchange powers as in effect robs it of a mere representative character, and clothes it with the dignity of property having intrinsic value. We therefore think that the proviso in question must be held to be inoperative so far as money is concerned, since to exempt it from taxation would amount to a palpable effort to avoid the taxation of all property. Recurring now to the illustration as to a credit created by the loan of money, we will suppose that A. borrows from B. $5,000 in cash. A., instead of B., becomes the possessor of the money, and either it, or its equivalent in other property which it purchases for A., becomes taxable in the latter's hands. To tax the money in A.'s hands and also the mere right which B. has to call upon A. for its repayment is clearly double taxation. These illustrations, it is believed, should apply to all credits. Credits are, in effect, the mere legal right with which one is clothed to demand the delivery of money or other property in the future; and until such transfer of possession is made, that property is taxed wherever it may be. Thus the total actual property or wealth of the state may be once taxed without the taxation of credits, and the constitutional requirement is thereby fully met.

In People v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. 51 Cal. 243, 21 Am. Rep. 704, it was held, under constitutional provisions similar to ours, that credits are not property, subject to taxation within the meaning of the Constitution, which provides for the uniform taxation of all property in the state in proportion to its value. It is not necessary, in order to sustain our statute of 1907, that it should be held, as was done in California, that the legislature cannot, in its discretion, provide for the taxation of credits. It is sufficient to say that the omission of credits from a scheme of taxation does not violate the requirement that all actual property shall be taxed. It is argued that State ex rel. Chamberlin v. Daniel, 17 Wash. 111, 49 Pac. 243, is decisive of this controversy in favor of respondent. The act there under consideration exempted from taxation in the hands of each person $500 of personal property and $500 of improvements upon land. It will be seen that the act exempted actual property, and its enforcement would have deducted a large amount from the aggregate of the actual property wealth of the state as not taxable, thus plainly violating the requirement that all property shall be taxed. We have seen that the statute under discussion in the case at bar does not prevent the taxation of the total wealth of the state once, but it does prevent double taxation by way of assessing credits. The case cited is therefore not in point upon the question presented here.

It is urged that the makers of our Constitution must have intended to declare that credits are property which must be taxed, from the fact that § 2 of article 7, supra, provides that "a deduction of debts from credits may be authorized." It is insisted that the above words are a clear constitutional recognition of credits as property. If, however, we should recognize the argument as forcible, and should undertake to adopt it, we should at once be met with the requirement in the same section that all taxation shall be uniform and equal. We have seen that the taxation of credits violates uniformity and equality and effects double taxation. The great and principal subject treated in the section is that of uniformity and equality of taxation. It overshadows everything else, and whatever else is mentioned in the section is merely incidental to the main subject. Having reference to the main subject, it cannot be held that uniformity can be preserved if the Constitution means that credits must be taxed. It is our duty to adopt such construction as will most nearly harmonize all provisions in the section, with the evident chief purpose sought to be accomplished.

With the mere policy of the statute the courts have nothing to do, except in so far as the same may throw light upon the legislative intention. It may be stated, in this connection as a matter of common knowledge, that one of the most fruitful sources of inequality in taxation is the attempt to tax credits. Laws for that purpose can never be effectively enforced. Efforts to conceal the existence of the credits are so successful that a few honest persons pay the taxes, and the large majority of holders do not. Moreover, in practical experience, the tax is not really paid by the holder of the credit, but it is paid by his debtor. When mortgages are taxed, the mortgagee seldom pays the tax; but the burden thereof is imposed upon the mortgagor by way of increased rates of interest or otherwise, and the same may be said as to increased rates of interest imposed upon borrowers generally. Such results cannot well be avoided, and doubtless the legislature had such considerations in mind as supporting the policy of this law. It was no doubt believed that all the wealth of the state can be once taxed without the taxation of credits, and that, with the constitutional requirement as to taxation of all property thus satisfied, uniformity and equality can be the better effected and the abuses above mentioned largely corrected.

We therefore think, for the foregoing reasons, that the statute is not unconstitutional, except in so far as it attempts to exempt moneys from taxation. That, however, does not invalidate the other provisions, as has been often held. The general demurrer was properly overruled, inasmuch as a cause of action was stated so far as the listing of moneys is concerned, but the judgment should be modified so as to command the appellant to list all moneys for taxation, and further provide that all credit items mentioned in the statute of 1907 shall be excluded from the assessment lists.

It is so ordered, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to so proceed. The appellant shall recover the costs on appeal.

Rudkin, Mount, Crow, and Dunbar, JJ. concur.

Fullerton, J., dissenting:

I am compelled to dissent both from the conclusion and judgment in this case. The decision is rested, as I understand it, on three propositions: (1) That credits are not property; (2) that to tax credits violates the principle of equality and uniformity in taxation, required by the Constitution; and (3) that credits are taxed by the taxation of the tangible property of the state. As the questions decided are important, I feel justified in briefly stating the grounds of my dissent.

1. The constitutional provisions on the subject of taxation appropriate to the questions before the court are set out in the majority opinion, and need not be reproduced here. A reading of them makes it at once manifest that it was the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution, as well as that of the people who adopted it, to require, for the purposes of revenue, the taxation of all private property in the state, of whatsoever kind or nature, equally and uniformly, in proportion to its value in money. The language is explicit. It admits of no limitation or construction. "All property" is named, and the only exception provided for is that a deduction of debts from credits may be authorized. The questions therefore naturally arise: What is meant by the word "property"? and in what sense was the word used in the Constitution? That mortgages, notes, accounts, moneys, certificates of deposit, tax certificates, judgments, and state, county, municipal, and school district bonds and warrants are property in the general and popular sense of that term hardly admits of doubt. They are so termed and considered by all English-speaking people, by all law-writers, and by the entire commercial world. They are held by the courts to be protected against spoliation and theft by the statutes which make it a crime to despoil or steal personal property. The question of ownership and title to them is daily the subject of controversy in the civil courts. They are daily the subject of barter and sale in all the marts of commerce. They have value in money, and constitute and make up the most satisfactory character of wealth that mankind possesses. In fine, they have all the attributes of property. These propositions are matters of common knowledge, and citations of authorities are not necessary to establish them. That the word "property" was used in the Constitution in its general sense seems to me, also, to be free from doubt. It is a cardinal rule of construction that the language of a state Constitution, more than that of any other written instrument, is to be taken in its general and popular sense. The reason for the rule lies in the fact that its makers are the people who adopt it. Its language is their language, and its words have meaning as they commonly understand them. When, therefore, words are used which have both a general and a technical sense, the former must prevail over the latter, unless the very nature of the subject-matter indicates, or the context suggests, that the technical sense was intended. In the sentence in which the word "property" is used in the constitutional provision quoted, there is no attempt at definition. It is used without connection with any sentence or phrase which limits its meaning. Nor is there elsewhere any limitation upon its meaning. Indeed, there is no reason for concluding that the word was used other than in its general sense. That the makers of the Constitution had the right to provide for the taxation of credits, if they so desired, I think will be conceded. It will be conceded, also, that this could be done by the use of general terms. Therefore, it being true that the obligations here enumerated are "property" in the general sense of that term, and it being true that the Constitution makers used the term "property" in its general sense, it must follow that the Constitution requires the taxation of these obligations. But there is another reason more potent to my mind than even the foregoing, which shows that the framers of the Constitution intended to provide for the taxation of credits by the use of the general term "property." They authorized the legislature, when providing the method of taxation, to allow a deduction of debts from credits. Clearly, if it had not been understood that credits were property, and taxable as such, this deduction would not have been authorized.

2. Does the taxation of credits violate the principle of equality and uniformity in taxation required by the Constitution? The affirmative argument is that to tax these obligations is double taxation. Thus it is said that if A. loans B. $5,000, and takes B.'s obligation to repay that sum, it is double taxation to tax the obligation in A.'s hand and the money in B.'s; but, if this be true, and the obligation be property, I cannot understand how the rule of uniformity and equality is advanced by exempting the obligation. It seems to me that this but further confuses the matter. It cannot be said that the obligation is doubly assessed. If any property is doubly assessed, it is the money, and to exempt the obligation exempts the wrong thing. But it is not sound for another reason. When A., the money lender, loans to B., the borrower, $5,000, and takes his obligation to repay the loan, A.'s wealth is not thereby decreased $5,000, nor is B.'s wealth increased $5,000. The parties have only made an exchange of wealth, and each has exactly the same amount of wealth he had before. If therefore each paid taxes on $5,000 before the exchange, in justice and equity each ought to pay taxes on a like amount thereafter. The law as it heretofore existed, however, seems to have made A. pay, after the exchange, on $5,000, and B. on $10,000. To correct the evil the legislature relieves A. entirely, still leaving B. to pay on double the amount he possesses. This, to my mind, is not equality and uniformity in taxation. Nor do I think any law can equalize taxes which exempts from taxation the creditor class. The burden of double taxation never falls upon them. It falls in every instance upon the property-holding debtor class, since it is the debtor who does not have the absolute interest in the property he possesses. Laws which allow the debtor to deduct from the assessed value of his property debts in good faith owing by him have, for that reason, a sense of equity; but there is no sense of equity or justice in exempting from taxation money and credits.

3. Finally, it is said that credits are taxed in other forms of property, and for that reason their exemption from taxation as credits is justified. The argument in support of this proposition is that credits are but representations of interests in the tangible property of the state, and that, when the tangible property of the state is taxed, all the wealth within the state is taxed. But I must dissent from this proposition also. It assumes—what is obviously not the fact—that there is no wealth in credits independent of tangible property. Suppose that to-morrow a person should come into this state from some other state, bringing with him stocks and bonds to the value of a million dollars of some solvent railroad corporation whose lines do not touch this state, would anyone say that he had brought no wealth into the state, or that the wealth of the state had not been increased? Or would anyone say that the stocks and bonds were taxed by the taxation of the tangible property of the state? Obviously not. How, then, can it be said that the wealth of the state is taxed by the taxation of its tangible property? It is no answer to say that these bonds are taxed by the taxation of the railroad in another state. This does not satisfy our own laws, which require that all property within the state be taxed. Nor does it satisfy the justice of the matter. So long as this property is within the state, it requires the care and protection of the laws of the state, and it is only right that it should contribute its proportionate share to the maintenance of the state. Furthermore, if credits be property in any form, they must be taxed as property. The Constitution does not recognize vicarious taxation. The requirement that all property must be taxed means that it must be taxed directly, in the form it presents itself when the assessment lists are made up, not in the form of substitutes. Again, it is suggested in this connection, and it is a common argument used in support of laws of this character, that credits escape taxation in the major part through the dishonesty of their holders, and that, when they are found, the tax is paid by the debtors in the way of increased interest; but this does not appear to me to argue in favor of the exemption of credits. If the laws are so lax as to permit credits to escape taxation, the remedy is to reform the law, not to exempt credits. It will not do to say that no tax law can be framed that will reach credits. This is no place to point out remedies, but when the law places the premium upon honesty, instead of upon dishonesty, in these matters, the evil will disappear. But supposing it be true that a goodly part of the credits of the state will escape the assessor under the best framed law, is it not better that the part that can be reached be taxed, than that all be allowed to escape? No one pretends that the assessor reaches all of the tangible personal property in the state, yet I have never heard this given as a reason for the exemption from taxation of all tangible personal property.

The claim that the borrower pays the taxes on credits in the way of interest is only true in a general sense. It is true in the sense that the renter pays the taxes on rented land in the way of rents, that the builder pays the taxes on the manufacturing plants when he pays the cost of the building material, that the consumer pays the tax on the products he consumes when he pays the price of the consumed products; but it is true in no other sense. The rate of interest is regulated by law in this state, and it is this law that governs interest rates. Experience has shown that it is only by law that the exaction of excessive and exorbitant interest can be prevented. It is never done by freeing money and credits from taxation. Nor is interest lessened to any material extent thereby. This is so because freedom from taxation is only one, and a minor one, of the many conditions that regulate rates of interest. The maximum rate allowed by law is always exacted if the demand for money at the time justifies it, regardless of other conditions, and the fact that credits are or are not taxed is hardly considered as an element when determining whether the maximum rate shall be exacted.

But these latter considerations are beside the question. If the Constitution declares that notes, accounts, moneys, certificates of deposit, and the like are property, and taxable as such, the legislature is without power to exempt them from taxation, and any statute attempting so to do is void. I believe it has so declared, and for that reason I think the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

FANK STEVENSON, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 62 S. E. 688.)

Trial — judges — special — regular.

1. It is reversible error for a regular judge, pending the trial of a cause begun

Headnotes by MILLER, J.

Note. — An extensive search has failed to disclose any other case involving the right of an accused person who has pleaded guilty to be present at the examination of witnesses by the court as a preliminary to pronouncing sentence.

and continued before a special judge, duly elected to preside in the absence of such regular judge, on making his appearance at the same term, to assume jurisdiction thereof, proceed with the trial, and pronounce judgment therein.

Criminal procedure—absence of defendant—reception of evidence.

2. It is error, to the prejudice of the prisoner's legal rights, for the court, after receiving a prisoner's plea of guilty of murder in the first degree, and before pronouncing judgment thereon, to proceed, in the absence of the prisoner, to examine witnesses and hear from the special judge who presided at the time of receiving such plea statements respecting the circumstances and facts of the killing, whether such examination be for the personal satisfaction of the judge pronouncing the judgment of the court, or to advise him as to the character of judgment that should be pronounced on said plea.

Plea—withdrawal—discretion of court.

3. It is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, reviewable here for any abuse thereof, whether it will permit a defendant to withdraw his plea of "guilty of murder in the first degree," entered after having withdrawn his former plea of "not guilty," and to plead anew his plea of "not guilty," and have a trial thereon before a jury.

(October 6, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mercer County to review a judgment rendered by the regular judge of that court, sentencing defendant to death following a plea of guilty of murder in the first degree, made before a special judge presiding in the absence of the regular judge. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Statement by Miller, J.:

Fank Stevenson was indicted for murder in the first degree. He entered a plea of not guilty, which was thereafter withdrawn on his motion and a plea of guilty entered. Subsequently, and before any judgment was pronounced by the special judge who had received the plea, the regular judge appeared and assumed the bench, and proceeded in defendant's absence to hear statements of the special judge as to what the witnesses had testified at the time of entering the plea of guilty, and also to hear the sworn statements of a part of the witnesses summoned. Following this, the court, the regular judge presiding, adjudged defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and sentenced him to be hung; and defendant brings error.

Mr. Hugh G. Woods for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. M. Sutton, Attorney General, for the State.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment in the criminal court, returned January 8, 1907, for murder and manslaughter, was in the form prescribed by § 4200, Code 1906, and charged that the defendant, on September 21, 1906, "in the said county of Mercer, feloniously, wilfully, maliciously, deliberately, and unlawfully did slay, kill, and murder one Mose Blagman, against the peace and dignity of the state." January 12, 1907, the prisoner demurred to the indictment, which being overruled, in his own proper person he entered his plea of not guilty, and issue was joined thereon. January 26, 1907, the case was continued generally to April 8, 1907. The record does not show that anything further was done in the case until July 9, 1907, when, the regular judge having failed to attend, the attorneys present and practising in said court by ballot elected John M. McGrath judge to preside in the absence of the regular judge, who, after taking the oath prescribed by law to perform faithfully and impartially the duties of said judge of said court so long as he shall continue to act as such, assumed the bench, and proceeded with the business. Whereupon the defendant moved the court to permit him to withdraw his plea of not guilty, which was granted; and, the plea being withdrawn, in his own proper person the defendant entered a plea of "guilty of murder in the first degree, in manner and form as the state in her said indictment against him hath alleged," and the court took time to consider of its judgment thereon. Subsequently, July 18, 1907, and before any judgment on the defendant's plea of guilty was pronounced by the special judge who had received the plea and taken time to consider of his judgment, Judge Maynard, the regular judge, appeared and assumed the bench, and, as he recites in a bill of exceptions, proceeded in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel, and not in open court, to hear statements of Special Judge McGrath as to what the witnesses had testified at the time of entering the plea of guilty, and also to hear the sworn statements of a part of the witnesses summoned in the case, stating at the same time, however, as further certified in said bill of exceptions, that he had heard the statement of the special judge and of the witnesses examined solely for his personal satisfaction; the judgment pronounced being based solely on the prisoner's plea of guilty, uninfluenced by any statements of the special judge or witnesses examined. Following this proceeding the court, August 1, 1907, the regular judge presiding, the prisoner having nothing to say in opposition thereto, adjudged him guilty of murder in the first degree, and that he be taken from the jail of the county to the penitentiary of the state, and there confined until October 25, 1907, when he should be hanged by the neck until he be dead. Immediately after judgment was thus pronounced against him, as shown in said bill of exceptions, the prisoner moved the court to set aside "its sentence and judgment, and to permit him to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty, and have his case tried by a jury," which motions, being resisted by the attorney of the state, were overruled, and the action of the court thereon was excepted to by the prisoner. On September 7, 1907, the prisoner presented his petition to the circuit court for a writ of error, but, that court being of the opinion that there was no error, the writ was refused. Whereupon, on presentation of his petition to this court, October 17, 1907, the writ was allowed.

Three questions are here presented for our consideration: First. Was it competent for Judge Maynard, the regular judge, to assume the bench and displace Special Judge McGrath while considering of his judgment on the prisoner's plea of guilty, and proceed to pronounce judgment of conviction and sentence? Second. If competent and having jurisdiction to pronounce judgment, was it error to the prejudice of the prisoner's legal rights for Judge Maynard, in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel, to hear the statement of the special judge, and examine witnesses for his personal satisfaction preliminary to pronouncing judgment of conviction and sentence? Third. Did the court err in overruling the prisoner's motion for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty, and plead anew his plea of not guilty, and have his case tried by a jury?

With respect to the first question, the record shows that Special Judge McGrath, in the absence of the regular judge, and pursuant to § 3631, Code 1906, was elected to hold the court generally in the absence of the regular judge, and not specially, to preside in this particular case. Undoubtedly, therefore, the appearance of Judge Maynard, the regular judge, operated to vacate the office of the special judge, without any order to that effect, as to all business except as to those cases the trial of which was already begun and continued before him. State v. Carter, 49 W. Va. 709, 39 S. E. 611; 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 611, 613, and cases cited in notes. How is it as to unfinished business in the hands of such special judge? Does the appearance of the regular judge or the adjournment of the term at which the special judge is elected to preside vacate the office of the special judge entirely? 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In State v. Carter, supra, it is said: "The appearance of the regular judge would vacate the office of the special without an order to that effect; and, if he was again absent on another day, a new election for a special judge would be necessary. . . . When a special judge fails to attend, or, being present, declines to hold court when he should do so, he thereby vacates his office, except, possibly, as to any unfinished business in his hands, and another person may be selected to hold court in lieu of the regular judge, then absent. The election of a special judge is merely for the time being, or for the disposition of a particular case or cases." There is in this case the suggestion that the appearance of the regular judge, or the absence of or declination to act of the special judge, would not vacate his office as to such unfinished business. In 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 612, 613, on the authority of the several cases cited in note 58, it is said: "A special judge does not lose jurisdiction to complete the trial of a case because the regular judge returns during the trial and resumes his duties." In Bohannon v. Tarbin, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 515, 76 S. W. 46, 49, one of the cases cited in said note, a special judge was elected to preside, as in this case, in the absence of the regular judge. The court there says: "The fact that the regular judge returned before the case was finally disposed of by the special judge in no wise nullified the jurisdiction of the latter. It would create inextricable confusion if, after a special judge, elected because of the absence of the regular judge, had commenced the trial of a case, his jurisdiction to further try it should be ousted by the return of the regular judge. It needs no argument to demonstrate the hardship and expense to litigants which would arise upon the adoption of such a principle." State v. Moberly, 121 Mo. 604, 26 S. W. 364, decided that: "Where a special judge was called in at the request of the regular judge, and for a time presided in a case, he acquired jurisdiction to try the case, which could not be divested by the regular judge; and the fact that the latter completed the trial is ground for reversal." But, on the authority of Hyllis v. State, 45 Ark. 478, and our own case of State v. Carter, supra, the rule of the cases just quoted is modified by the condition: "Unless the special judge was selected to preside only during the regular judge's absence." Our case, however, will not support such an exception to the general rule, when applied to the trial of a case already begun by a special judge; for, as already stated, it is there indicated that the return of the regular judge would not oust the special judge of jurisdiction to try and finally dispose of any case begun before him. Whether such jurisdiction would end with the term at which such special judge was elected we need not decide, for the question does not arise; all the proceedings here involved having occurred at the same term of the court. We have decided, in Carper v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 346, 19 S. E. 379, that a special judge so elected retains jurisdiction to sign bills of exceptions in a case tried before him within thirty days after the adjournment of the term. But seeing there must be a reversal of the judgment on other grounds, and as the question will arise in the further proceedings in the case, it is proper, we think, that we should intimate the opinion that the jurisdiction of a special judge, elected, not to try any particular case, but to preside only in the absence of the regular judge, does end for all purposes with the adjournment of the term at which he was elected, except as to the matter of signing bills of exceptions in cases tried and finally determined by him. Authorities do hold, however, that such special judge may adjourn the hearing of a case beyond the regular term without losing jurisdiction thereof. 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 612, and cases cited in note 54. The fact that the term of a regular or special judge has ended or expired before a trial begun is completed will not preclude his successor, the regular or a newly-elected judge, from trying the case, but he would have to try it de novo. 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 565. It is said at the page just cited, on the authority of Clanton v. Ryan, 14 Colo. 419, 24 Pac. 258, and Re Sullivan, 143 Cal. 402, 77 Pac. 153, that "a judge who did not hear the evidence cannot render a valid judgment in a cause, notwithstanding the testimony may have been written down and preserved."

In answer to the second inquiry, it is argued that, as the prisoner had withdrawn his plea of not guilty after being warned by court and counsel of the effect thereof, and voluntarily entered his plea of guilty of murder in the first degree, as charged in the indictment, without offering anything in mitigation of his crime; and, as this plea was tendered to the court, and not personally to the special judge presiding at the time, it was perfectly competent for the regular judge, on appearing, to pronounce the judgment of conviction and sentence complained of without further inquiry as to the facts; the effect of a confession being to supply the want of evidence. In the able and well-considered case of Green v. Com. 12 Allen, 155, it was ruled that the plea of guilty of murder in the first degree did have that effect, and, when tendered to single justice, judgment of conviction and sentence, without the intervention of a jury to try the degree of the crime, might be pronounced against him, although, without such plea, and upon a plea of not guilty in a capital crime, the trial could only be had, as provided by statute, before a full court composed of all the judges. The statute of Massachusetts, as does our statute, requires the jury to find the degree of the crime; and it was argued in that case, and decided adversely to the proposition, that, as all murder was presumed to be murder in the first degree, the court could not accept the plea of guilty in the first degree; and, as the jury in a trial of the issue on a plea of not guilty were required on the evidence to find the degree of murder, all the court could do was to accept the plea of confession, and impanel a jury to try the degree of the crime. Our statute (§ 4584, Code 1906) provides that: "If the accused plead guilty of murder in the first degree, sentence of death or confinement in the penitentiary for life shall be pronounced upon him by the court, as may seem right, in the same manner and with like effect as if he had been found guilty by the verdict of a jury." There is here given to the court a discretion either to pronounce judgment of death or imprisonment for life; certainly not an arbitrary discretion, but a reasonable discretion, and as may seem right. How is the court to be informed as to the right of the matter? The court's decision of this question is of the most vital importance to the prisoner. With him it is veritably a question of life and death. In this case the court presided over by the special judge had pursued the only practical method known to the law to inform itself as to what judgment should be rendered. It had, in the presence of the prisoner, examined the witnesses in open court, and the judge had taken further time to consider of the judgment to be pronounced. If such proceeding is necessary to advise the court, it is a part of the trial, and it follows as a necessary corollary that it must take place in the presence of the prisoner; for we have held that the prisoner must be present during the whole of his trial,—a constitutional right which cannot be waived or taken away from him by the court. Younger v. State, 2 W. Va. 579, 98 Am. Dec. 791; State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736; State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771; State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 800; State v. Parsons, 39 W. Va. 464, 19 S. E. 876; State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582-611, 39 S. E. 676. The statute (§ 4567, Code 1906) provides that: "A person indicted for felony shall be personally present during the trial therefor. . . .” And, as Judge Brannon says, in State v. Parsons, supra: “The great weight of authority is that he must be present when any step affecting him is taken, from arraignment to judgment, inclusive.” If, therefore, as already stated, a judge who did not hear the evidence cannot render a valid judgment in a cause notwithstanding the testimony may have been written down and preserved, or make any findings of fact in a cause tried by his predecessor, upon what principle can we sustain the judgment of conviction and sentence in this case? It is practically conceded by the attorney general, on the authorities cited, that the judgment must be reversed on this ground.

As to the third question, the motion of the prisoner to withdraw his plea of guilty, and plead anew his plea of not guilty and have a trial before a jury, no grounds for the motion were assigned. The motion was not made until the prisoner had been advised of the judgment against him upon his plea of guilty. Under such circumstances, he would be quite willing to try his chances again before a jury. But this motion would, at least at that term, have been properly addressed to the special judge engaged in the trial of the case. It is quite likely that the real ground of the prisoner's motion was his surprise at the severity of punishment, or that the special and regular judge should have made some investigation of the aggravating circumstances of his crime. It is no abuse of the discretion of the court, however, to refuse the withdrawal of a plea under such circumstances. 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 350-352, and cases cited. It is, generally speaking, a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the court, subject to review on writ of error, whether it will allow such a plea to be withdrawn. But in capital cases it is said, in 4 Bl. Com. 329, the court “is usually very backward in receiving and recording such confession out of tenderness to the life of the subject; and will generally advise the prisoner to retract it and plead to the indictment.” If, therefore, the motion had been properly addressed to the proper trial judge, and overruled, no good ground for the motion appearing, the judgment could not be reversed on that account.

For the reasons assigned, we reverse the judgment of the Criminal Court, and, entering such judgment as the Circuit Court should have entered, the case will be remanded to the said Criminal Court, to be therein further proceeded with according to the principles announced and directions given herein.

BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY, LIGHT, & POWER COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

W. H. SAWYER.

(— Ala. —, 47 So. 67.)

Carrier — employee — passenger.

The rights of a section man on a street railway, who is injured while riding to his work from his home, on the company's car, without paying fare, in accordance with a custom of the company to carry such employees free upon their displaying badges furnished to them, are not those of a passenger, but merely of an employee.

(June 18, 1908.)

Case Note. — Employee of railroad, or street railway as a passenger while being carried to or from work.

This note is supplementary to the subject note to Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 31 L.R.A. 321. As therein stated, there is a conflict among the cases upon this question. Since the publication of that note, a number of cases have broadly held that an employee, while being transported to or from his work without paying fare, is not a passenger, but an employee.

Thus it has been held that a section hand was not a passenger while riding as an employee of defendant, without paying any fare, on its car, to or from his home, from or to the place where he was working on the track. Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 114 Ill. App. 345, affirmed in 213 Ill. 545, 72 N. E. 1133; Indianapolis & G. Rapid Transit Co. v. Andis, 33 Ind. App. 625, 72 N. E. 145; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Messick, 35 Ind. App. 676, 74 N. E. 1097.

In Wright v. Northampton & H. R. Co. 122 N. C. 852, 29 S. E. 100, it was held that a section master who, after finishing his day's work, was permitted to ride on his employer's train to his sleeping place, without paying or being expected to pay his fare, was not a passenger.

In Ionnone v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 21 R. I. 452, 46 L.R.A. 730, 79 Am. St. Rep. 812, 44 Atl. 592, it was held that one employed to shovel snow from the track, and carried by a train toward his home after his day's work was done, the ride being a privilege incidental to his contract of service, without any charge or deduction from his wages, was not a passenger, but a fellow servant of the trainmen.

The decision in Kilduff v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 195 Mass. 307, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 873, 81 N. E. 191, that the employee, a track laborer, was still an employee, and not a passenger, while being transported from his place of work to his home, after his day's work was done, seems to have turned upon the fact that the car in which he

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tillman, Grubb, Bradley, & Morrow for appellant.

Messrs. Powell & Blackburn for appellee.

Tyson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In each of the counts it is alleged that plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's car at the time he was injured. It is scarcely necessary to say that this is a material allegation, and must be proven. If the relation of the parties as that of carrier and and passenger was not shown, but that of master and servant, or that of a mere licensee, of course, there could be no recovery in this case. In short, the plaintiff cannot be permitted to allege one relation and prove another. If the plaintiff was riding on the car by virtue of his employment and in that relation to defendant, or if he was accorded the privilege of riding solely on account of his being an employee, it is obvious that the rules of evidence governing the defendant's liability and the measure of damages recoverable would be entirely different from those that would obtain and control in the case of a passenger. If a passenger, as alleged, upon mere proof of the collision and injury, his prima facie right of recovery was established under those counts charging simple negligence. On the other hand, if he was riding as an employee, in addition to showing a collision and injury, he would have to adduce some evidence tending was being transported was a special car, in which only the laborers who were working on that particular job were allowed to ride, and the track where the accident occurred had not been opened to the public.

In a number of jurisdictions, it has been held that where a servant performs all his work at a fixed place, doing no service for the master on the train, he is to be treated as a passenger while the master is carrying him to and from his work as a part of the contract of employment. Hebert v. Portland R. Co. 103 Me. 315, 69 Atl. 266 (car greaser); Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 166 Mass. 492, 33 L.R.A. 844, 55 Am. St. Rep. 417, 46 Atl. 611 (freight clerk); New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Burns, 51 N. J. L. 340, 17 Atl. 630 (gang laborer); Enos v. Rhode Island Suburban R. Co. 28 R. I. 291, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, 67 Atl. 5 (stationary flagman).

And, under these circumstances, this rule has been applied where the master carried the servant as a mere gratuity. Carswell v. Macon, D. & S. R. Co. 118 Ga. 826, 45 S. E. 695 (a telegraph lineman); St. Louis, C. & St. P. R. Co. v. Waggoner, 90 Ill. App. 556 (night telegraph operator); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Weaver) 103 Ky. 392, 50 L.R.A. 381, 56 S. W. 674 (station agent); Chattanooga Rapid Transit Co. v. Venable, 105 Tenn. 460, 51 L.R.A. 886, 58 S. W. 861 (a depot night watchman); Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Romans, 40 Ind. App. 184, 79 N. E. 1068 (a car repairer).

In the last preceding case emphasis was placed upon the fact that the gratuity had grown to be a custom, and that the free tickets given the employees at the end of the day's work could be used at other hours and in going elsewhere than home.

Where, however, the servant's work is not confined to a fixed place, and to discharge the duties of his peculiar employment it is necessary that he should be carried from one place to another, as occasion may require, he is in the service of the company, and not a passenger while being thus transported.

It was so held in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stuber, 54 L.R.A. 696, 48 C. C. A. 149, 108 Fed. 934, of one whose duty it was to supervise and keep in repair the water tanks and pumping machinery at the water stations along the line.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Austin, 116 Ga. 266, 59 L.R.A. 107, 94 Am. St. Rep. 125, 42 S. E. 522, of a paymaster traveling from station to station for the purpose of paying off employees of the company.

In Shannon v. Union R. Co. 27 R. I. 475, 63 Atl. 488, of a switch cleaner being carried from one switch to another.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harmon, 85 Ark. 503, 109 S. W. 295, of a section hand being carried from one place of work to another.

In Sanderson v. Panther Lumber Co. 50 W. Va. 42, 55 L.R.A. 908, 88 Am. St. Rep. 841, 40 S. E. 368, of a foreman of a lumber camp, being carried from the camp to the mill, to obtain feed for the horses under his charge.

In St. Clair v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 519, 99 S. W. 775, of a tool-house foreman being carried from the place of a wreck to headquarters. This case explains the apparent contrary holding in Haas v. St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. 111 Mo. App. 706, 90 S. W. 1155.

But in Harris v. Puget Sound Electric R. Co. (Wash.) 100 Pac. 838, it was held that a gang foreman, whose duties required him to be at different places on the line of railway, was a passenger while riding to a place of work on a pass furnished him as a portion of the consideration for his services.

In Williams v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 18 Utah, 210, 72 Am. St. Rep. 777, 54 Pac. 991, it was held that one employed to begin work as a brakeman at a distant point on the railroad, to which he was given a free pass, was a passenger while being transported to that point.

to show negligence; or if as a licensee, the only duty defendant owed him was not to wantonly or intentionally injure him, or to exercise due care to avert the injury after his danger became apparent. McCauley v. Tennessee Coal, Iron, & R. Co. 93 Ala. 356, 9 So. 611. Besides, the degree of care required with respect to plaintiff as passenger and that of an employee would be entirely different. As a passenger the defendant, as a carrier, owed him the highest degree of care; as his employer it only owed him the duty of exercising reasonable care not to injure him. It thus becomes apparent that the question whether or not plaintiff was a passenger is an important one.

Was he a passenger? According to his own testimony, which was in no wise disputed, he was riding as an employee of defendant on the car, going to his work from his home. He was at the time one of the section hands, engaged in putting in cross ties on the roadbed of defendant's track. He was furnished a badge by the defendant, which was an insignia of his employment by it, and which entitled him to be carried free upon its cars. He said: "I was riding on my badge the day I got hurt, and did not pay any fare. I was riding as an employee or workman for the company." He also testified "that it was the rule of the company to take the workmen from home to the place they went to work, and to take them back, without charging them any fare, and, I being a workman and having my badge, they carried me without making me pay any fare." On this state of facts, which, as we have said above, are without dispute, we are constrained to hold that plaintiff was not a passenger, but was in the exercise of a mere privilege connected with his employment. Wright v. Northampton & H. R. Co. 122 N. C. 852, 29 S. E. 100; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 543, § 4, and cases cited in note; Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1578a; Labatt, Mast. & S. pp. 1825-1829, § 624, (b), (c), and notes; Dresser, Employers' Liability, p. 75, § 13; Roberts & W. Duty & Liability of Employers, p. 183.

It is obvious, for another reason, on the facts stated by plaintiff, that there was no contract, either express or implied, that the relation of carrier and passenger should obtain between him and defendant. Indeed, the presumption that such relation existed between them was affirmatively negated by his testimony. The affirmative charge, requested by defendant, should have been given.

Reversed and remanded.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

ANNIE DICKSON, by Next Friend, et al.,
Appts.,
v.

GEORGE WOOLSEY VAN HOOSE et al.

Deed — life estate — fee — construction.

A fee will pass by a deed from a man who, having received an absolute conveyance of real estate from his wife, recites in the deed that he is entitled to a life estate in the property by right of survivorship under the laws of the state, which interest he has agreed to sell, and grants to his grantee, his heirs and assigns, forever, all the right he has in the property, to have and to hold the life estate and interest which the grantor has, and no more.

(November 26, 1908.)

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Tuscaloosa County Court partitioning certain lands formerly belonging to Barton F. Dickson, deceased; plaintiffs appealing from so much of the decree as recognized any right of defendants in the property and defendants appealing from so much as gave plaintiffs a one-third interest therein. Reversed.

Statement by Denson, J.:

The record presents no disputed evidence of fact. The plaintiffs sue as heirs at law of Barton F. Dickson, who died May 10, 1904. The defendants claim through a deed executed on December 4, 1883, by B. F. Dickson to one George A. Searcy, and from him by mesne conveyances to the present defendants. They also claim through a deed from Cadet Fiquet and W. F. Fiquet, and by limitation and prescription. The history of the property is briefly as follows: Charles J. Fiquet, the former owner of the property, died in 1867, and left the property by will to his wife, Mary A., his son, Cadet D., and his daughter, Kate E., Fiquet, jointly. In June, 1881, Kate E. Fiquet married B. F. Dickson, who, previous to his marriage to Kate E., renounced all his marital rights in her property. Subsequent to the marriage, and before her death, she, by proper deed of conveyance, conveyed this property to her husband, B. F. Dickson, and she died in 1882. Dickson at once took possession of the property, and afterwards conveyed it to George A. Searcy, from whom by mesne conveyances it reached Van Hoose and Perkins.

Note. — For discussion of the effect of other language in a deed to cut down the estate conveyed by the granting clause, see case note to Carl-Lee v. Ellsberry, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 956.

In 1888, upon a written declaration by Mary A. Fiquet that a partition of the property had been made, giving to Kate E. Fiquet these stores, but that no conveyance had been made by herself and Cadet D. Fiquet to Kate E., Van Hoose purchased from Cadet D. and W. F. Fiquet all their interest in the property, present and prospective, and received a warranty deed therefor. The present plaintiffs are the children of B. F. Dickson by his second marriage, and they base their claim upon the introductory recitals of the deed from Dickson to Searcy, which they claim show a reservation in Dickson, their father, of a reversionary interest in the property. After the institution of another suit in equity against Mrs. Whittaker to quiet her claim, an instrument was filed for record purporting to be a conveyance from Mary A. and Cadet Fiquet to Kate E. Fiquet, and dated January 1, 1881. It does not appear from the record where this deed came from nor by whom it was filed. It further appears that since March, 1883, defendants and their privies have been in continuous, adverse possession under claim of fee-simple ownership. The trial court held that a one-third interest in the property was in Van Hoose and Perkins by virtue of their purchase from Cadet and W. F. Fiquet, and that there was a reservation in the deed from Dickson to Searcy to the heirs of Dickson after the termination of the life estate. The holding of a two-third's interest in defendants and cross appellants seems to have been upon the theory that Van Hoose purchased Cadet D. Fiquet's one-third interest in fee without notice of the unrecorded deed from him to his sister Kate E., and that, by the recital of the deed to Searcy, plaintiffs' ancestor, Dickson, caused Van Hoose to purchase from Cadet D. and W. F. Fiquet their ostensible interest as heirs of their deceased sister.

Mr. Henry Flitts, for appellants:

The clear intention of the testator appears to have been to grant a life estate only; and in such case any repugnant or contradictory recitals should be rejected, and effect given to the true intent.

Messrs. Ormond Somerville, J. J. Mayfield, and Daniel Collier for appellees.

Denson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles J. Fiquet died in Tuscaloosa county in 1867, leaving a last will and testament. He left surviving him a widow and several children. He devised the property here in dispute to his widow, Mary Ann, his son, Cadet D., and his daughter Kate E., Fiquet. On January 1, 1881, according to plaintiffs' contention, Mary Ann and Cadet D. conveyed their interests in the property to Katie E. In June, 1881, Katie E. Fiquet intermarried with Barton F. Dickson; he having, at a time shortly prior to the marriage, but in contemplation of it, renounced his marital rights in the property of the said Katie E. It is shown by the evidence that, subsequent to the marriage, Katie E. executed to her husband, the said Barton F. Dickson, an absolute conveyance of all of her property, and that she died without issue in January, 1882. Dickson took possession of the property after his wife's death, and on the 4th of December, 1883, sold and conveyed the property involved in this litigation to George A. Searcy, whence, by mesne conveyances, defendants claim to have title to the property. Barton F. Dickson married a second time. He died May 10, 1904, leaving surviving him three children by the second wife, who are the plaintiffs in this case, and who claim title to the property sued for as the only heirs at law of their father.

Under the proof contained in the record, whether or not they have shown title to the property depends upon the construction which should be placed upon the deed executed by Dickson to Searcy; the precise point being whether that deed conveys only an estate terminable on the death of the grantor or an estate in fee. That the deed may be the more easily referred to, and its contents better kept in mind, we transcribe it here: "Whereas the late Mrs. Katie E. Dickson, now deceased, was seised and possessed in her lifetime in fee of the real property hereinafter described—the same then being a part of the corpus of her statutory separate estate under the laws of Alabama. And whereas Barton F. Dickson, who was the husband of the said Mrs. Kate E. Dickson, dec'd, has survived her; and under and by virtue of the laws of said state became entitled to the use and occupation of said real property for and during the term of his natural life; and (since the death of said Mrs. Katie E. Dickson), he has been in the quiet and undisturbed possession and enjoyment of the same. And whereas said Barton F. Dickson has agreed to sell to said Geo. A. Searcy his life estate and interest in the real property aforesaid. This indenture made and entered into between Barton F. Dickson, party of the first part, and George A. Searcy, party of the second part, witnesseth: That said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to him in hand paid by the party of the second part, at or before the enrolling and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents doth grant, bargain, and sell unto said party of the second part and to his heirs and assigns forever, all of the right, title, interest, estate, possession, claim and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity (of, in, and to the following described real property) of said party of the first part, and of every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances, that is to say: That portion [here follows the description of the property conveyed, it being all the property in dispute, which description we omit]. To have and to hold all and singular the life estate and interest which said party of the first part hath in the above mentioned and described premises together with the appurtenances, and no more, unto said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever. In witness whereof, said party of the first part hereunto sets his hand and seal this 4th day of December, 1883."

It is true the real inquiry in the construction of a deed is to establish the intention of the parties, especially that of the grantor; but a corollary to this rule is that the intention must, if possible, be gathered from the language used in the instrument submitted for construction, and that, when it can in this way be ascertained, arbitrary rules are not to be resorted to. If, however, two conflicting intentions are expressed, there is no alternative but to construe the deed by these rules even though they may be denominated arbitrary. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 2; 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 604 (11); 2 Devlin, Deeds, 1st ed. §§ 836, 837; Campbell v. Gilbert, 57 Ala. 569; Campbell v. Noble, 110 Ala. 394, 19 So. 28; May v. Ritchie, 65 Ala. 602; Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Hewett, 55 Wis. 96, 42 Am. Rep. 701, 12 N. W. 382; Maker v. Lazell, 83 Me. 562, 23 Am. St. Rep. 795, 797, 22 Atl. 474; Wilkins v. Norman, 139 N. C. 40, 111 Am. St. Rep. 767, 51 S. E. 797; Robinson v. Payne, 58 Miss. 690. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Looking alone to the granting clause in the deed in judgment, we think variant, judicial opinions in respect to its meaning an impossibility. Indeed, it will not admit of, nor does it call for, construction. It is couched in language fully and accurately expressive of an intention to convey to the grantee every interest the grantor owned in the lands conveyed, and to vest in the grantee a fee-simple estate.

But the plaintiffs insist that the part of the deed which precedes the granting clause manifests an intention of the grantor to convey the interest he owned in the lands or to which he was, by curtesy, entitled as tenant for life; and, further, that this theory is strengthened and made more tenable by the habendum clause. If this be true, then, bearing in mind what has been said of the granting clause, two conflicting intentions are expressed, and the deed should be construed according to the well-recognized rules of interpretation. Authorities, supra. One of the cardinal rules is that deeds of bargain and sale founded upon a valuable consideration are to be construed most strongly against the grantor and in favor of the grantee. Seay v. McCormick, 68 Ala. 549; 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 848, and cases cited in note 2 to the text; Lamb v. Medsker, 35 Ind. App. 662, 74 N. E. 1012; Whetstone v. Hunt, 78 Ark. 230, 93 S. W. 979. 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 443; Eudd v. Brooke, 3 Gill, 198, 43 Am. Dec. 321. Another is that the granting clause in a deed determines the interest conveyed, and that, unless there be repugnancy, obscurity, or ambiguity in that clause, it prevails over introductory statements or recitals in conflict therewith, and over the habendum, too, if that clause is contradictory or repugnant to it. Webb v. Webb, 29 Ala. 588, 606; McMillan v. Craft, 135 Ala. 148, 33 So. 26; Gould v. Womack, 2 Ala. 83; Kershaw v. Boykin, 1 Brev. 301; Huntington v. Havens, 5 Johns. Ch. 23; Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Hewett, supra; 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 619, 666; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 139, and cases cited on note 1 to text on page 140; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 8, and cases cited in note 6; Devlin, Deeds, 2d ed. § 838a; Wilkins v. Norman, supra; Berridge v. Glassey, 112 Pa. 442, 56 Am. Rep. 322, 3 Atl. 583; Whetstone v. Hunt, 78 Ark. 230, 93 S. W. 979, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 443; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. § 2360. The reason underlying the rule that introductory statements and recitals must yield to the granting clause is that they are nonessential to the validity of the deed, while the granting clause is its very essence. It has been said that the habendum must give way, because the granting clause is necessary to make the deed effective, while the habendum clause is not. Ratliffe v. Marrs, 87 Ky. 26, 7 S. W. 395, 8 S. W. 876. And by another court it has been said: "It is a rule in the construction of deeds that of two repugnant clauses therein the first shall prevail against the second; and, in accordance with this rule, . . . the meaning of the premises shall not be changed by the words of the habendum, that is, as to irreconcilable differences." Chamberlain v. Runkle, 28 Ind. App. 599, 63 N. E. 486; Hunter v. Patterson, 142 Mo. 310, 44 S. W. 250; Budd v. Brooke, supra. If, as contended by appellants, the habendum attempts to qualify and limit the estate granted to a life estate, then there can be no doubt that it irreconcilably conflicts with, and is repugnant to, the granting clause, for that clause is without any ambiguity or obscurity, and unequivocally conveys all the estate owned by the grantor in the premises to the grantee absolutely. Upon the premises stated, and proceeding in accordance with the rules and principles enunciated, it seems clear that the prefatory recitals and the habendum should yield to the granting clause in the deed here considered, and consequently that the deed should be held to convey all the interests of every description that the grantor owned in the premises to the grantee absolutely.

What has been written is not in conflict with any of our own decisions relied on by the appellants' counsel, when they are properly interpreted and applied. The cases referred to, it will be found upon investigation, enunciate correct rules in either of two categories: (1) When the granting clause is either silent or ambiguous; and (2) when it is necessary to give explanation or definition of words that are used in the premises of a deed. Thus the word "heirs" used in the premises may be construed by the aid of the habendum to mean "children," and vice versa. But the cases are not in point where there appears an irreconcilable conflict between the granting and habendum clauses. McCombs v. Stephenson (Ala.) 44 So. 867; Southern R. Co. v. Hays, 150 Ala. 212, 43 So. 487; Havens v. Sea Shore Land Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 365, 20 Atl. 497; Linville v. Greer, 105 Mo. 380, 65 S. W. 579. But, if we take the deed and construe it by its "four corners," without resorting to any rule that requires the exclusion of any part of it, there may still be legitimately evolved from it, we think, an intention on the part of the grantor to vest in the grantee every interest he owned in the premises conveyed. Its several parts, read together, are consonant with this idea. The deed evinces care and precision in its preparation. Besides, the evidence without conflict shows that it was drawn by a trained lawyer. It should be construed in all its parts "with respect to the actual, rightful state of the property at the time at which the deed was executed." 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 851, and cases cited in note 3 to the text. Of necessity, the plaintiffs' contention that the title is in them depends on the fact, or the assumption of the fact, that Barton F. Dickson had an interest in the land other than that of an estate by curtesy. Indeed, the uncontradicted testimony, as we have already recited, shows that he renounced his marital rights in the property of his wife, Katie E., and that subsequently she executed to him a deed to all of her property. And this was the status of the property at the time of her death, and at the time the deed to Searcy was executed. Dickson owned an absolute estate. All this being true, it seems that while the deed may manifest doubt in the minds of the grantor and scrivener as to the exact status of the grantor's title to the property, and the extent of his interest, yet it evinces an intention to pass to the grantee all the interest he possessed, whether as tenant by curtesy or otherwise. "Life estate" would have covered all the estate the surviving husband owned, if he claimed only an estate by curtesy; and the words "and interest" would, in such a state of the case, have been wholly unnecessary; but, having title otherwise than by curtesy, it was necessary to employ other words than "life estate" to cover and convey such title, and the words "and interest" are apt to designate and effectuate a conveyance of whatever other estate or ownership he had in the property. Smith v. Crosby, 86 Tex. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 818, 23 S. W. 10. Thus reading and construing the deed, we conclude that it was the purpose of the grantor to convey his life estate, if no more than that he owned, but, in all events, to vest the grantee with all the title he owned. This seems to be the predominant intention as reflected by the granting clause, and we think the habendum is reconcilable with this view. Such is the result obtained from the construction of the deed by its four corners, and the attendant circumstances (shown without conflict in the testimony) abundantly support the conclusion. It follows that the plaintiffs are without title to the property sued for, and cannot take anything by their appeal. It also follows that the court erred in adjudging plaintiffs entitled to recover an undivided one-third interest in the property sued for, together with damages for detention.

Upon the cross appeal the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and a judgment will be here rendered to the effect that plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and adjudg-ing the costs of the suit in the court below, together with the costs of these appeals (direct and cross), against them.

Reversed and rendered on the cross appeal.

CHARITY JONES et al.

(— Ark. —, 113 S. W. 29.)

Widow's allowance—surplus from foreclosure.

The surplus arising from a foreclosure sale of decedent's real estate after his death is not to be regarded as personalty within the operation of a statute allowing the widow and minor children a certain sum out of personalty left by him.

(October 12, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Phillips Coun-

Case Note.—Is surplus realized upon foreclosure sale of real estate after mortgagor's death to be deemed real or personal property?

As, at the decease of a mortgagor, his equity of redemption in encumbered land descends as realty, the surplus arising from a subsequent foreclosure sale will possess the same character and descend to his heirs or devisees, instead of to his personal representatives. Wright v. Rose, 2 Sim. & Stu. 323; Bourne v. Bourne, 2 Hare, 35; Matson v. Swift, 8 Beav. 374; Shaw v. Hoadley, 8 Blackf. 165; Varnum v. Meserve, 90 Mass. 158; Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119, 7 Am. Dec. 478; Dunning v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 497, 19 Am. Rep. 293; Fliess v. Buckley, 90 N. Y. 286, affirming 22 Hun, 551; Delafield v. White, 7 N. Y. S. R. 301 (affirmed in 43 Hun, 641); Cox v. McBurney, 2 Sandf. 561; Snow v. Warwick Inst. for Sav. 17 R. I. 66, 20 Atl. 94; Re Knapp, 25 Misc. 133, 54 N. Y. Supp. 927; Chaffee v. Franklin, 11 R. I. 578; Allen v. Allen, 12 R. I. 301.

While the doctrine above stated was applied in Varnum v. Meserve, supra, it was also held that the mortgagor's personal representative might recover such surplus where the mortgage stipulated that the surplus arising from the sale, if any, should be paid to the mortgagor or his assigns. The contrary, however, was held in Dunning v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 497, 19 Am. Rep. 293.

ty allowing petitioners a sum out of the estate of John Jones, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Campbell & Stevenson and J. M. Vineyard, for appellant:

The surplus after the sale of the equity of redemption was realty.

The decree of the chancellor converted the estate into personalty, and as such the widow and minors are entitled to the statutory allowance.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was held in Beard v. Smith, 71 Ala. 568, in harmony with KITCHENS v. JONES, that, as such surplus is realty, the mortgagor's widow is not entitled to have a deficiency in the statutory amount of the deceased's personalty, to which she is entitled, made up therefrom.

So, a husband's estate by the curtesy may be set off to him in the surplus arising from a foreclosure sale of his wife's realty, made after her death, under a deed of trust in which he joined, as such surplus is deemed realty. Robinson v. Lakeman, 28 Mo. App. 135.

A surplus arising from a foreclosure sale made after the mortgagor's decease will be treated as realty, in which his widow is entitled to dower, irrespective of whether she was a party to the mortgage. Cornog v. Cornog, 3 Del. Ch. 407; Mantz v. Buchanan, 1 Md. Ch. 202; Hinchman v. Stiles, 9 N. J. Eq. 361, S. C. 454; Hawley v. Bradford, 9 Paige, 200, 37 Am. Dec. 390; Tabele v. Tabele, 1 Johns. Ch. 45; Titus v. Neilson, 5 Johns. Ch. 452; Smith v. Jackson, 2 Edw. Ch. 28; Matthews v. Dur- yee, 4 Keyes, 525, affirming 45 Barb. 69; Clarkson v. Skidmore, 46 N. Y. 297; *Fox v. C.) 174; Thorpe v. Richards, 15 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 403.

And this doctrine was applied in Pickett v. Buckner, 45 Miss. 226, notwithstanding the owner of certain real estate in the city of Helena, which was encumbered by a deed of trust. Default had occurred in the performance of the conditions of the deed of trust before his death, and, after his death, the deed was foreclosed in the chancery court, and the property sold by a commissioner of the court to satisfy the mortgage debt. The proceeds of the sale paid off the mortgage and left a surplus of $554.57, which was turned over by the commissioner in chancery to Kitchens, public administrator, who was administering the estate of Jones. The land was not the homestead of the deceased. The dower rights of the widow had been released in the trust deed. This surplus was the only asset of the estate, which was insolvent. Charity Jones filed a petition in the probate court of Phillips county, representing that she was the widow, and that there were minor children, of the said John Jones, deceased; that the estate of her husband exceeded $300 in value; and she prayed that the sum of $300 be paid to her out of said fund for the use of herself and minor children. Trial was had in the probate court, and, on appeal, in the circuit court, upon an agreed statement of facts. The circuit judge granted the petition, and the administrator has appealed.

This appeal involves a construction of § 3 of Kirby's Digest, which reads as follows: "When any person shall die leaving a widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, and it shall be made to appear to the court that the personal estate of such deceased person does not exceed in value the sum of $300, the court shall make an order vesting such personal property absolutely in the widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, as the case may be, when the court is satisfied that reasonable funeral expenses of such persons not to exceed $25 have been paid or secured; and in all cases where the personal estate exceeds in value the sum of $300, the widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, as the case may be, may retain the amount of $300 out of such personal property at its appraised valuation." In Wilson v. Masie, 70 Ark. 25, 65 S. W. 942, it was held that this statute repealed the pre-existing statutes upon this subject, and effected a change in the law from an estimate of the whole mass of the decedent's property to an estimate of the personal property alone in making this allowance to the widow and minor children. This case, therefore, turns upon the character of the estate of Jones in the mortgaged property. In State use of Ashley v. Lawson, 6 Ark. 269, the court said: "The equity of redemption is considered to be the real and beneficial estate, tantamount to the fee at law, and is accordingly held to be descendible by inheritance, devisable by will, and alienable by deed, precisely as if it were an estate of inheritance at law." The nature of the equity of redemption is thus stated in the encyclopædia: "An equity of redemption is an estate in the mortgaged property, and is subject to all the incidents of ownership. It may be conveyed or devised. It descends to the owner's heirs or personal representatives according to the nature of the mortgaged property, and is subject to curtesy and homestead." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 209, 210. The text is well supported by authority, including several Arkansas cases cited in the note. It is clear, therefore, that the equity of redemption left by Jones at his death was real property, and descended as real property descends.

The question remains whether its conversion into cash through the foreclosure of the mortgage changed its character within the meaning of this statute. The argument is made that the power of conversion is well the legal title to encumbered realty is vested in the mortgagee.

Notwithstanding a widow who joined in a mortgage of partnership realty is entitled to dower in the surplus from a foreclosure sale of partnership realty, made after the death of one copartner, still, as to partnership creditors, such surplus will be regarded as personalty. Smith v. Jackson, 2 Edw. Ch. 28.

But the delay of a widow in asserting her dower right to such surplus until after a portion has been paid by the sheriff, who made the sale, to a judgment creditor of the husband, will defeat her right thereto in the absence of fraud or collusion against her, as it is then impossible to restore the judgment creditor to statu quo, as his judgment lien cannot be restored. Gemmill v. Richardson, 4 Del. Ch. 599.

authority for endowing a widow in the surplus arising from a foreclosure sale subsequent to the mortgagor's death. Virgin v. Virgin, 189 Ill. 144, 59 N. E. 586, affirming 91 Ill. App. 188; Ratliffe v. Mason, 92 Ky. 190, 17 S. W. 438, modifying 14 S. W. 960; Burrall v. Bender, 61 Mich. 608, 28 N. W. 731; Hall v. Marshall, 139 Mich. 123, 111 Am. St. Rep. 404, 102 N. W. 658; Burnet v. Burnet, 46 N. J. Eq. 144, 18 Atl. 374.

And this doctrine was applied in Gwynne v. Estes, 14 Lea, 662, under such a statute, notwithstanding the mortgage expressly stipulated that any surplus should be paid to the mortgagor.

And dower may be set out in the proceeds of such a sale where the husband died after a decree for, but prior to, the sale. Holden v. Dunn, 144 Ill. 413, 19 L.R.A. 481, 33 N. E. 413.

established, and that the chancery court had the right to convert the realty into personality; and, having that right, that it changed the character of the property. A consideration of the cases cited may be useful. Coolidge v. Burke, 89 Ark. 237, 62 S. W. 583, and Lenow v. Fones, 48 Ark. 557, 4 S. W. 56, were cases where the surviving partner converted partnership assets from one class of property to another, and it was held that the property passed in its converted state.

The same principle was recently recognized in French v. Vanatta, 83 Ark. 306, 104 S. W. 141. There is a radical difference between those cases and this. The estate of a partner does not take a share of the partnership assets until the partnership is wound up; and a surviving partner, or a court, in order to wind it up, may convert it, and naturally the asset coming from the partnership should descend in the form in which it falls into the estate. But in the case at bar the right of the widow and minor heirs accrued, under the plain terms of the statute, at the time of the death of the husband and father, and not at a later time, when, in the course of the administration of his estate, his property has been changed from realty to personality. In Loffis v. Glass, 15 Ark. 680, and Turner v. Davis, 41 Ark. 270, the interest under consideration was the proceeds of a sale of real estate, and not the real estate itself; and it was held that the interest was personality. That is not true here, for the inheritance was not of the proceeds, but of the land itself, subject to the mortgage, which could have been discharged at any time by the payment of the mortgage debt. In Re Simmons, 55 Ark. 485, 18 S. W. 933, after stating the rule that, where a conversion is rightfully made, whether by court or trustee, all the consequences of conversion must follow, the court, through Chief Justice Cockrill, said: "It may be that this statement of the rule is subject to the explanation or qualification that the conversion takes effect only to the extent of the purpose for which conversion was required, where, for example, a surplus remains from the proceeds of land sold to satisfy a decree of foreclosure. In such a case the conversion to raise a surplus over the decree and costs was not required, and was probably not intended by the court; and the rights of the parties in interest, it is held, remain the same as if no conversion had taken place, although the sale was rightful." This statement of the principle is absolutely conclusive here, and is in accord with the authorities, as will be seen by those cited in the opinion.

Mr. Woerner thus states the same principle: "By the sale the real estate is converted into money. But the conversion is complete and effectual only to the extent and for the purposes for which the sale was authorized, whether by the will or by the order of the court. So far as these purposes do not extend, and in so far as any of them do not take effect, in fact or in law, the property retains its former character in respect of the rights of its owner, and passes accordingly. The surplus of the proceeds of a sale ordered for the payment of debts remaining after the debts and expenses of administration have been discharged retains the character of real estate for the purpose of determining who is entitled to receive it, and goes to the persons to whom the real estate would have gone but for the conversion." 2 Woerner, American Law of Administration, § 481. The status of the decedent's estate is fixed under this statute when he dies, and the allowance contemplated by it must be made out of the personal property as it then existed, and not from the proceeds of realty which may thereafter assume personal form. In this case his equity of redemption descended at his death to his widow and children, according to the statute of descents and distribution, as realty. Its subsequent conversion to pay the debt against it does not let them in to share in it as personal property, for the only purpose of the conversion was to pay the mortgage debt, and not to change the status of the property.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity to this opinion.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

THOMAS B. WALKER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

SHASTA POWER COMPANY.

(87 C. C. A. 660, 160 Fed. 856.)

Eminent domain — private use — effect on right.

1. That a corporation seeking by right of eminent domain property necessary to enable it to generate a supply of electricity has power to serve a private use will not defeat its application for property which Case Note. — Eminent domain; generation of electricity for sale to public for the purposes of power as a public purpose.

The question as to the effect of mingling a private with a public purpose on the right to exercise the power of eminent domain is not within the scope of this note.

As shown in the note to State ex rel. Tacoma Industrial Co. v. White River Power Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 842, there is a dehouse and installed therein machinery sufficient to generate electricity by the use of the water to the extent of more than 2,000 horse power, and constructed a pole line about 27 miles in length for the purpose of transmitting the electricity thus generated to a substation which it had constructed in the city of Redding. In the substation it had installed machinery and had extended pole lines therefrom throughout the city of Redding for the purpose of distributing electricity. It commenced the present suit for the purpose of condemning a right of way for its ditch and flume over the lands of the plaintiff in error. It alleged in the bill that its purpose was to supply, by means of electricity and electric power, the necessary public needs in the county of Shasta and elsewhere in the state of California for light, heat, and power, and to supply a necessary public use as aforesaid; that it would be impossible to utilize its water for said necessary public use except by taking the same out of Bear creek, and conducting the same, by means of its ditch, along its surveyed and established ditch line, over and across the land of the plaintiff in error; and further alleged that a large part of the public in general and a large proportion of the inhabitants and citizens, residents, house-self into a public service corporation by a mere offer to serve the public and submit to legislative control.

So the same court, in State ex rel. Shropshire v. Superior Ct. (Wash.) 99 Pac. 3, held that the supplying of water for boilers in order to generate steam for power purposes for private manufacturing concerns is not a public purpose, and rejected the contention that, when water is furnished to a mill proprietor, it is furnished to an inhabitant for his use just as in the case of furnishing to a home.

State ex rel. Harris v. Olympia Light & P. Co. 46 Wash, 511, 90 Pac. 656, is not opposed to the other decision on this point, as the court there merely upheld the right to condemn land for purposes of furnishing electric power to operate a street railway, the operation of which itself is a public purpose; rejecting the contention that the right of eminent domain should not be permitted for such purpose because the corporation's articles authorize the furnishing of power to individuals, which is not a public use, and because it is possible for the corporation successfully to evade detection in case such power is furnished to individuals after condemnation for a public use.

The decision in State ex rel. Dominick v. Superior Ct. (Wash.) 100 Pac. 317, is merely to the effect that the fact that a corporation seeking to exercise the power of eminent domain will sell and deliver a portion of its electrical power to third persons and corporations, to be by them used for public and municipal lighting and in the operation of railroads and railways,—purposes which, in themselves, are public,—does not afford a sufficient reason for denying to it the right of eminent domain. The court said it was unnecessary to determine to what extent a public service corporation may use electricity generated for public purposes for purposes previously denominated private, or whether it may acquire property by condemnation to generate electricity to be disposed of, independently of its necessities as a public service corporation, under the act of March 13, 1907, which provides that, under certain conditions, a corporation authorized to condemn property for the purpose of generating electrical power for certain public purposes 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) therein mentioned may sell electric light outside the limits of a municipality, and electric power both inside and outside such limits, to private consumers, from the electricity generated and transmitted by it for public purposes and not needed by it therefor. The court remarked, however, that it was questionable whether the legislature by that act intended merely to enlarge or extend the uses that might be made of electricity generated for public purposes, and not needed therefor, or whether it intended to enlarge the power of eminent domain itself; adding that, if the former was intended, the act would seem to be entirely free from constitutional objection, while, in the latter case, its validity would be very questionable. In view of the previous rulings of the court. The court, however, did not undertake to decide either the purpose of the legislature or the validity of the act.

The Virginia court of appeals in Miller v. Pulaski (Va.) 63 S. E. 880, adhering to its decision in Fallsburg Power & Mfg. Co. v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 61 L.R.A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855, 43 S. E. 194, while conceding that the furnishing of light to the inhabitants of a town is a public use, held that the furnishing of electric light or power to "other persons, companies, or corporations" is not a public use for which the power of eminent domain may be exercised.

The furnishing of electricity for the use of inhabitants in a thickly-settled and extensive territory, for illuminating purposes and for the use of extensive street surface railroads, constitutes a public use for which the power of eminent domain may be exercised. Re Niagara, L. & O. Power Co. 111 App. Div. 686, 97 N. Y. Supp. 853.

The decision in Re East Canada Creek Electric Light & P. Co. 49 Misc. 505, 99 N. Y. Supp. 109, is merely to the effect that the furnishing of light to a municipality is a public purpose for which a private corporation may exercise the power of eminent domain.

As to effect of offer to serve public on right to resort to eminent domain in aid of attempt to transmute water power into electricity for sale, see case note to Jones v. North Georgia Electric Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 122.

holders, and freeholders within the county of Shasta and elsewhere in the state of California, are not supplied with electricity or electric current for heat, light, or power, and the supplying of electricity and electric current for heat, light, and power to the public in general, and to the inhabitants, citizens, residents, householders, and freeholders within the county of Shasta and elsewhere in the state of California, is and was, at all of the times therein mentioned, a public necessity, and that the right of way over the said land of said defendant, T. B. Walker, sought to be condemned, is necessary for said public use. The answer denied, on information and belief, that the defendant in error was organized for the purpose set forth in the complaint, and denied, upon information and belief, that its purpose was "to generate or transmit or furnish electricity or electric current to the public in general or to all inhabitants or persons within the county of Shasta or elsewhere in the state of California for the necessary public use or use of light or power or heat," and alleged that the plaintiff in error "believes, and upon information and belief alleges, that it is the purpose of the corporation to sell electricity and electric current to such persons as the board of directors shall deem proper," etc.; "that it is not the purpose of said plaintiff to furnish electricity or electric current to every individual member of the community in the county of Shasta, or any community, who shall demand or request the delivery thereof, but that said corporation only proposes to deliver electricity and electric current which it does not use itself, and to deliver such portions which it does not use itself only to such persons and in such locality and in such manner as the board of directors of said plaintiff shall deem proper." Upon the issues and evidence the court found as facts, among others, that the defendant in error, immediately after its organization in 1904, acquired the right to divert and use 3,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, of the waters of Hat creek and other creeks in the county of Shasta, and commenced the construction of its ditches as alleged in the bill, and as set forth in the statement of the facts; "that said plaintiff is not engaged in any private business, nor has it for its own private purposes any use for any of said electricity except such as may be necessary for the heat and light of its said works, which are incidental to the said public use aforesaid; that it is necessary for said plaintiff to conduct water by means of said ditches, flumes, and pipe lines at large expense as above found to its said water house, and to use the said water to operate such machinery for the purpose of supplying 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the public of said Shasta county as hereinbefore found, and for such public uses as hereinbefore found." The court decreed to the defendant in error a right of way for its ditch across the lands of the plaintiff in error upon payment to him of the sum of $742.30 and the costs of suit.

The final order of condemnation recites: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged; and decreed that the strip of land hereinafter described, being the land described in the complaint herein, as sought to be taken by the plaintiff, be and the same is hereby finally condemned for the use of plaintiff for a right of way for the ditch described in the complaint herein, and for the purpose of construction, maintenance, and operation thereon of said ditch and the running of water therein, and for the purpose of using the same by plaintiff in the construction, maintenance of said ditch, and the running of water across the said land of said defendant in the said ditch, solely for the public use described in said complaint and the findings and judgment heretofore made and entered herein." Upon the trial there was no evidence showing, or tending to show, that the defendant in error was engaged in any private business or intended to engage therein. It offered to prove as part of its case that it did not intend to engage in any private business, and it adduced testimony that it had not erected any works or engaged in any private enterprise to use any portion of the power, light, or heat. On the trial, for the purpose of showing that it had deprived itself of the power to engage in the private enterprise permitted by its articles of incorporation, it offered in evidence amended articles of incorporation which it had adopted since the commencement of the suit, in which it had eliminated from its powers the power to engage in any private enterprise whatever. Objection to such evidence was made on the ground that the amendment was made subsequent to the commencement of the suit, and the objection was sustained. The allegations of the bill that a large part of the public in general, and a large portion of the citizens, residents, householders, and freeholders within the county of Shasta and elsewhere in the state of California, were not supplied with electricity or electric current for light, heat, or power, and that the supplying of the same for such purposes to the public in general and to the inhabitants, citizens, etc., within the county of Shasta and elsewhere in the state of California, was, at all of the times mentioned, a public necessity, was denied in the answer.

Argued before Gilbert and Ross, Circuit Judges, and De Haven, District Judge.

Messrs. A. E. Bolton and Reid & Dozier, for plaintiff in error:

Ill. 576, 63 L.R.A. 582, 98 Am. St. Rep. 235, 68 N. E. 522.

Gilbert, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question first to be determined is whether the use for which condemnation is sought is a public use. Section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California makes provision for the exercise of the right of eminent domain in behalf of public uses, and enumerates, among other public uses, the following: "Canals, reservoirs, dams, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, and pipes for supplying and storing water for the operation of machinery for the purpose of generating and transmitting electricity for the supplying of mines, quarries, railroads, tramways, mills, and factories with electrical power; and also for the supplying electricity to light or heat mines, quarries, mills, factories, incorporated cities and counties, villages or towns; [and also for furnishing electricity for lighting, heating, or power purposes to individuals or corporations] together with lands, buildings, and all other improvements in or upon which to erect, install, place, use, or operate machinery for the purpose of generating and transmitting electricity for any of the purposes or uses above set forth."

There can be no doubt that within this provision the furnishing of electricity as it is proposed to be furnished by the defendant in error is a use for which the legislature intended that the right of eminent domain might be exercised. The purpose of the statute is to remove obstacles in the way of development and progress in the state, and it is in harmony with the Constitution and with § 1001 of the Civil Code, which gives to any person, without further legislative action, the power to acquire property for any of the uses specified in § 1238, "either by consent of the owner or by proceedings had under the provisions of title 7, part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and any person seeking to acquire property for any of the uses mentioned in such title, is 'an agent of the state' or a 'person in charge of such use' within the meaning of those terms as used in such title."

The legislature cannot by its enactments make that a public use which is essentially a private use, and the question whether the use is public in its nature is a judicial question, to be determined by the courts. But it is the general rule that, where it is uncertain and doubtful whether the use to which the property is proposed to be devoted is of a public or a private character, the legislative determination of the question is of persuasive force, and the courts will 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) not undertake to disturb the same. It has been so held in California. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674; Re Madera Irrig. Dist. Bonds, 92 Cal. 296, 14 L.R.A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, 28 Pac. 272, 675; San Mateo County v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 Pac. 78, 621. And it has been generally held by the courts that the generation of electric power for distribution and sale to the public on equal terms is a public enterprise, and that water used for that purpose is devoted to a public use. Rockingham County Light & P. Co. v. Hobbs, 72 N. H. 531, 66 L.R.A. 581, 58 Atl. 46; Hollister v. State, 9 Idaho, 8, 71 Pac. 541; Grande Ronde Electrical Co. v. Drake, 46 Or. 243, 78 Pac. 1031; Re Niagara, L. & O. Power Co. 111 App. Div. 686, 97 N. Y. Supp. 853; Minnesota Canal & Power Co. v. Koochiching Co. 97 Minn. 429, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 638, 107 N. W. 405, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1182. In the case last cited the supreme court of Minnesota said: "Electric lighting is universally recognized as a public enterprise, in aid of which the right of eminent domain may be invoked."

In Rockingham County Light & P. Co. v. Hobbs, 72 N. H. 531-535, 66 L.R.A. 581, 58 Atl. 46, the court said: "Like water, electricity exists in nature in some form or state, and becomes useful as an agency of man's industry only when collected and controlled. It requires a large capital to collect, store, and distribute it for general use. The cost depends largely upon the location of the power plant. A water-power or a location upon tide-water reduces the cost materially. It may happen that the business cannot be inaugurated without the aid of the power of eminent domain, for the acquisition of necessary land or rights in land. All these considerations tend to show that the use of land for collecting, storing, and distributing electricity for the purposes of supplying power and heat to all who may desire it is a public use similar in character to the use of land for collecting, storing, and distributing water for public needs,—a use that is so manifestly public 'that it has been seldom questioned, and never denied.'"

But both private purposes and public uses are contemplated in the articles of incorporation of the defendant in error, as those articles stood at the time of the commencement of the suit. On that ground its power to exercise the right of eminent domain for the promotion of the public purposes is challenged, the contention being that, when such purposes are so blended, the want of power to exercise the right of eminent domain for the private purpose excludes its exercise for any public use. But the question whether the exercise of the right of eminent domain is to be denied or withheld is not to be tested solely by the description of the objects and purposes set forth in the articles of incorporation. It may be governed by evidence aliunde showing the actual purpose in view. Re Niagara Falls & W. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 375, 15 N. E. 429. "The fact that the charter powers of a corporation to which the power of eminent domain has been delegated embrace both private purpose and public use does not deprive it of the right of eminent domain in the promotion of the public use." 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 579; Lake Koen Nav. Reservoir & Irrig. Co. v. Klein, 63 Kan. 484, 65 Pac. 684; Cole v. Cumberland County, 78 Me. 532, 7 Atl. 397; Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 70 L.R.A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785. Cases are cited which are said to hold the contrary; but they are all cases in which there is absence of proof of the actual purpose of the plaintiff in the condemnation proceedings to sever the public use from the private use, and to exercise the right of eminent domain solely for the former. Thus, in Fallsburg Power & Mfg. Co. v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 61 L.R.A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855, 43 S. E. 194, the corporation was created by a special act of the general assembly and given authority to manufacture and generate electrical or other power, light, or heat, and utilize and transmit and distribute the same to any place or places for its own use or for the use of other individuals and corporations. The company proceeded to condemn lands and water rights for that purpose "for the company's use or for the use of other individuals or corporations." The court held that, since it had power under its charter to devote only a share, or none at all, of its products to public use, the public could not be said to have such a definite right to the use of its product as to render constitutional the provision giving it the right of eminent domain. Said the court: "In such a case the private benefit too clearly dominates the public interest to find constitutional authority for the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and is the equivalent of taking of private property for a private use."

So, in Berrien Springs Water Power Co. v. Berrien Circuit Judge, 133 Mich. 48, 103 Am. St. Rep. 438, 94 N. W. 379, the plaintiff in the condemnation suit was incorporated under an act which authorized it to acquire water rights and water for private and public purposes. In its petition for condemnation it alleged that it required certain lands "for the purposes of its incorporation, and that the taking thereof is necessary for the public use and benefit." The court denied the right of condemnation, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) saying: "After the water power is erected, though it may be used for a public purpose, relator has the option to use it entirely for private purposes."

But in that case the court sustained the doctrine that land can be taken under the power of eminent domain for a legitimate purpose, even though a private purpose will be thereby incidentally served. In Gaylord v. Sanitary Dist. 204 Ill. 576, 63 L.R.A. 582, 98 Am. St. Rep. 235, 68 N. E. 522, the petitioner in condemnation proceedings alleged in his petition that he was about to build a public gristmill under an act of the legislature authorizing the condemnation of private property for the purpose of public mills and machinery other than public gristmills, and that he was also about to construct other machinery and operate a mill and other public machinery. The court held that to constitute a public use such as will justify the taking of private property, the contemplated improvement must be one which the public to some extent will have a right to use, and not one which is merely a benefit to the public, and that authority to condemn private property for public use does not justify the taking of such property for a public and also a private use. Of similar import are Atty. Gen. v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400, and State ex rel. Harris v. Superior Ct. 42 Wash. 660, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 672, 85 Pac. 666, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 748. In the latter case the testimony was to the effect that the condemnation was sought for the purpose of obtaining additional power, "not only for use in operating the light plant and electric car system, but for the purpose of selling power to the different manufactories and for different purposes." The court held that, for all these purposes, the petitioner was not entitled to exercise the right of eminent domain, since the use was not a public one. We find no case which holds that the bare fact that a corporation has, in enumerating its functions, expressed a purpose of engaging in a private enterprise as well as serving a public use, shall deprive it of the right to exercise eminent domain for the public use. Not only is there no authority for such a proposition, but there is no reason for it. Why should the fact that the defendant in error here was incorporated under articles giving it the power to serve a private use be an obstacle to its condemnation of property necessary, and which it proposes and proves shall be used exclusively, for a public service? The fact that it has such power imposes no greater or additional burden or servitude upon the property which it seeks and proposes to take for the public use only.

On the trial the plaintiff in error offered to prove the rights of others to use for irrigation the waters of Hat creek and Lost creek, and to show that, under the appropriation of the defendant in error, there was no water subject to appropriation. This evidence was excluded as irrelevant and immaterial, and we find no error therein. In the first place, the plaintiff in error had not put in issue the allegation of the bill that the defendant in error was the owner of 3,000 inches of water. The denial was "that the plaintiff in error is the owner, or ever was the owner of, or entitled to, 3,000 miner's inches or any water or waters which are to be conducted by plaintiff, or can be conducted by plaintiff, by means of its ditch or flume, or at all, into Bear creek." This did not put in issue the allegation that the defendant in error was the owner of the water which it claimed to have appropriated. Again, if an issue had been raised upon that allegation, the question of the rights of other appropriators of the water was not before the court. The owners of such rights were not parties to the suit. The use intended to be subserved through the condemnation proceedings being a public use, the defendant in error could, if necessary, institute further suits for the condemnation of the rights of other appropriators.

We find no error for which the judgment should be reversed. It is accordingly affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JAMES K. SCOTT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

AVERY B. TUBBS.

(43 Colo. 221, 95 Pac. 540.)

Jury — misconduct — new trial.

A verdict recovered by a party who, pending the action, took jurors to the bar to drink in the absence of other jurors and the officers in charge of them, will be set aside at the instance of the other party; and he will be required to pay the costs regardless of the absence of wrongful intent or the fact that the verdict was not influenced thereby.

(April 6, 1908.)

ERROR to the Summit County Court to review a judgment in favor of petitioner in a proceeding to secure a right of way for an irrigating canal by right of eminent domain. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James F. Callbreath, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Steele, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought under the statute 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

entitled "Eminent Domain," and had for its purpose the condemnation of the plaintiff in error's land to the use of the defendant in error for an irrigating canal. A jury assessed the plaintiff's damages at $40. Judgment was entered upon the verdict. The costs, amounting to $303.50, were taxed against the plaintiff in error. Several assignments of error are discussed in the brief, but we shall ignore all but one,—that relating to the improper conduct of the jury. Before proceeding to a consideration of the assignment of error mentioned, we direct attention to the opinion of this court in the case Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. v. Four Mile R. Co. 29 Colo. 90, 66 Pac. 902, wherein the statutes providing for the summoning of a jury in proceedings under the eminent-domain act are construed. Upon the day set for the hearing, at the request of petitioner, it was ordered that the jury inspect the premises sought to be condemned. After the examination of the premises, and before returning to the court room, four of the jurors, apart from the officer in charge of the jury, went to a saloon in company of the petitioner, defendant in error here, and at his invitation drank with him at the bar of the saloon. This was conclusively shown by the affidavits filed in support of the motion for a new trial. Two of the jurors state in Case Note. — Treating jurors as ground title for new trial or reversal.

The word "treating," as used in the title of this note, has been taken to include what is ordinarily known as a treat, that is, something furnished by way of entertainment, as, for instance, drinks, cigars, food, and lodging. The question of the effect of furnishing free conveyances or extending other civilities to jurors has not been included.

This question has been considered in a large number of cases, and for the most part there is uniformity in the decisions. The great weight of authority holds with SCOTT v. TUBBS, that a verdict rendered by a jury any of whose members has been treated by one having an interest in the case must be set aside, and in nearly all cases the rule is applied without regard to its actual influence on the verdict.

Treat by party.

The above principle was applied in the following cases where the treat was by a party. Phillipsburg Bank v. Fulmer, 31 N. J. L. 52, 86 Am. Dec. 193; Bender v. Buehrer, 8 Ohio C. C. 244; Goodright v. M'Causland, 1 Yeates, 372, 1 Am. Dec. 306 (dictum); Redmond v. Royal Ins. Co. 7 Phila. 187; Keegan v. McCandless, 7 Phila. 248; Myntatt v. Hubbs, 6 Heisk. 320; Sexton v. Lelievre, 4 Coldw. 11; Palm v. Chernowsky, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 67 S. W. 165; Harvester Co. v. Hodge, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 378; Pickens v. Coal River Boom & Timber Co. 58 W. Va. 11, 50 S. E. 872, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas.

their affidavit that the petitioner took them to a saloon and treated them, but that their verdict was not influenced thereby, and that they did not know they had been doing wrong. The court offered to set aside the verdict and to grant a new trial upon the payment of the costs by the respondent, but the respondent refused to take a new trial upon the terms proposed. Judgment was then entered, and the respondent appealed.

A new trial should have been granted, and the petitioner should have been required to pay the costs. Such action on the part of the petitioner and the jurors cannot be tolerated, and to excuse such conduct would be to render a trial in a court of justice a farce. It may be that the petitioner and jurors were entirely innocent of any wrong intent, and that no wrong or injustice was in fact done, but the opportunity for wrongdoing under the conditions shown in the affidavit is so great that we must, in order to maintain the integrity of judicial procedure, reverse the case. Jurors who separate from the other jurors and the officer in whose charge they are, and accept entertainment from one of the parties while they are considering the case, are guilty of such misconduct that a verdict rendered by them has not the appearance even of being fair and impartial. And a party who so far forgets his position as a litigant as to furnish entertainment for jurors who are to pass upon the merits of the controversy in which he is engaged should not complain if a verdict in his favor by jurors with whom he has been in such close communication and to whom he has furnished drink is set aside on motion of his adversary. Nor should the court consider whether the verdict was or was not influenced by the petitioner. The conduct complained of is so manifestly improper that there is but one course open. Nor shall we consider what other courts have done under similar circumstances. Questions like these cannot be determined by the weight of authority, unless there be a doubt in our minds as to the course for us to pursue; and, as no doubt exists, we shall reverse the judgment.

In Doud v. Guthrie, 13 Ill. App. 653, the jury was permitted to view the premises at the entire expense of one of the parties, upon the refusal of the other to contribute, including conveyance, entertainment, and treats. The court, in remanding the cause for a new trial, made the following comment: "A trial attended with such concomitants was worse than a farce, and to suffer a verdict obtained under such circumstances to stand would be a reproach to the administration of the law."

Producing in court and offering to the jury refreshments is improper and reprehensible conduct on the part of a litigant, and demands a reversal of the judgment rendered. Lyons v. Lawrence, 12 Ill. App. 531.

Entertaining a juror for the night at the house of one friendly to a party, at the latter's instance, is a ground for reversing a judgment, even though the juror was uninfluenced thereby in his opinion of the case. Cottle v. Cottle, 6 Me. 140, 19 Am. Dec. 200.

Where counsel for one party refused to share the expense of providing meals for the jury, and, no provision for them having been made, the other party furnished and paid for the same, such circumstances furnish ground for setting aside the verdict, although it does not appear that it was determined thereby. Johnson v. Hobart, 45 Fed. 542.

A new trial was granted in Detroit & T. Shore Line R. Co. v. Campbell, 140 Mich. 384, 103 N. W. 856, because, while viewing land taken in condemnation proceedings, the jury were furnished with cigars, meals, and even drinks, by the plaintiff's representatives.

But Gould v. Gould, 3 N. S. 87, holds that the fact that a party to an action had entertained one of the jurymen over night and furnished him with spirituous liquors at his own cost is not sufficient ground for new trial.

That one of the jurors drank liquors at the instance and solicitation of a defendant in an action does not necessitate a reversal of the verdict rendered against a codefendant. Webster County v. Hutchinson, 60 Iowa, 721, 9 N. W. 901, 12 N. W. 534.

The treating of jurymen, by a party, with cigars and peanuts, is not regarded as a good ground for setting aside a verdict, in Drainage Comrs. v. Knox, 237 Ill. 148, 86 N. E. 636.

In McCarty v. McCarty, 4 Rich. L. 594, the court holds that the exercise of a sound discretion would not authorize the avoidance of a verdict eminently just, although there was evidence tending to show that some of the jurors were drinking with one of the parties to the action, and that the latter paid for the drinks ordered.

The furnishing of cigars by a party to the members of a jury during the progress of a trial was characterized as improper and reprehensible in Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fechheimer, 49 Kan. 643, 31 Pac. 127; but the court said: "Unless such conduct may have influenced the jury in some manner, it should not destroy their verdict afterward rendered. In this case nearly all the evidence . . . was in parol, and it was heard by the judge of the trial court, who heard all the testimony given during the whole progress of the case; and, evidently he did not believe that the transaction with reference to these cigars had any influence upon the verdict of the jury, and we think it should not have had any such influence; and, therefore, with some hesitancy and some reluctance, we must say that we cannot hold that the court below erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial, founded upon this ground."

Providing food and liquor to jurors at the request of an engineer, who, with the sheriff, was in charge of the jury for the purpose of viewing the defendant's premises, does not furnish sufficient reason for setting aside a verdict where nothing was shown to indicate that what was done by the defendant was done with the intention of influencing the jury. The facts that he refrained from conversing with them, that he did not volunteer to furnish them food and drink, and did so only after being informed by the engineer that nothing he might do there would influence them, and that he remained in the room only when it was unavoidable, are considered by the court sufficient indications that no influence on the jury was intended or resulted. Marsh v. Clark County, 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 442.

Although conceding that the act of a party in treating a juror before the verdict and taking him out to dine was improper and censurable, yet the court, in Vaughn v. Dotson, 2 Swan, 348, refused to award a new trial because what was done was the result of inadvertence merely, without design to bias the juror or seduce him from his duty, and because it was equally plain that it had no effect to taint or infect the verdict.

The verdict of a jury in assessing damages for injuries resulting from the raising of a milldam ought not to be set aside because the jurors, while viewing the property, drank moderately at the expense of one of the parties before they were sworn, and afterward when they had finished their inspection, where there was no appearance of corruption, and the opposite party consented and joined with them. Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & M. 1.

The entertainment of a jury by a party was, in Patton v. Hughesdale Mfg. Co. 11 R. I. 188, said to have been highly improper; but a new trial was denied, it not appearing that the party had any intention to bias the jury, or took any advantage of the opportunity to influence any of them, and as the opposing party, though knowing of what had taken place, made no objection thereto until after the verdict had been returned.

The fact that two jurors dined and slept at the house of the defendant during the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

trial was held insufficient to warrant the reversing of a verdict, in Morris v. Vivian, 11 L. J. Exch. N. S. 387.

In McNeil v. Moore, 14 N. B. 234, where a jury were viewing land and had refreshments at the house of one of the parties, it was held that a verdict in favor of that party must be set aside.

And in Ferguson v. Troop, 15 N. B. 183, a verdict was set aside, although no improper motives were attributed, because, during the progress of the trial, the jury viewed the property, and, while there, went into the defendant's house by his invitation and had lunch.

But in Spence v. Trenholm, 12 N. B. 77, the court takes the view that a verdict should not be interfered with because a jury, while viewing the premises, supped and lodged at the house of one of the parties, where all improper interference with the jury was negated, and the other party was in no way prejudiced by what took place.

The furnishing to jurors of cider belonging to a party, but without his knowledge, is not ground for a new trial where no injury resulted therefrom. Tripp v. Bristol County, 2 Allen, 556.

Where a party, in reply to a request by some of the jurors to entertain them over night, replied that he could not under the circumstances, but would be glad to at any other time, it was held that such fact did not warrant a new trial of the case. Southwestern R. Co. v. Mitchell, 80 Ga. 438, 5 S. E. 490.

So, where a treat was good-naturedly forced upon a party by a crowd in which two of the jurors, of whose presence he was not aware, participated, it was held there was not sufficient ground for a new trial. Kennedy v. Holladay, 105 Mo. 24, 16 S. W. 688.

In Platt v. Threadgill, 80 Fed. 192, an action involving the value of cigars, a verdict was reversed because one of the parties treated some of the jurors to cigars during the progress of the trial. The decision, however, turned upon the improper influence indirectly brought to bear by means of the treat after an attempt to produce the cigars before the jury had failed, rather than on the impropriety of the act as a treat.

Treat by attorney.

The more generally accepted rule, viz., requiring a new trial where a jury has been treated, is applied in the following cases where the treat was by a party's attorney: Nadeau v. Theriault, 37 N. B. 498; Stewart v. Woolman, 26 Ont. Rep. 714; People v. Montague, 71 Mich. 447, 39 N. W. 585; Stallord v. Oskaloosa, 57 Iowa, 748, 11 S. W. 668; Rainy v. State, 100 Ga. 82, 27 S. E. 709; Walker v. Hunter, 17 Ga. 364; Steenburgh v. McRorie, 60 Misc. 510, 113 N. Y. Supp. 1118. See also Grottkau v. State, 70 Wis. 462, 36 N. W. 31.

A verdict is reversed in Demund v. Gowen, 5 N. J. L. 687, because the attorney for the plaintiff handed in at the window of the jury room food and liquor for the jurors.

The furnishing of intoxicating liquors to a juror by a party's counsel is held insufficient as a ground for a new trial in Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Porter, 32 Ohio St. 328, where it is shown that the treating of the juror was casual, and not intended to bias his action, and that it had no improper influence on his mind as a juror.

In Doe ex dem. Pritchard v. Roe, 3 Penn. (Del.) 128, 50 Atl. 217, where one of the counsel treated two jurors publicly during the progress of the trial, the necessity for a new trial was avoided only because there was full and detailed explanation of all the circumstances of the treating, made before the court on oath by the counsel, one of the jurors, and by the saloon keeper. Such conduct, the court remarks, "is most reprehensible, and we cannot too strongly condemn such an example of culpable imprudence and impropriety."

Where it was shown by affidavits that one of the jurors in the case took dinner and supper with one of the counsel for plaintiff during the progress of the trial, but that there were no communications between the juror and counsel on the subject of the action; and, further, that they were engaged in some other business relation when the juror was called in the case, which fact was known to the defendant's counsel long before the trial was closed, as was also the fact that the juror had dined and supped with the plaintiff's counsel; and also that the juror had previously accepted an invitation to stop there while in the city, but had left after the jury was impaneled and after the two meals,—the court held that no improper influence or prejudice was shown, and refused to interfere with the verdict. Koester v. Ottumwa, 34 Iowa, 41.

In McLaughlin v. Hinds, 151 Ill. 403, 38 N. E. 136, the court refused to set aside a verdict where members of a jury met the attorneys for the respective parties in a saloon and were treated by them to liquor and cigars. The conduct of the attorneys was condemned, but the court was not disposed to give either side any benefit or advantage because of the improper conduct of the other.

A new trial was denied in People v. Lyle, (Cal.) 4 Pac. 977, where a district attorney treated and dined some of the jurors during the trial of a case, because it was clear that the person against whom the verdict was rendered had not been injured by the misconduct.

Treat by persons interested.

A new trial was granted in McGill Bros. v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 75 S. C. 177, 55 S. E. 216, because the claim agent of the defendant company entertained one of the jurors over night at his hotel during the progress of the trial, and, after the verdict, received all the jurors in his room and treated them to liquor. The treating after the trial was taken into consideration as showing the motive for the free entertainment because all parties knew that the trial of another case in which the railroad was interested was to take place at once. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where a juror, pending the trial in which he was engaged, took dinner with and at the expense of the plaintiff's brother, who was conducting the case, it was necessary to set aside the verdict because of the possible improper influence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 66 S. W. 588, 67 S. W. 788.

A verdict attacked for influencing a juror was upheld in Brookhaven Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 68 Miss. 432, 10 So. 66, upon the following facts, in the language of the court: "It is the case of an old man who was infirm and who had been habituated to drink, weakly and unwisely seeking a glass from his neighbor and friend, and whose want, in the absence of means to meet it by his friend, was supplied to the extent of a single draught by an employee of the appellee, at the request of the juror's friend. That the act of supplying the drink to the juror was not done with any purpose to affect the juror's mind touching the case being then tried, and that it did not so affect it, was so found by the trial judge in denying the motion, and in this action of the court we see no error."

Where a person who was aiding the plaintiff in the conduct of a trial, and who had a case against the same defendant founded upon the same facts, treated a juror to liquor and cigars, there was sufficient reason to sustain a motion for a new trial. Central R. Co. v. Hammond, 109 Ga. 383, 34 S. E. 594.

A judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered in People v. Myers, 70 Cal. 582, 12 Pac. 719, because the sheriff who was in charge of the jury, and who had the expectation of a reward upon the conviction of the accused, conducted the jurymen to public saloons, and furnished them liquor at his own expense.

A verdict was set aside and a new trial granted in Armour v. Boswell, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 352, where it was shown that the jury, while deliberating, were furnished with provisions and spirituous liquors by persons known to be friendly to one of the parties.

The fact that defendant's son, who was also his attorney, entertained one of the jurors at his house after the trial but during the term, furnishes no ground for a new trial. Todd v. Gray, 16 S. C. 635.

There was no sufficient cause to set aside a verdict because an employee of one of the parties, having met two of the jurors accidentally, took refreshments with them and and paid for the same without their knowledge, where there was no pretense that the parties were at all implicated, nor the slightest ground to believe that the two jurors were influenced by the occurrences in question. Eakin v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 24 N. J. L. 538.

A treat to cigars furnished jurors by the son of one of the parties to an action does not furnish sufficient ground for reversing a verdict. Larson v. Levy (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 52.

Furnishing food and drink to the members of a jury by the inhabitants of a town, which was a party defendant in a lawsuit, without improper purpose or influence, is not such an entertainment or treat as comes within the prohibition of a statute providing for a new trial in case any party obtaining a verdict in his favor shall give a juror victuals or drink by way of treat. Carlisle v. Sheldon, 38 Vt. 440.

In Schissler v. Cheshire, 7 Nev. 427, a person who had mapped the premises involved in the litigation accompanied the jury to view the property, on being appointed to do so by the court at the request of the party who had ordered the map; the jury were treated by him during the return trip. It was held that his relation to the party and interest in the case were not sufficient to warrant a reversal of the verdict on that account.

It is not ground for a new trial that the jury were lodged for the night at the house of one whose brother had furnished money to secure defendant's arrest and otherwise aided in the prosecution of the case, where the one so lodging the jury was the jailer, and it was the usual custom for juries to be lodged at his house. Dumas v. State, 63 Ga. 601.

Treat by witnesses.

Thompson v. Com. 8 Gratt. 657, holds that sufficient ground for a new trial is not presented where an expert medical witness innocently and inadvertently treats the jurors during the progress of the trial.

And it was held in State v. Minor, 106 Iowa, 642, 77 N. W. 330, that the mere fact that a material witness treated some of the jurors will not warrant the inference of any wrongdoing requiring a verdict to be set aside.

There is no ground for a new trial where a witness who is in no way interested in the suit gives a treat to part of the jurors. Harris v. Harris, Ir. Rep. 3 C. L. 294.

Treat where both parties implicated.

A verdict said to be decidedly wrong upon the evidence was reversed in Kellogg v. Willder, 15 Johns. 455; and the action of the justice in permitting each of the parties to treat the jurors to whisky during the trial was termed "gross misconduct."

It is held in Copper Queen Min. Co. v. Arizona Prince Copper Co. 2 Ariz. 10, 7 Pac. 718, that the "feasting and wining" of a jury at the joint expense of the parties to an action is not a sufficient ground of reversal where no member of the jury was intoxicated or rendered unfit for the intelligent, fair, and impartial performance of his duty.

A new trial was denied in Dennison v. Collins, 1 Cow. 111, where liquor was furnished to the jurors; but it did not appear that it was provided by one party more than the other.

The court in Bradshaw v. Degenhart, 15 Mont. 267, 48 Am. St. Rep. 677, 39 Pac. 90, refused to allow a new trial where the jury had been treated by the plaintiff, because the defendant in the case was present at the time and likewise partook of the plaintiff's hospitality.

Treat after verdict rendered.

Treating a jury to cigars immediately after they have returned a verdict for the party so treating is a violation of the statute prohibiting a successful party from furnishing victuals or drink to jurors by way of treat during the term; and in such a case a new trial will be granted. Baker v. Jacobs, 64 Vt. 197, 23 Atl. 588; Shattuck v. Wrought Iron Range Co. 69 Vt. 468, 38 Atl. 72.

But a new trial was denied in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pells, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 40, where a party treated the jurors to liquor after the return of the verdict, because it was not shown that the jury had probably been influenced by the impropriety to the injury of the defendant's rights.

The fact that refreshments furnished to a jury during a cause were afterward paid for by a party is no ground for setting aside the verdict where there is no evidence that they were ordered by the party; nor should a verdict be reversed because treats were furnished after it was rendered. Richmond v. Wise, 1 Vent. 124.

There was not sufficient ground for a new trial where a sheriff furnished cigars to a jury before the rendition of their verdict, the same, so far as they knew, to be paid for upon his own account, although as a matter of fact the bill for the cigars was later sent to one of the parties to the action and paid. Gurney v. Minneapolis & St. C. R. Co. 41 Minn. 223, 43 N. W. 2.

In Vane v. Evanston, 160 Ill. 616, 37 N. E. 901, it appeared that a jury, while inspecting premises at a distance from the courthouse, were furnished lunch at the expense of one of the litigants, but it was not affirmatively shown that such fact was known to the jury until after their verdict was rendered and they had been discharged: the party's attorney who ordered the lunch was also absolved from any intentional wrongdoing. The court held that cause sufficient for setting aside the verdict was not shown.

Treating jurors who complained of being sick, to soda water and acid phosphate after they had been discharged for the term, is not a sufficient ground for granting a motion for a new trial. Grace v. Martin, 83 Ga. 245, 9 S. E. 841.

Pinkston v. Mercer, 112 Ga. 365, 37 S. E. 305, holds that there is not sufficient ground for a new trial where a party, after the jury has agreed to a verdict which has been sealed and delivered to the foreman, though not published, extends hospitality to one of the jurors.

v.
CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RAILWAY COM-PANY.

(— Ga. —, 63 S. E. 19.)

Employers' liability act — railroads — defect in way or track.

Under the construction placed by the supreme court of Alabama upon the subsection of the employers' liability act of that state (Code 1896, § 1749; Code 1907, § 3910), which provides that an employer is liable for a personal injury received by his employee, "when the injury is caused by any defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of . . . the employer," a wire stretched over and across the track of a railroad company, not sufficiently high above a freight car running on the track to permit an employee standing on the top of such car to safely pass under the wire does not constitute a "defect in the way or track," where there is nothing to indicate that such wire is not a mere movable object temporarily placed to near the track.

Case Note. — What constitutes a defect in the "ways" of a railroad company within the employers' liability act?

This specific question is covered in a note to Coley v. North Carolina R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 817, upon the general subject of statutory liability of employers for defects in the condition of their plant. A few additional cases upon the specific question have been decided since the preparation of that note.

Thus, if a railroad company permits another company to erect a bridge over its track, and continues to operate its trains under said bridge, a defect in the bridge will constitute a defect in the "ways" of the former company. Central R. Co. v. Alexander. 144 Ala. 257, 40 So. 424.

A box car placed on a side track for use as a baggage room, and so near the main line on which passenger trains are run 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was: Plaintiff's son was in the employment of the defendant as a flagman, and, while standing on the top of a freight car of defendant, in the discharge of his duties, in the state of Alabama, was struck by a wire stretched over and across the track upon which the car was running, and thereby pulled from the train and injured in the manner, described, causing the loss of services as set forth. By amendment it was alleged that the wire so stretched by the agents or employees of the defendant, or permitted to be so stretched by some other persons with the consent and knowledge of the defendant, was not of sufficient height above the top of a freight car, to permit a man standing thereon to safely pass under the wire, which fact defendant knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known; and that defendant was negligent in allowing the wire to be so stretched and to remain so stretched. The petition further alleged:

"Par. 8. Your petitioner shows that the said D. E. Hubbard was, at the time of said accident, entirely free from fault; and that the accident and injuries resulted from a failure on the part of the officers, agents, servants, and employees of said defendant company to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to prevent said accident. . . .

"Par. 10. Your petitioner shows that the law of the state of Alabama governing in such cases is as follows: 'Vol. 1. Civil Code of Alabama 1896, § 1749: Liability of the Master or Employer to a Servant or Employee for Injuries.—When a personal injury is received by a servant or employee in the service or business of the master or employer, the master or employer is liable to answer in damages to such servant or employee, as if he were a stranger, and not engaged in such service or employment, in the cases following: 1. When the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condi-

that there is insufficient space to handle baggage from the box car to the baggage car of a train, does not constitute a defect in the ways, works, etc., as the term is used in the employers' liability act. Southern R. Co. v. Shook, 150 Ala. 361, 43 So. 579.

Where a post used for supporting a chute connected with a stone crusher was so close to the side of a railroad track that it left but 7½ inches between it and passing cars, that fact, together with the requirement of starting cars at that point, necessitating watching the car ahead, controlling the break, and instantly passing the post, constituted a defect in the ways, works, and plant of the defendant company. tion of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer. . . . But the master or employer is not liable under . . . subdivision 1, unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition.' . . .

"Par. 12. Your petitioner shows that said injury was caused by reason of a defect in the condition of the way connected with and used in the business of the defendant company; said defect being the wire stretched across said way in the manner heretofore shown.

"Par. 13. Your petitioner alleges that said accident and injuries arose from a defect of the way hereinbefore mentioned, and that said defendant company, its officers, agents, and employees intrusted with the duty of seeing that the way was in proper condition, were negligent in not discovering and remedying said defect. . . .

"Par. 15. Your petitioner alleges that each and all of said acts or failure in connection with the stretching of said wire above described constituted negligence on the part of the defendant company, and was the cause of said accident and injuries."

The petition was demurred to on several grounds, one of which was: "Because it appears by the petition that the wire alleged to have been stretched across this defendant's track was a foreign substance or obstacle having no connection with or relation to the defendant's track, and was not a defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of this defendant." This ground was sustained, and the petition dismissed, whereupon the plaintiff excepted.

Mr. H. W. Johnson also for defendant in error.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As will have been noticed, in reading the above statement of facts, the case was not laid upon any alleged common-law liability of a master to his servant for injuries caused by a defect in the premises or appliances of the business, but was expressly and specifically predicated, in the petition, alone upon the statute of Alabama, which was in terms set forth, and the liability claimed was definitely based upon that portion of subdivision 1 of the statute, quoted, which provides that the employer shall be liable when a personal injury received by his employee—is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the way connected with or used in the business of the employer. This will be seen by reference to paragraphs 12 and 13 of the petition, which are quoted above. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in their brief filed in this court, say: "This action is based on subsection 1 of the statute of Alabama, contained in § 1749 of the Civil Code of Alabama of 1896, which subsection makes the master liable to answer in damages to a servant injured while in the employment of the master, 'when the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer,' and that 'the sole question now presented for determination is whether or not, under the facts alleged, the wire was such a part of the 'ways, works, machinery, or plant' of the defendant as to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action." While the ground of the demurrer was, in view of the allegations of the petition, somewhat broader than was necessary, still the demurrer went to the very foundation upon which the petition rested; and, it having been sustained, the real and the only question presented for adjudication by the writ of error is whether the wire, stretched above and across the track of the defendant as alleged, was a defect in the condition of the way connected with or used in the business of the defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff in error do not con-

When the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condi-

that there is insufficient space to handle baggage from the box car to the baggage car of a train, does not constitute a defect in the ways, works, etc., as the term is used in the employers' liability act. Southern R. Co. v. Shook, 150 Ala. 361, 43 So. 579.

Where a post used for supporting a chute connected with a stone crusher was so close to the side of a railroad track that it left but 7½ inches between it and passing cars, that fact, together with the requirement of starting cars at that point, necessitating watching the car ahead, controlling the break, and instantly passing the post, constituted a defect in the ways, works, and plant of the defendant company. Day v. Dominion Iron & Steel Co. 36 N. S. 113.

tion of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer. . . . But the master or employer is not liable under . . . subdivision 1, unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition.' . . .

"Par. 12. Your petitioner shows that said injury was caused by reason of a defect in the condition of the way connected with and used in the business of the defendant company; said defect being the wire stretched across said way in the manner heretofore shown.

"Par. 13. Your petitioner alleges that said accident and injuries arose from a defect of the way hereinbefore mentioned, and that said defendant company, its officers, agents, and employees intrusted with the duty of seeing that the way was in proper condition, were negligent in not discovering and remedying said defect. . . .

"Par. 15. Your petitioner alleges that each and all of said acts or failure in connection with the stretching of said wire above described constituted negligence on the part of the defendant company, and was the cause of said accident and injuries."

The petition was demurred to on several grounds, one of which was: "Because it appears by the petition that the wire alleged to have been stretched across this defendant's track was a foreign substance or obstacle having no connection with or relation to the defendant's track, and was not a defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of this defendant." This ground was sustained, and the petition dismissed, whereupon the plaintiff excepted.

Messrs. Twiggs & Gazan, for plaintiff in error:

The wire is such a defect in the "ways, works, machinery, or plant" as to make the railroad company liable for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

Mr. H. W. Johnson also for defendant in error.

Flsh, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As will have been noticed, in reading the above statement of facts, the case was not laid upon any alleged common-law liability of a master to his servant for injuries caused by a defect in the premises or appliances of the business, but was expressly and specifically predicated, in the petition, alone upon the statute of Alabama, which was in terms set forth, and the liability claimed was definitely based upon that portion of subdivision 1 of the statute, quoted, which provides that the employer shall be liable when a personal injury received by his employee—is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the way connected with or used in the business of the employer. This will be seen by reference to paragraphs 12 and 13 of the petition, which are quoted above. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in their brief filed in this court, say: "This action is based on subsection 1 of the statute of Alabama, contained in § 1749 of the Civil Code of Alabama of 1896, which subsection makes the master liable to answer in damages to a servant injured while in the employment of the master, 'when the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer,'" and that "the sole question now presented for determination is whether or not, under the facts alleged, the wire was such a part of the 'ways, works, machinery, or plant' of the defendant as to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action." While the ground of the demurrer was, in view of the allegations of the petition, somewhat broader than was necessary, still the demurrer went to the very foundation upon which the petition rested; and, it having been sustained, the real and the only question presented for adjudication by the writ of error is whether the wire, stretched above and across the track of the defendant as alleged, was a defect in the condition of the way connected with or used in the business of the defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff in error do not contend, nor did the petition allege, as we have already noted, that the wire was part of the works, machinery, or plant of the defendant. The Alabama statute under consideration (Code 1896, § 1749; Code 1907, § 3910), "as far as it goes," as was said in Mobile & B. R. Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 133, 4 So. 140, "is a substantial copy of the English act entitled the 'Employers' Liability Act' of 1880." See copies of both acts. 2 Labatt on Master & Servant, 1926-1930. The supreme court of that state has dealt with the statute in question in a number of cases. In Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 97 Ala. 240, 12 So. 89, plaintiff, a switchman in the employment of the defendant railroad company, while performing his duties on a car forming a part of a train moving on defendant's main line, was injured by being struck by a refrigerator car which had been left on what was known as the "cold-storage track," in close proximity to the main line. On the point as to whether the proximity of the refrigerator car to the track on which defendant's train was being operated constituted a defect in that track, the court, speaking through McClellan, J., after stating that the statute was substantially copied from the English employers' liability act, said: "It is the settled construction of the act in that country that no mere obstruction on or too near to the 'ways' is a defect therein within subsection 1. The presence of no foreign body or substance on or dangerously near to the track of a railway, which does not affect the track itself or its condition inherently considered, but is only an obstacle with which moving trains would collide, can be said to constitute a defect in the track. There must be some inherent condition, of a permanent nature, of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, which unfits the thing for its uses; some weakness of construction with reference to the proposed uses (as where the ordinary appliances for drawing buckets of water from a well are used to lower and hoist men); some inadaptation to its purposes (as where the sides of a coke lift are not sufficiently fenced to safely hoist its burden, Heske v. Samuelson, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 30); some break or misplacement of the parts, or the absence of some part; some innate abnormal quality of the thing which renders its use dangerous (as the viciousness of a horse constituting 'plant' in the business of a wharfinger, Yarmouth v. France, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 647); some obstacle in the way of use or obstruction to use which is a part of the thing itself, or of the condition of the thing itself, as holes in or ice upon a way, or the like,—to constitute a defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant, under the statute." The learned justice then quoted the following language of Stephen 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

J., in McGiffin v. Palmer's Shipbuilding & I. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 5: "I do not think we ought to put so wide a construction on the words 'condition of the way' as to include obstacles lying upon the way, which obstacles do not in any degree alter the powers of the way, or alter its fitness for the purposes for which it is generally employed, and cannot be said to be incorporated with it. It seems to me, therefore, that the presence of this piece of tap on the road cannot be called a defect in the way." Judge McClellan further said: "In the case from which this language is taken, a workman was killed in consequence of a way, along which it was his duty to draw a bogie loaded with puddled iron at white heat, being obstructed. The obstruction consisted of a piece of tap or slag which had been placed by a fellow laborer so near to the tramway on which the bogie ran as to collide with it. This was held not to be a defect in the way or in the condition of the way. . . . This is in principle precisely our case. We think the doctrine of this case eminently reasonable and sound, and we adopt it; and this notwithstanding a contrary doctrine—that coal left too near a railway track constituted a defect therein—appears to have been taken for granted in the case of Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Walters, 91 Ala. 435, 8 So. 357. Clearly a movable object, temporarily placed in dangerous proximity to a railroad track, is not a defect in the condition of such track, within the English doctrine, which we adopt as the sounder and better. The track itself is in the same condition after as it was before the object was so placed. A car left standing on the main line of a railway is certainly as obstructive of its use as one too near it on a side track; yet it would be absurd to say that the track under that car, the 'way' upon which it stands, and which was constructed especially to support it, is rendered defective when it is only subserving the uses for which it was intended."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bouldin, 110 Ala. 185, 20 So. 325, it was held: "A foreign substance, having no other connection or relation with the track of a railroad than arises from its having been left in dangerous proximity thereto, is not a defect in the condition of any such track or roadway; and when, in an action against a railroad by the administrator of a deceased employee to recover damages, the complaint alleges that the intestate's death was due to a defect in the condition of defendant's railroad track, in that an oil box, which was part of a car, had been left so near the track as to cause the deceased to be thrown from the footboard of the engine, where he was standing, as his duty required, does not aver a defect in the condition of the track, but simply an extraneous obstruction, and is, therefore, insufficient as alleging a cause of action under the first clause of § 2590 [1749] of the Code, which provides that the employer is liable for injury to his employees when the injury is caused by any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant used in or connected with the business of the employer." In the opinion of the court, speaking of the first count in the complaint, it was said: In drawing this count, the pleader obviously intended to present a case under clause 1 of § 2590 [1749] of the Code. It is clear—confessed, indeed—that this count is not good under that subdivision, because it shows that the oil box was a foreign substance, having no other connection or relation with or to the track than arose from its having been left in dangerous proximity thereto, and hence was not a defect in the condition of the track (the track was not at all defective), but a mere extraneous obstruction to the proper and safe use of the track, as would have been a car standing upon it when this engine was moving along there. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 97 Ala. 240, 246, 12 So. 88." In Southern R. Co. v. Moore, 128 Ala. 434, 29 So. 659, it was held that a rope used for lowering timber in the construction of a trestle along a railroad track, by means of which heavy timbers were put in their places, was in no sense a part of the ways, works, machinery, or plant of the railroad company; and that the count in the complaint basing a right of action on a defect in the rope did not state a cause of action under subdivision 1 of the employers' liability act (Code 1896, § 1749). In Northern Alabama R. Co. v. Mansell, 138 Ala. 548, 36 So. 459, the action was against a railway company for the wrongful death of an employee, resulting from his being struck by a stock gap, or a wire thereon, placed too near the railroad track. When struck the employee, in the discharge of his duty, was standing upon the lower step of a passenger coach and leaning out to watch a hot box thereunder. It was held that, in the absence of imputation of negligence or other wrong to any fellow servant of the employee, the action was not brought under the statute embodied in Code 1896, chap. 43, but should be regarded as brought under Id. § 27, which gives to a personal representative the right to maintain an action for a wrong causing the death of his intestate, and under which the liability of the defendant is to be determined by the rules of the common law. It was held in Southern R. Co. v. Shook, 150 Ala. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

361, 43 So. 579, that "the placing by a railway company of a box car on a side track, to be used as a baggage room, so close to the main track that there was insufficient space for an employee to transfer baggage between such car and trains on the main track was at most an obstruction, and in no sense a defect in the ways, works, etc., within the Employer's Liability Act, Code 1896, § 1740, subdiv. 1." The cases of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bouldin and Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, supra, and Birmingham Furnace & Mfg. Co. v. Gross, 97 Ala. 220, 12 So. 30, were cited in support of the ruling.

Counsel for plaintiff in error cite the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Thompson, 94 Ala. 636, 10 So. 280, where in it was held: "The supply pipe of a water tank, hanging over or near a railroad track, is a part of its ways, works, machinery, or plant, as those words are used in the statute (Code 1896, § 2590 [1749]; and if it hangs so near to the track that a brakeman, passing under it in the discharge of his duties, is struck and injured or killed, not being guilty of contributory negligence, an action for damages lies against the railroad company." This case is not referred to in any of the later decisions which we have cited from that court; but it will be noted that in this earlier case it was held that the supply pipe projecting from a water tank was a part of the "ways, works, machinery, or plant" of the defendant company. All four of the instrumentalities named in the statute are specified, and it is impossible to say with certainty to which instrumentality it was intended to refer the pipe which caused the injury. See Labatt, Mast. & S. 1953. So, in Alabama Consol. Coal & I. Co. v. Hammond (Ala.) 47 So. 248, it was held, by a majority of the court, that the evidence in that case showed that a wall of a stone quarry was a part of the "ways or works" of the master within the meaning of the employers' liability act (Ala. Code 1907, § 3910, subdiv. 1). Whether such wall was held to be a part of the ways, or to be a part of the works, the decision leaves in doubt. Another case cited for plaintiff in error is Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Banks, 104 Ala. 508, 16 So. 547. There the plaintiff's intestate, a brakeman in the employment of the defendant railroad company, was killed by being knocked from the top of a freight train by a low overhead bridge across defendant's track; the bridge in its low condition having been maintained for many years. It does not appear from the report of the case that the declaration was framed under the employers' liability act. There is no express ruling that the low bridge constituted a defect in the "ways" of the defendant, and the only implication, if, indeed, there be any at all, looking in that direction, is contained in the statement by the court of the following legal proposition: "Another principle which may be regarded as finally settled is that if an employee knows of the existence of dangers arising from defects in ways, works, and machinery of the company, and continues in its service after the lapse of a reasonable time for the defects to be remedied or removed, he assumes this additional risk, though not incident to his original employment." The court then stated the same legal principle in another form, without referring to the "ways."

Another case cited for plaintiff in error is Central R. Co. v. Alexander, 144 Ala. 257, 40 So. 424, wherein it was held: "Where defendant company continued to operate trains under a bridge, which it had permitted another company to erect and maintain over its tracks, a defect in such bridge was a defect in the 'ways' of defendant." Here, as in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Banks, supra, the overhead bridge was a structure of so permanent a nature and so affecting the track itself, or its condition relatively to the operation of trains thereon, as to render the bridge, in view of what was said in Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, supra, and other cases cited, a part of the track or way over and across which it was constructed. The case is clearly distinguishable from the cases to which we have called attention, wherein it was held that movable objects, temporarily placed dangerously near a railroad track, do not constitute a defect in the track. In the case at bar it does not appear from the petition whether the wire stretched over and across the railroad track was merely a movable object, temporarily placed there, or was an object of a permanent nature affecting the track itself, or its condition relatively to its use in the operation of trains; and, as the demurrer raised the point that it did not appear from the petition that the wire had any connection with or relation to the railroad track, the demurrer was properly sustained, under the construction which the supreme court of Alabama has placed upon the employers' liability act of that state, which construction this court will follow. Krogg v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 77 Ga. 203, 4 Am. St. Rep. 79.

The judgment sustaining the demurrer contained the recital, "It being conceded that the wire in question was erected by a telephone company to be used in its business," and counsel for plaintiff in error argued the case before this court as if the statement in such recital were a fact to be considered in reviewing the judgment on the demurrer; but, as the office of the demurrer was to test the legal sufficiency of the petition upon the facts as they were therein alleged, its scope could not, by an agreement or concession which neither amended nor purported to amend the petition, be extended to cover questions not raised by the allegations of the petition. Constitution Pub. Co. v. Stegall, 97 Ga. 405, 24 S. E. 33; Shuler v. State, 125 Ga. 778-783, 54 S. E. 689, and cases cited.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

S. V. OSBURN, Respt.,

v.

OREGON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION COMPANY, Appt.

(— Idaho, —, 98 Pac. 627.)

Railroad — fires — evidence — sufficiency.

1. In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire set from an engine running on defendant's road, where the engine that must have set the fire is identified, and it is shown by defendant's witnesses that the particular engine that set the fire is no better than any of its other engines, it is not error to admit evidence of the setting of other fires a short time previous to the destruction of plaintiff's property.

Same — locomotives.

2. Under such conditions and circumstances, the reasonable inference of fact would be that the identified engine would be as likely to throw igniting sparks and live coals, and set the fire, as was any of the other of the company's engines that are shown to have emitted sparks and fire about the same time.

Same — presumptions — burden of proof.

3. In an action against a railroad company for the destruction of property by fire set by sparks emitted from the company's locomotive, it is sufficient to establish a prima facie case for the plaintiff to show that fire had been communicated from the company's engine to his property, which resulted in its damage or destruction; and such proof, when made, raises the presumption of negligence of the company either in the construction and equipment, or management and operation, of its engine, and casts the burden upon the de-

Headnotes by AILSHIE, Ch. J.

Note.—As to effect of presumption of fact that fire was set by locomotive to carry the question of negligence to the jury, see case note to Continental Ins. Co. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 99.

defendant of rebutting this presumption of negligence.

Same — circumstantial evidence — presumption.

4. In such case, the fact of the setting of the fire by defendant's locomotive having been proven by circumstantial evidence does not prevent the presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant arising under the rule casting the burden of rebutting such presumption on the defendant. A fact may be established just as fully by circumstantial evidence as by direct and positive evidence. In the former case, however, the proof of the one fact inevitably resulted and is inferred from the proven existence of certain other facts. It does not arise, however, by operation of law or as a presumption thereof.

Presumption — rebuttal — burden of proof.

5. When the presumption of negligence which thus arises, the burden of rebutting which rests on the defendant, is repelled and rebutted by proof of proper construction and the use of proper appliances and careful management and operation, the plaintiff cannot recover without producing proof of actual negligence or want of ordinary care.

Same — negligence — gist of action.

6. In cases for damages caused by fires set from locomotives of a railroad company, negligence is the gist of the action.

Same — evidence — sufficiency.

7. Facts in this case examined and considered, and held sufficient to go the jury.

(December 1, 1908.)

APPÉAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shoshone County in plaintiff's favor, and from an order denying a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent burning of plaintiff's barn. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Cotton, Carlton Fox, and W. A. Robbins, for appellant:

Where the engine which alone could have caused the fire is identified, testimony that other engines of the defendant, at other times and places, set fire or threw igniting sparks, is neither competent nor relevant to the issue, without proof that they were in the same condition and operated in the same way as was the engine charged when the fire occurred.

Lesser Cotton Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 52 C. C. A. 95, 114 Fed. 133; Shelly v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 211 Pa. 160, 60 Atl. 581; McFarland v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 450; Henderson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 144 Pa. 461, 16 L.R.A. 299, 27 Am. St. Rep. 652, 22 Atl. 851; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Home Ins. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 70 S. W. 19 L.R.A. Before the presumption of negligent construction or operation of defendant's locomotive arises, plaintiff must prove that defendant's locomotive set the fire, otherwise there would be a presumption on a presumption, which is not allowable.

When the presumption of negligent construction and operation is repelled by proof of proper construction and use of proper appliances and careful management, recovery cannot be had without proof of negligence or want of ordinary care.

Messrs. A. G. Kerns and H. E. Worstell, for respondent:

Proof prima facie showing that fire has been communicated from an engine of the railroad company to property, resulting in the damage or destruction thereof, raises a presumption of negligence in the construction or management of the engine, and casts upon the defendant the burden of rebutting it.

Koontz v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 20 Or. 3, 23 Pac. 820; Richmond v. McNeill, 31 Or. 342, 49 Pac. 879; Spaulding v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 30 Wis. 110, 11 Am. Rep. 550; negligence is the gist of all such actions. 3 Elliott, Railroads. 2d ed. § 1221. This proposition cannot be determined solely upon the failure of the plaintiff to produce rebuttal evidence. It may be rebutted or actual or positive negligence may be disclosed by the defendant's own witnesses either on direct or cross examination. In the case at bar the plaintiff did not produce any rebuttal testimony. In the first place, however, the plaintiff, as we have above recited, showed by a number of witnesses that within a comparatively short period of time immediately preceding the fire defendant's locomotive had emitted great quantities of sparks and live coals. One witness stated that he had seen live coals as big as the end of his finger emitted and thrown as much as 30 to 50 feet distant from the track, and other witnesses testified to extinguishing fires as far as 100 feet distant from the track. This evidence tended to show a habit of negligence on the part of the company about that time and in that vicinity. It also tended to establish the possibility, capacity, and tendency of defendant's locomotives of the same class generally to emit sparks and set fires. It tended to establish either negligent construction and equipment and maintenance of its engines, or else negligent handling and operating of the same. The train, in pulling out of Osburn on the morning of August 4, 1907, was on a down grade, and was pulling only about 300 tons. It was shown by defendant's employees that this engine was capable of pulling 1,500 tons. It therefore stands admitted that it was not overloaded. It left Osburn at the rate of about 30 miles an hour. Witnesses generally testified that the engine was working hard, and throwing smoke and sparks very freely. Whether this was the exercise of reasonable care in its operation was properly a question for the jury. One witness who was present at the depot, and who had at some time past been a brakeman, testified that in his opinion the engineer threw the throttle wide open as he pulled out of the station; that the engine worked as if that had been done. The engineer testified that he had the throttle half open. The inspector who testified that he had inspected the smokestack and spark arrester that morning at Wallace says that it was in good condition. He also stated that he did not know that the engineer stopped at the roundhouse to get a bolt, and that, if he had inspected it, there would have been no bolt needed. He said, however, that it was not his business to inspect the mechanical part of the engine, and that he had nothing to do with the eccentric bolts. The engineer testified that he stopped in the lower yards at Wallace that morning before pulling out in order to get a bolt which he needed. It appears from the evidence of the different witnesses that a bolt called an "eccentric bolt" was either broken or missing in this engine. Taking all these circumstances, we think there was sufficient evidence tending to show actual negligence, either in the maintenance and equipment of the engine and appliances or in its operation and management, to go to the jury on the general issue of defendant's negligence. The evidence in this case is by no means satisfactory or convincing to us, but, under the rule, we think there was such a conflict as the jury were entitled to settle and determine, and that their determination is binding on this court.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered. Costs in favor of respondent.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
EX REL. THOMAS B. CARRELL, County Collector.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Cumberland County Court directing the sale of certain property for nonpayment of taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Golden, Scholfield, & Scholfield, for appellants:

The statute with respect to mining rights does not authorize the taxation of an oil or gas lease, or the oil or gas underlying a tract of land.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of sale entered in the county court of Cumberland county for taxes levied on a mining right in 80 acres of land in that county. The right is based on a certain instrument known as an "oil and gas lease," dated October 27, 1905, signed by Charley M. and Rachel E. Queen, granting to one Priddy, his heirs, successors, and assigns, in consideration of \$1 and the covenants of said lease, "all the oil and gas in and under the following described premises, together with the exclusive right to enter thereon at all times for the purpose of drilling and operating for oil, gas, or water, and to erect, install, and maintain all buildings and structures, machinery and appliances, and lay all pipes necessary for the production, storage, and transportation of oil, gas, or water upon and from said premises. Excepting and reserving, however, to the lessor the one-eighth ($\frac{1}{8}$) part of all oil produced and saved from said premises, to be delivered in the pipe line with which the lessee may connect his wells. . . . To have and to hold the above premises for the term of one year, and so long thereafter as oil or gas is found on said premises in paying quantities." The lease also contains provisions, among others, as to the payment of rent in case only gas is found, or in case the well is not completed within sixty days. It appears from the stipulation of facts filed by the parties hereto in the trial court that the lease had been duly assigned to and was owned by the Campbell Oil Company, the members of which are appellants herein, and that said company had drilled a well on said land which was then producing oil in paying quantities; also, that the owner of the fee had paid the taxes on the fee, amounting to \$14.10.

Sections 6 and 7 of chapter 94 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1905, p. 1399), in relation to taxing mining rights in this state, are as follows:

"Sec. 6. Any mining right, or the right to dig for or obtain iron, lead, copper, coal, or other mineral from land, may be conveyed by deed or lease, which may be acknowledged and recorded in the same manner and with like effect as deeds and leases of real estate.

"Sec. 7. When the owner of any land shall convey, by deed or lease, any mining right therein, such conveyance shall be considered as so separating such right from the land that the same shall be taxable separately; and any sale of the land for any tax or assessment shall not include or affect such mining right."

Appellants contend that the term "other mineral," in said § 6, only includes such minerals as are ejusdem generis with iron, lead, copper, and coal, and does not include oil and gas. They also contend that as this statute was passed in 1861, and as oil and gas had not at that time been the subject of legislation or court action, the legislature could not have intended those products to be included in the term "other mineral." We are unable to agree with these contentions. Section 6, above quoted, provides that "any mining right" may be conveyed by lease, and § 7 provides that, when such mining right has been conveyed, it shall be considered as so separated from the land that it is taxable separately. Does this oil lease properly come within the term "mining right?" A mine is an excavation in the earth for the purpose of obtaining minerals (2 Bouvier's Law Dict. Rawle's ed. 413), an excavation, properly under ground, for the purpose of taking out some useful product (Standard Dict.) A mining right may properly be deemed a right to excavate in the earth for the purpose of obtaining minerals or other useful products. In some of the states petroleum forms a very valuable part of the natural wealth, and has been given careful consideration by the courts, and they have uniformly held, so far as the authorities we have examined show, that it should be classed as a mineral. Stoughton's Appeal, 88 Pa. 198; Murray v. Allred, 100 Tenn. 100, 39 L.R.A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740, 43 S. W. 355; Gill v. Weston, 110 Pa. 312, 1 Atl. 921; Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 25 L.R.A. 222, 19 S. E. 436; Wilson v. Youst (Wilson v. Hughes) 43 W. Va. 826, 39 L.R.A. 292, 28 S. E. 781; Kelley v. Ohio Coal Co. 57 Ohio St. 317, 39 L.R.A. 765, 63 Am. St. Rep. 721, 49 N. E. 399; Blakley v. Marshall, 174 Pa. 425, 34 Atl. 564; 2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 545. The case of Dunham v. Kirkpatrick, 101 Pa. 36, 47 Am. Rep. 696, is cited by appellants as tending to uphold the contrary view. While it holds that the reservation of "other minerals" in a deed did not include petroleum in that instance, it expressly states, "it is true that petroleum is a mineral. No discussion is needed to prove that 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact." This court has recently decided that oil and gas are classed as minerals, though they may have peculiar attributes not common to other minerals which have a fixed and permanent situs. Poe v. Ulrey, 233 Ill. 56, 84 N. E. 46; Watford Oil & Gas Co. v. Shipman, 233 Ill. 9, 122 Am. St. Rep. 144, 84 N. E. 53. It is true that, when the statute above quoted was passed, petroleum was not as extensive an article of commerce in this state as it has since become. That, however, does not exclude it from the act any more than it would gold, mica, or some other mineral that might be discovered. In Gill v. Weston, supra, the same argument was advanced, and the court there said: "It matters not that the act of 1855 was passed before petroleum was discovered. It is a mineral substance obtained from the earth by a process of mining, and lands from which it is obtained may with propriety be called mining lands."

Manifestly, the mining right created by this lease is property and should be taxed. Appellants have cited authorities holding that it is not such a right that it can be taxed as real estate. State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 80, 24 S. E. 688; Kansas Natural Gas Co. v. Neosho County, 75 Kan. 335, 89 Pac. 750; Kitchen v. Smith, 101 Pa. 452; Wood v. Jones, 54 Ohio St. 627, 47 N. E. 1119. Some of these authorities tend to hold that it cannot be taxed at all except as the oil and gas are taken from the land, and then they must be taxed as personal property. It should be noted that, although the leases in those cases are substantially like the one here in question, the statutes in those states are quite different from the one here under consideration. The West Virginia court holds in the case just cited from that state that the lease does not convey a freehold interest. This court has held, under provisions in a lease substantially like this, that it conveyed a freehold interest. Bruner v. Hicks, 230 Ill. 536, 120 Am. St. Rep. 332, 82 N. E. 888; Poe v. Ulrey, supra. In discussing the above sections of the statute in Re Major, 134 Ill. 19, 24 N. E. 973, we have held that, even though there was no evidence that coal existed under the land, whatever there was of coal or mineral underlying certain land was reserved by the conveyance there in question, and the lease could be taxed. Similar leases affecting rights as to coal have been held to so separate a mining right therein that it should be taxed separately. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Baker, 135 Ill. 545, 12 L.R.A. 247, 26 N. E. 651; Sholl Bros. v. People, 194 Ill. 24, 61 N. E. 1122; Re Maplewood Coal Co. 213 Ill. 283, 72 N. E. 786. Oil and gas, like salt water and other liquids and gaseous bodies, are different in their action from solid minerals, such as coal and iron, and this difference might, under certain conditions, require the application of different rules as to solid minerals than as to liquid or gaseous ones. Watford Oil & Gas Co. v. Shipman, supra. But such is not the case here. Whatever may have been decided in other jurisdictions, it is clear under the decisions in this state that this lease conveys such a mining right in the land here in question that it can properly be taxed separately, and that, as it involves a freehold, it should be assessed as real property.

Appellants contend that the board of review improperly assessed the entire mining right to appellants. So far as the record discloses, there is nothing to show that the board did not assess to appellants only what was considered the fair value of the mining right obtained by them under the lease. As to whether the one eighth of oil reserved by the owners of the fee did or should cause the tax on the fee to be made higher is a question not raised on this record.

The judgment of the County Court will be affirmed.

Messrs. William Warner, O. H. Dean, W. D. McLeod, and H. C. Timmons for defendant in error.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

C. Brice-Nash sued the Barton Salt Company for damages on account of injuries received while in its employ. A demurrer to his evidence was sustained, and he prosecutes error. The evidence tended to establish these facts: The defendant is engaged in manufacturing, refining, and selling salt. The plaintiff was its bookkeeper. His duties required him at times, for the purpose of procuring information, to go into the packing room, which was partly filled with salt, which rose nearly perpendicularly to the height of about 12 feet. The practice was for the workmen from time to time to pick the face of the salt with long bars until it caved off in quantities suitable for packing in sacks and barrels. When they were looking for a fall while the plaintiff was present, they would tell him to look out.—to keep away. On the day of the accident he came into the packing room to inquire about a shipment. He spoke with Mr. Swofford, the foreman of the room, and Mr. White, a workman there. He noticed that the salt was undermined. They told him that they had been trying to get it down, but did not say they were then looking for it to fall. He understood they were not looking for a fall. While he was standing with his back to the salt, talking with Swofford, who faced it, White prodded it with his bar, nothing having been said about resuming work, and no warning having been given, and it caved off, catching the plaintiff, throwing him against a post, and causing him serious injury.

The principal contention of the defendant is that Swofford and White, whose failure to give warning of the resumption of work and the consequent caving off of the salt is the negligence complained of, were fellow servants of the plaintiff, and that his recovery was properly denied on that account. Whether the relation each bore to their common employer was such as to bring them within the scope of the rule invoked need not be determined, for we hold that the evidence would have justified a finding that the defendant owed a positive and nondelegable duty to the plaintiff, under the circumstances stated, to give him warning that an immediate fall of the salt was to be expected.

A situation involving a somewhat similar question was presented in Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 60 N. J. L. 323, 38 Atl. 835; the decision of the supreme court being indicated by the seventh paragraph of the syllabus, reading as follows: "Where the system of the working of a stone quarry was one whereby no protection was afforded to the workmen engaged in another portion of the quarry apart from the blasting from injury from flying stones, caused by the explosions of the blasts in the rock, except the warning word 'fire' given at the time the fuse was communicated to the explosives of the blast; and one of the rules of the master was that no employee should leave his work to seek safety from the dangers of the blast until the warning 'fire' was given by the foreman, whose duty it was to light the fuse,—it became and was the duty of the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, to have such warning announced sufficiently long enough before the explosion for such workmen or employees, in the exercise of ordinary care, to reach a place of safety; and this duty, being delegated to such boss or foreman, does not relieve the master from the liability to answer for the neglect of the boss or foreman to perform that duty. This neglect is not an incidental act of the coservice." The case was taken to the court of appeals and errors, and there affirmed; the grounds of the decision being thus stated (61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L.R.A. 834, 39 Atl. 764): "Two views are suggested,—one, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the giving of proper warning was an essential part of the duty owed by the employer to the workman of taking reasonable care that the places where the workmen were engaged should be kept safe, and therefore if, through negligence, the proper warning was not given, the employer's duty was not performed; the other, on behalf of the defendant, that the giving of the warning was only incidental to the foreman's work in preparing the blast and lighting the fuse, in which work the foreman was clearly a fellow servant of the plaintiff, engaged in a common employment, and therefore his negligence in that incidental service was not chargeable upon the common master. On reflection it will be perceived that the giving of warning bore no direct relation to the foreman's work in preparing and firing the blast. The object of that work was the removal of rock, and such object would be attained as well without the warning as with it, if we leave out of consideration the safety of the workmen. Quite different are the conditions where a person using a tool or machine is obliged to see that the implement remains fit for use. In such case the duty to examine is auxiliary and incidental to the duty to use; and, when a servant owes the latter duty to his master, he owes the former also. A failure to perform carefully this incidental duty of examination may result in damage to a fellow servant, but the common master is not responsible for such damage, because the duty neglected was not one owed by him outside of that duty. There may have been a similar duty of inspection owed by the master to his servants, but the duties themselves are distinguishable from each other. In the present case, however, as already pointed out, the duty to give warning was not in any such sense subservient to the blasting of rock. On the other hand, when we consider the general duty owed by an employer to his employees to exercise reasonable care that the place where he sets them to work shall be kept safe (Van Steenburgh v. Thornton, 58 N. J. L. 160, 33 Atl. 380), the propriety of including therein the duty of giving warning, in such circumstances as those now before us, becomes at once apparent. The danger of blasting was one frequently recurring, and its occurrence could always be foreseen, not by the workmen scattered about the quarry, but by any person charged with the duty of watching for it. If the danger was not foreseen, and proper warning given, the quarry became an unsafe place for the workmen, but it was made reasonably safe if such warning was given. It seems clearly to follow that on him whose duty it was to take care that the place should be kept safe was cast the duty of giving timely warning. We conclude, therefore, that it was part of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff that proper care should be exercised in giving warning of an expected blast. In selecting the person who was to fire the blast as the person to give the warning, the defendant probably chose the man best able to perform that duty; but, as the defendant's responsibility extended beyond the selection of an agent and included the warning itself, it must answer for negligence in the giving of warning, no matter how fit was the chosen agent." We regard this reasoning as sound in itself, and as consistent with the rules on the subject which have gained general recognition by the courts. However, in a note published in 54 L.R.A. 85, at page 120, it is said, referring to this decision: "All the authorities, with the exception of the single New Jersey case cited, . . . seem to be agreed that a master is not liable for the negligence of a servant in failing to notify a coemployee of the approach of a transitory peril which as the work progresses will render the environment unsafe for a brief period, but which may easily be avoided if due warning is given. In some of the cases illustrating this principle the breach of duty was committed by failing to notify the injured servant himself that his safety was imperiled by the particular peril in question." This language is repeated by the author of the note in his work on Master and Servant (2 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 601).

While there is undoubtedly a conflict in the authorities, the New Jersey case does not stand alone. It is cited with approval, with other cases of the same tendency, in Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Co. v. Shanks, 69 Kan. 306, 76 Pac. 856, where the principle it announces was applied. Some of the apparent conflict in the decisions can be eliminated upon considerations which were there thus stated: "In some cases it may be said that, if the conduct of an enterprise involve the giving of monitory signals in passing progressively from detail to detail of the work, and the person set to give the signal be carefully chosen, the company will not be bound if he fail in his duty. An injured workman and the person employed to give the signal may then be said to be engaged in the discharge of duties so intimately related and so combinedly directed to a common end that the one must be on his guard with reference to the conduct of the other; the warning becomes a part of the service itself, which is something entirely distinct and separate from the things the master must do to make the service and the place in which it is performed reasonably safe. But whenever a negligent act violates any duty which the master himself owes to the servant, as, for example, the duty to make the service and the place in which it is performed reasonably safe, that fact controls, irrespective of the rank or grade of service between employees, and notwithstanding the circumstance that they are engaged in a common employment directed to a common end; and if, in the discharge of the master's duty, a warning be necessary, it is not enough for him to say that he has provided a competent person to give it; the warning must be given." The New Jersey case is expressly disapproved in McLaine v. Head & D. Co. 71 N. H. 298, 58 L.R.A. 464, 93 Am. St. Rep. 522, 52 Atl. 545, and in Kelly Island Lime & Transp. Co. v. Pachuta, 69 Ohio St. 462, 100 Am. St. Rep. 706, 69 N. E. 988. In the former case, however, there is a strong dissenting opinion in which the authorities are carefully reviewed in what seems a successful effort to show that the doctrine repudiated by the majority of the court is in accordance with precedent as well as with reason. Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L.R.A. 834, 39 Atl. 764, is cited with approval in a dissenting opinion in Ward v. Naughton, 74 App. Div. 68, 77 N. Y. Supp. 344, where the facts are quite similar to those of Electric Plaster Co. v. Reedy, 74 Kan. 57, 85 Pac. 824, where a conclusion was reached directly in conflict with that of the New York court. See, also, Donk Bros. Coal & Coke Co. v. Thil, 228 Ill. 233, 81 N. E. 857.

In the present case the evidence had some tendency to show that the plans of operation adopted by the defendant company contemplated that at irregular intervals the bank of salt should be undermined and the detached portion permitted to fall down and roll across the floor of the packing room in such manner, in such quantity, and with such force as to expose the plaintiff to injury while in the performance of his duties; that the only way by which he could be adequately protected was by warning him when the avalanche was to take place; that the danger did not arise from the method, negligent or otherwise, in which the workmen performed the duties assigned to them in which they had freedom of action, but inhered in the general mode in which the company carried on its business; and that, in the absence of a due warning, the place was not a safe one in which to work. If these conditions existed, the failure to give the notice was an omission of one of the positive, affirmative obligations of the employer, rendering him liable, irrespective of the relation of the employees to each other. Whether they did exist was a question that should have been submitted to the jury.

The petition described the negligent act complained of as that of White. Under the evidence the plaintiff relied largely upon the failure of Swofford, the foreman, to give the warning. It is urged that on the demurrer the only question was whether the evidence tended to support the exact case presented by the pleading. The trial court, however, in announcing the ruling, placed it upon the ground that the plaintiff's injury was due to the act of a fellow servant. While the assigning of an untenable reason will not warrant reversing a decision if it can be justified upon other considerations, it would be manifestly unfair to nonsuit the plaintiff on account of a variance in proof without giving him an opportunity to amend. Moreover, the variance, especially in view of what has been said already, is of little importance. See, in this connection, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Green, 75 Kan. 504, 89 Pac. 1042.

An argument is also made that the plaintiff ought not to recover on the strength of no warning having been given him, inasmuch as his own testimony showed that he understood the salt might fall at any time and thought he was far enough away to be safe, and that he heard the noise of White's pick as he resumed work, and was by that means notified of the probable fall. These and other matters of the same general character discussed in the brief are really considerations to be presented to the jury. It does not conclusively follow from what the plaintiff said that he would have been satisfied with his position if he had known the fall was coming; and it may be that, even where he stood, he could have saved himself, if he had had timely warning, by stepping to one side so as to avoid being caught against the post. Although he testified that he heard a noise which he afterwards concluded was made by White's pick, he did not say that he identified it as such at the time.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

JOHN N. WEBSTER, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF VANCEBURG.

(— Ky. —, 113 S. W. 140.)

Municipal corporation — adjustment of sidewalk.

1. A municipal corporation is not bound to make the necessary alterations in a sidewalk along a railroad freight depot to permit wagons to be driven from the roadway to the depot.

Same — customary use.

2. The fact that a sidewalk along a freight depot has been driven on and across for many years by teamsters desiring to reach the depot from the roadway does not render the municipality responsible for its safety for such use.

Same — assumption of risk.

3. A teamster who attempts to use a sidewalk along a freight depot as a driveway to reach the depot takes the risk of injury from its being unsafe for that purpose.

recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. D. Cole, for appellant:

It cannot be held as a matter of law that under no circumstances can a sidewalk be used as a crossing for vehicles to pass over.

27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 166.

Mr. R. D. Wilson for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway freight depot in Vanceburg is situated on Main street, alongside of which is a pavement. The lay of the land is such that in getting freight into the depot for shipment, and in getting it out for delivery in town, teamsters have for years crossed the pavement in taking their wagons and drays up to the depot building to load and unload freight. Appellant, who was a drayman, loaded his dray with baled hay from the depot, or a car by it, and for that purpose and his own convenience had driven his dray upon the pavement. In driving off the pavement, the wheels of his dray dropped off at the pavement curbing, one before the other, which was a foot or more lower at that point than the sidewalk. From the jar thus caused appellant was thrown to the ground and sustained a serious injury to his shoulder. He sued the city, because it had neglected to so repair the pavement at that point as to make it reasonably safe for its use by wagons having occasion to go to the freight depot. Upon the evidence showing the foregoing state of facts, the trial court peremptorily instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant city, of which appellant complains on this appeal.

The sidewalks of a city are intended solely for the use of pedestrians. While they must be kept in reasonably safe repair for such use, the city is not bound to keep them fit for the use of vehicles also. If drivers of vehicles nevertheless use them for passage of their wagons, they must do so at their peril. Nor does the fact that the pavements have been so used by the acquiescence of the city for many years affect its liability in the matter, so far as vehicle drivers are concerned.

It is argued that the way used by appellant was the only practicable way for wagons to reach the depot. Be that as it may, the city was not legally bound to provide a roadway for wagons to the railroad depot, and is not liable for a failure to do so. If the driver of the wagon saw proper to use ways not provided for such vehicles, he has no legal complaint against the city that they were not fit for the use to which he was putting them. A city's legal duty is not to furnish streets, even where they may be needed; but it is to keep such as it does furnish in a reasonably safe condition for use for purposes for which they are provided,—sidewalks for pedestrians; roadways for vehicles and horses.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS, & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Appts.,

v.

MINNIE RAINE.

(— Ky. —, 113 S. W. 495.)

Carrier — passenger — acceptance.

1. A passenger who boards a train after telegraphing for a reservation on a certain Pullman car which is not attached to that train, but will be picked up a few miles down the road, and is allowed to remain in a Pullman car pending the arrival of the one on which his reservation is, is not a passenger of the Pullman company, and it is not liable for negligence of its conductor which results in his missing his car.

Same — negligence — liability.

2. Where a sleeping car conductor undertakes, in the presence of the train conductor, to put a lady holding a railroad ticket on the right Pullman car, and tells her to remain in his car until the desired car arrives, the railroad company is liable for his neglect to do so.

Same — connecting carrier — liability.

3. A railroad company receiving a sleeping car from another company upon which is a passenger for a car on its train whom the conductor of the former car has undertaken to put on the right car is not liable for sending that car forward in the first section of the train, so that the passenger does not get it, where it had no notice of her desire until after the train had been separated, and its conductor did all he could to rectify the mistake after learning of it.

Damages — missed train.

4. A railroad company which negligently causes a passenger to miss a train on a connecting road so that she is compelled to stop over at a way station and return home is not liable for injury to her through going into a cold room of a hotel and sitting up all night, or for vexation or personal injury.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Minnie Raine lived in Atlanta, Georgia. Her father lived at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, and she made trips about three times a year from her home to her father's. In January, 1906, she was at her father's, and desired to go home on Sunday, January 7th. That morning her father called up the station agent of the Southern Railway in Kentucky at Harrodsburg by telephone, and told him that he wanted a reservation for his daughter in the sleeper for Atlanta on the train that night. The agent said he would wire Louisville and get it. That afternoon he called up the station agent, and was told by someone at the station that the reservation had been secured. The train from Louisville reached Harrodsburg about 10:35 P. M. Mrs. Raine bought a through railroad ticket to Atlanta, and with this got on the train at the day coach. She passed back, walking through two sleepers, where she found the sleeping car conductor. She asked him for the Atlanta sleeper, saying that she had a reservation in there. He told her there was no Atlanta sleeper on the train, but that there would be an Atlanta sleeper which would come from Cincinnati on the train which they would meet at Danville. Danville is 10 miles from Harrodsburg. The Southern train runs from Louisville to Danville, and there connects with the train running from Cincinnati to Atlanta. While she was talking to the Pullman conductor, the passenger conductor also came in. They told her there was a Chattanooga sleeper on that train, and that she could go into it and get a reservation at once, advising her to do so as the other train was frequently late, and she might have to sit up some time if she waited for the Atlanta sleeper. She had her little boy, about six years old, with her, and, when she learned that she would have to get up about 6 o'clock in the morning if she did this, she decided not to take the Chattanooga sleeper. They then advised her to sit in the Chattanooga sleeper until she got to Danville, telling her that, when they reached Danville, that sleeper would be put next to the Atlanta sleeper, and she would only have to walk from one car to the other, while the Knoxville sleeper, in which she was then, would be put at some distance from the Chattanooga sleeper. She said that she would stay in the Knoxville sleeper with some friends, and they agreed for her to do so. When they reached Danville, the train from Cincinnati was forty minutes late. When she saw it come in, she went to the Pullman conductor, and asked him if he would not go and get her reservation for her. He answered that he was not allowed to leave his sleeper while it was standing at the station; that, as soon as they were out of Danville, he would see about it; that there would be plenty of time. When her car was attached to the other train, she again made the same request of him, and he made in effect the same answer. When the train pulled out of Danville, she and the Pullman conductor went forward and learned there was no Atlanta sleeper on that train; that the Cincinnati train had on that night been divided into two sections, the Atlanta sleeper being in the first section, and the Knoxville sleeper, in which she had been sitting, having been put in the second section. The first section was 10 miles ahead of them. She then said to the Pullman conductor: "Now, see what you have done by not attending to my reservation in Danville." He said: "Madam, I am not to blame. My clothes are on that section too." The train had only been running to Danville a month, and this Pullman conductor had never known the Cincinnati train before to run in two sections, although it happened from time to time when travel was heavy. The Chattanooga sleeper had been put in the first section, and if Mrs. Raine had taken a seat in that sleeper, instead of staying with her friends, there would have been no trouble. The section which she was in went to Knoxville. She talked the matter over with the conductor of the train. He told her that he would wire to Somerset, which was about 50 miles below, and ask that the first section be held there for her. At the next stop, at Junction City, he held his train 10 minutes and did wire to Somerset, but was unable to get an answer. When he was unable to get an answer, he came in and told Mrs. Raine the facts, and they then consulted as to what she had better do. The Pullman conductor had in his pockets the tickets of all the passengers in the Chattanooga sleeper. The Knoxville train would turn off from the main line at Oakdale, a station about half way between Somerset and Chattanooga. Mrs. Raine did not want to sit up all night, and finally concluded that she would get off there and go back to Harrodsburg, and wait there for the next train. The conductor, she says, advised her to do this. The conductor says she proposed it; but, however this may be, she got off voluntarily at the station, and went over to a hotel about 66 feet from the station. It was then about 1 o'clock in the morning. She was assigned to a room by the clerk, but declined at first to have a fire made. Afterwards she had a fire made, but did not go to bed. At 4 o'clock she took the train for Harrodsburg, and went back to her father's, and that evening took the train for Atlanta, and went through without trouble. But she had taken a violent cold, and this cold produced a very bad nervous condition approaching hysteria. The bad nervous condition may have been due also in part to the excitement incident to her leaving the train and sitting up all night. After she got home, she was sick for two months, and at the trial, a year or more later, her health was still infirm. She brought this suit to recover damages against the Pullman Car Company, the Southern Railway in Kentucky, and the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company. On a trial of the case a judgment was rendered in her favor against all the defendants for the sum of $4,000, and they appeal.

The only questions we deem it necessary to consider on the appeal are, first, Should the jury have been instructed peremptorily to find for the defendants? second, If not, what is the proper measure of damages?

1. When Mrs. Raine came upon the sleeper, she had nothing but a railroad ticket. She had no sleeping car ticket, and she had nothing to show that she had any reservation in any sleeper. She remained in the Knoxville sleeper entirely by the courtesy of the conductor. She paid nothing for her seat in that sleeper, and it is evident that he allowed her to remain because she had her little boy with her, and she decided to stay there and talk to her friends until she got to Danville. When the servants of a carrier know that a passenger is in the wrong car and that he must go into another car, they may simply tell him what to do, and ordinarily leave him to follow their directions; but, when they tell him to keep his seat, and that they will, at the proper time, transfer him to the other car, and fail to do so, the company which they represent is liable. Mrs. Raine was not a passenger of the Pullman Car Company, for she had not been received as a passenger. She had simply been allowed to sit in the sleeper with her friends, and the Pullman Car Company is not answerable to her because its conductor failed to get her in the right car. for he did not represent the company as to the Atlanta sleeper, and she had made no contract with the Pullman Car Company, and it owed her no duty. But, while this is so, the Pullman conductor in dealing with Mrs. Raine, who had a railroad ticket, was discharging a duty which the railroad company owed her. The train conductor was with him, and assented to what the Pullman conductor said. In undertaking to transfer Mrs. Raine at Danville to the proper sleeper, and in telling her that she might remain in the Knoxville sleeper until he so transferred her, the Pullman conductor was discharging a duty which devolved upon the Southern Railroad Company. While he might have told Mrs. Raine what to do and left her to follow his directions, a very different state of case is presented when he told her that he would transfer her to the other sleeper, and for her to sit where she was, that there was plenty of time, and he would attend to it. The passenger conductor was present when the arrangement was made, and he left her in the care of the Pullman conductor. It was incumbent on these men, under the circumstances, to see that the lady was transferred to the proper train. The servants of a carrier cannot mislead a passenger, to his prejudice. It is proper that a passenger should obey the instructions which he receives from them; and when they tell a passenger to keep his seat, and they will, at the proper time, transfer him, he has the right to trust implicitly their directions. If Mrs. Raine had not been told to keep her seat, that there was plenty of time, she might have protected herself from the consequences that followed.

We therefore conclude that the jury should have been instructed peremptorily to find for the Pullman Car Company, but that the motion for a peremptory instruction as to the Southern Railway in Kentucky was properly refused. It remains to consider whether any liability was shown on the part of the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company. Mrs. Raine did not see the conductor of this train until after it had pulled out of Danville. He did not take up her ticket, and evidently did all in his power to rectify the mistake that had occurred, for which he was in no wise responsible. She had remained in the Knoxville sleeper with the consent of the conductor of the Southern Railway, and she had come into the custody of the second line when that sleeper was attached to its train. Junction City was a proper place for her to alight, and, as said, she got off there voluntarily. We therefore conclude that there was no liability on the part of the second line; for it had perfect right to run its train in two sections, and to attach the sleepers which came to it from the other line to that section which best suited his convenience. It had no notice of Mrs. Raine's situation until she saw the conductor after the train pulled out from Danville.

2. It remains to consider what is the measure of damages as against the Southern Railway Company. Mrs. Raine, by its negligence, missed her train, and was delayed twenty-four hours in returning home. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Head, 119 Ky. 812, 84 S. W. 752, this court said: "The evidence presents simply a case where the railroad company agreed to furnish transportation, and failed to do so promptly, if Rupert Head was not guilty of contributory negligence in going to the wrong place for his ticket, and of this the jury must judge. But, if the railroad company was negligent in furnishing the transportation, the measure of damages is simply a reasonable compensation for the time lost by Rupert Head and any expenses he incurred by reason thereof." Mrs. Raine testifies that nobody was on the platform when she got off and that she made her way to the hotel alone, but she did not request the conductor to go with her or to furnish anybody to accompany her, or make any objection to his leaving her. The hotel was near by, and it is evident that she went directly to it. The trouble with her was not that she did not go to the hotel without difficulty, but that after she got there she went into a cold room, and stayed there for some time without a fire. Her nervousness was perhaps largely due to the fact that she remained up all night. But neither one of these things was the proximate result of the negligence of the Southern Railway in Kentucky in failing to transfer her to her train. She no doubt acted as she did without realizing the danger; but her remaining in the cold room was not due to the act of the railroad company, and all of the consequences which followed would seem to be due primarily to the violent cold which she took afterwards settling upon her stomach and impairing her digestion. A passenger who, by the negligence of a railroad company, fails to make a connection, cannot hold the railroad company responsible for consequences which a person of ordinary prudence might not reasonably anticipate as the result. A person of ordinary prudence might reasonably anticipate that one who missed his connection would have to pay a hotel bill and would have to wait until the next train, but, a well-regulated hotel being right at hand, other consequences such as these proved here should not be anticipated. Under all the circumstances, we conclude that the proper measure of damages is such expense as Mrs. Raine incurred and the value of the time which she lost by reason of her not being transferred to the Atlanta sleeper. The rule for the measure of damages in such cases is the same for both men and women; and, if this had been a man, manifestly no other damages would be allowed. There was nothing in Mrs. Raine's condition or appearance to show that she was not capable of taking care of herself, or to apprise a person of ordinary prudence that it was not safe to leave her at Junction City within a few feet of a well-regulated hotel. No recovery can be had for vexation or personal inconvenience by reason of the delay. Robinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 452, 57 L.R.A. 611, 68 S. W. 656. Mrs. Raine was treated with courtesy and kindness by all the conductors. The mistake was due to a misapprehension, the Pullman conductor not being allowed to leave his car, and the railroad conductor assuming that the Pullman conductor would get her to the proper sleeper at Danville. The mistake would not have occurred had the Cincinnati train run in one section as it usually did, or if the Pullman conductor had known it was liable to run in two sections. There is nothing in the case to take it out of the general rule as to the measure of damages for delay on a journey.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, Harry Anderson, the owner of a line of cabs, busses, and baggage wagons in the city of Paducah, instituted this action against the defendant, Palmer Transfer Company, a corporation engaged in a similar business, to enjoin the latter from interfering with him in the use of a certain plot of ground adjoining the approach to the Union Depot in Paducah, and also to recover damages for being deprived of the right to use the plot of ground. Defendant's demurrer to the petition being overruled, it then filed answer, denying the allegations of the petition, and claiming that it had the right to use the plot of ground in question under and by virtue of a contract which it made with the Illinois Central Railroad Company, by the terms of which it agreed to meet all incoming and outgoing trains with its cabs and busses, and serve the traveling public in an orderly manner, and further bound itself to transport passengers and baggage from all parts of the city of Paducah at the rate of 25 cents for each passenger and 25 cents for each piece of baggage, and also to perform certain other covenants mentioned in the contract, all of which defendant alleged it had fully and faithfully performed. By reply plaintiff alleged that the contract between the defendant and the railroad company gave to the defendant the exclusive use of a large part of the approach lying nearest to the depot and best equipped with improved walks, and thereby gave to the defendant a monopoly of the passenger and baggage carrying business to and from the depot; that on this account the contract relied upon by the defendant was against public policy, and therefore null and void. By amended petition, the plaintiff also charged that it was the duty of the railroad company to provide comfortable and convenient accommodations for the traveling public, and that it had failed to perform that duty to the public by granting the contract in controversy, which created a practical monopoly of the passenger and baggage carrying business. Depositions were taken, and the case submitted to the chancellor, who granted the injunction prayed for by plaintiff, but declined to give him any damages. From that judgment, the Palmer Transfer Company prosecutes this appeal.

The facts in this case are as follows: The Illinois Central Railroad Company and the Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis Railway Company have a union station in the city of Paducah. Leading southward from Caldwell street towards the depot building there is a roadway or approach 64 feet wide and 315 feet long. A platform or walkway extends along the south end of the roadway its entire width,—64 feet. A sidewalk or platform of gravel or crushed stone, 15 feet in width, with concrete or stone curb, extends along the west side of the roadway its entire length of 315 feet. The roadway and the depot are between the main tracks of the two railroad companies. The passengers board or alight from the Illinois Central trains on the west side of the depot and roadway, and from the Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis trains on the east side thereof. The space occupied by the Palmer Transfer Company is on the west side of the roadway. This space is 32 feet wide, and extends from the south end of the roadway towards Caldwell street 150 feet. This space being taken out of the driveway leaves 32 feet on the east side and 115 feet on the west side that is open to public use. Out of the 32 feet, however, about 8 feet is occupied by the street car line, and, taking into consideration the danger of being near the street car line or the railroad tracks, the space left next to the depot building is about 20 feet. This 20 feet is fairly convenient of access and approach to the Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis trains, but by far the larger portion of the traffic to and from the union depot is over the tracks of the Illinois Central. In order for passengers from the Illinois Central to reach the cabs or busses of those transfer men who are not permitted to occupy the space in question, they must proceed down the platform and pass by the cabs or busses of the Palmer Transfer Company for a space of 150 feet.

Plaintiff Anderson testified that he had on an average three cabs to meet trains at the Union Station, and that the Palmer Transfer Company had four; that it was much more convenient for passengers leaving the Union Station to use the carriages of the Palmer Transfer Company because these carriages were closer, and a portion of the approach set aside for that company had a gravel walkway along its entire length, from which passengers could step into its carriages; that this walkway was not constructed by the Palmer Transfer Company for its own convenience, but was a part of the general depot improvements and conveniences provided by the railroad company for the public; that, in order for a passenger to get to the carriages of the appellee or any other cabmen except the Palmer Transfer Company, they would have to walk a distance of 150 feet past a long line of carriages of appellant; and that, under ordinary circumstances, no passenger would do this. He further stated that he had been in the transfer business since May, 1902, during all of which time the Palmer Transfer Company had excluded him from the use of that portion of the approach in controversy, and that his loss on this account amounted to at least $2 per day up to the day of filing the suit. The witness further testified to the fact that the Palmer Transfer Company had changed the post dividing the space occupied by it from the rest of the roadway, and he was denied admittance to the space so occupied by it, and upon one occasion when he had entered this space a warrant was issued against him by the officers of the Palmer Transfer Company.

For the defendant, R. L. Palmer testified that his company had transfer agents on the various trains, and that the principal part of his business consisted in carrying passengers and the baggage of passengers who had previously contracted with its train agents. Witness produced the contracts between his company and the railroad companies, and made them a part of his deposition. He stated that there was plenty of room for the busses and wagons of other transfer agents to occupy. Witness further testified that his company might secure more business by having the contracts giving the company the right to occupy the place in dispute.

In the case of McConnell v. Pedigo, 92 Ky. 465, 18 S. W. 15, this court had under consideration a question similar to the one involved in the case at bar. In that case the railroad company granted to McConnell, to the exclusion of all other persons engaged in a like business, the right to come upon its depot grounds in Glasgow, Kentucky, with his vehicles for the purpose of receiving and depositing passengers and freight. The contract was being carried out by McConnell when the firm of Pedigo & Hays undertook to transfer passengers to and from the depot, and claimed the right to stand their hacks upon the grounds near and at the depot, when in so doing they did not interfere with the business of the railroad company. McConnell sought an injunction against Pedigo & Hays, and his petition being dismissed, he appealed to this court. It was here held that a regulation of a railroad that discriminates by driving from its depot those who are engaged in a public employment and whose duty it is to provide for their guests and the traveling public, resulting in a monopoly of the particular business, is unauthorized by the charter of a railroad company, and in palpable violation of the rights of others. While it may be admitted that the English rule and the rule of several other states is different from that announced above (Barker v. Midland R. Co. 18 C. B. 46; Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, 147 Mass. 35, 9 Am.

St. Rep. 661, 17 N. E. 89; Hedding v. Gallagher, 72 N. H. 377, 64 L.R.A. 811, 57 Atl. 225), yet the courts of several states hold to the view adopted by this court (Montana Union R. Co. v. Langlois, 9 Mont. 419, 8 L.R.A. 753, 18 Am. St. Rep. 745, 24 Pac. 209; Kalamazoo Cab & Bus Co. v. Sootsma, 84 Mich. 194, 10 L.R.A. 819, 22 Am. St. Rep. 693, 47 N. W. 667, and in the recent case of Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Dohn, 153 Ind. 10, 45 L.R.A. 427, 74 Am. St. Rep. 274, 53 N. E. 937, the case of McConnell v. Pedigo, supra, was cited with approval. That being the case, we see no reason for changing the rule announced by this court.

Counsel for appellant, however, insist that the rule laid down in the case of McConnell v. Pedigo has no application to this case, because abundant space is left for Anderson and other hackmen, and that the contracts between appellant and the railroad companies do not create a monopoly. We confess, however, that we are unable to differentiate this case from that cited. While there is some space still left for Anderson and the other hackmen to occupy, it is so inconveniently located with reference to the larger part of the business of carrying passengers and baggage that the giving to appellant of the space occupied by it constitutes such a preference over other transfer men as to afford it a practical monopoly of the business. There is, in effect, no difference between giving a transfer company the exclusive right to occupy the depot grounds and the right to occupy that portion thereof which necessarily results in its securing by far the larger share of the business. We therefore conclude that appellant's contracts, operating as they do to give it a practical monopoly, are null and void, and that appellant has no right to occupy the space in question to the exclusion of appellee and other hackmen.

We are inclined to the opinion that the chancellor did not err in refusing to allow the plaintiff damages.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

B. F. ESTOPINAL

v.

BERNARD MICHEL, Jr., et al., Appts.

(121 La. 879, 46 So. 907.)

Voters — qualifications — "residence."

1. The term "residence," used by the Constitution in fixing the qualification of voters, does not mean domicil.

Headnotes by PROVOSTY, J.

Same — time qualification — reason for.

2. The object of requiring the voter to have resided for a time at the place where he offers to vote is that he may be afforded an opportunity to acquire the information necessary for an intelligent vote, and become identified with the interests of the locality, and also to prevent the colonization of voters.

Domicil — presumptions — evidence.

3. In the absence of proof that a person otherwise qualified has acquired a residence elsewhere, he must be considered to be a resident of the parish where his work requires him to stay, where he was born, and where he has always lived and voted; and it makes no difference that he has never had in said parish any other home than a boarding house, while he has had in another parish a home, where he has kept his wife and children, whom he has visited as often as he could.

Case Note. — Does "residence," as a qualification of voters, mean "domicil."

Whatever may be the distinction between the terms "residence" and "domicil," when used in other connections, it has been very generally held that the term "residence" as used in the various Constitutions or statutes as a qualification of voters, is the equivalent of, and means no less than, the term "domicil." This is clearly supported by the following cases: Sharp v. McIntire, 23 Colo. 99, 46 Pac. 115; French v. Lighty, 9 Ind. 477; State v. Savre, 129 Iowa, 122, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 455, 113 Am. St. Rep. 452, 105 N. W. 387; Opinion of Justices, 5 Met. 587; Berry v. Wilcox, 44 Neb. 82, 48 Am. St. Rep. 706, 62 N. W. 249; State ex rel. Hannon v. Grizzard, 89 N. C. 115; People ex rel. Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 576, 19 Am. St. Rep. 547, 11 S. E. 665; Sturgeon v. Korte, 34 Ohio St. 525; Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. 302, 10 Am. Rep. 698; Allentown Contested Election Case, 8 Phila. 575; State ex rel. Goldsworthy v. Aldrich, 14 R. I. 171.

Cessna v. Myers, Smith, Elec. Cas. 60, is also cited in 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 598, as supporting the above proposition.

To the same effect is Cadwalader v. Howell, 18 N. J. L. 138, the court, however, taking occasion to say that is was not prepared to say whether or not the two terms in all respects were convertible terms.

Justice Woodward in Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. 420, seems also to have been of the opinion that the term "residence," as used in the constitutional provision relating to suffrage, in its primary meaning is equivalent to "domicil."

In Crawford v. Wilson, 4 Barb. 504, it was said: "From the various definitions of the terms 'residence,' 'inhabitaney,' and 'domicil,' and the decisions in regard to them, I think we can deduce the proposition.

APPEALS by defendants from several judgments of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Plaquemines in plaintiff's favor in actions to have defendants' names stricken from the registration roll of the parish because of alleged nonresidence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Dymond, Jr., for appellants.

Mr. Warren Doyle for appellee.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Six separate suits against as many defendants have been consolidated in this appeal, and have been submitted without brief. The object of the suits is to have the defendants stricken from the registration roll of the parish of Plaquemines for the alleged reason that they are not residents of that parish.

The defendants are bar pilots; that is to say, they pilot vessels in and out to sea at the mouth of the Mississippi river. For discharging these functions they have to be appointed by the governor of the state, and licensed. Their post is at the head of the passes, and they are forbidden by law to leave their post for longer than seven days without a leave of absence from the governor of the state. The place is called Pilot Town. We gather from the record that is a sort of village. There is a schoolhouse, and children go to school. The land there, when not covered by water, is too low and marshy to be trod upon. The communication between the houses is by skiff, or on wharves, or elevated plank walks. The locality is additionally undesirable to inhabit from being exposed to storms. As a consequence, the pilots have homes in New Orleans for their wives and children, to which they themselves go whenever off duty. At Pilot Town they live at a boarding house, or home, which they maintain at common expense. How they divide their time between their New Orleans home and Pilot Town is not shown by the evidence, except as appears from the following: "The pilots sometimes stay one day, sometimes a month, on a station, but more frequently two weeks, and are permitted to be off duty for seven consecutive days."

The Constitution (article 197, fixing the qualification of voters) provides that the voter must be: "An actual bona fide resident of this state for two years, and of the parish one year, and of the precinct in which he offers to vote six months next preceding the election."

The reason of this requirement is stated in 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 596, as follows: "The Constitutions of nearly all the states of the Union and the laws of nearly all of the territories require a residence for a definite period, ranging from that the terms 'legal residence' or 'inhabitaney,' and 'domicil' mean the same thing. By legal residence, I mean the place of a man's fixed habitation; where his political rights, such as the right of the elective franchise, are to be exercised, and where he is liable to taxation."

In Huston v. Anderson, 145 Cal. 320, 78 Pac. 626, it was said that when residence is spoken of in connection with the right of a person to vote, "legal residence" is meant.

In Esker v. McCoy, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 573, it was held that "residence," within the meaning of the statute regarding elections, has reference to and means a fixed place of abode.

In Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. 416, Justice Lockwood, in a concurring opinion, and in considering the question whether, according to the Constitution, an alien had the right to vote, said: "There is no ambiguity in the word 'resident.' Every man is a resident who has taken up his permanent abode in the state."

In Lower Oxford Contested Election, 11 Phila. 641, it was held that by residence is meant the settled place of abode,—where one dwells without definite purpose of removal.

In Re Lower Merion Election, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 257, it was held that a "residence," in the sense contemplated by the election laws, is the place where a voter intends to reside, and where he has assumed, or in- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tends to assume, all the duties, rights, and responsibilities of citizenship.

In Vanderpool v. O'Hanlon, 53 Iowa, 246, 36 Am. Rep. 216, 5 N. W. 119, the court, in discussing the right of a student to vote in the county where the college was located, under a statute making "residence" a qualification, apparently used the terms "residence" and "domicil" interchangeably.

In Illinois it is expressly provided by statute that a "permanent abode" is necessary to constitute a residence, as used in its election laws, and it is held in Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170, that the term "permanent abode" does not mean an abode which the party does not intend to abandon at any future time, but is nothing more than a "domicil," or a "home," which the party is at liberty to leave, as interest or whim may dictate, but without any present intention to change it. To the same effect is Moffett v. Hill, 131 Ill. 239, 22 N. E. 821.

In Johnson v. People, 94 Ill. 505, the constitutionality of the above statute was assailed on the ground that it was repugnant to that part of the Constitution which provided that every person who shall have "resided" in the state, etc., for a certain time, etc., should be entitled to vote, in that the terms "residence" and "permanent abode" were entirely different, and that the latter term required more than the former. The court said, however, following a case in which it was held that every man was a resident who had taken up his permanent three months to two and one-half years, as a prerequisite to the right of suffrage; and they usually require, in addition, a residence for a certain period within the county and voting precinct.

"The purpose of this requirement is to provide a term of educational probation during which the proposed voter may become acquainted with the wants and identified with the interests of the people among whom he proposes to live, and acquire a knowledge of the character and capacity of those who are candidates for office. It, moreover, prevents the colonization of voters within any particular political division."

In State ex rel. Egan v. Steele, 33 La. Ann. 910, this court said: "A residence is one thing, and a domicile is another. A person may have as many residences as he may choose, but can have but one real domicile."

See also Steer's Succession, 47 La. Ann. 1551, 18 So. 503.

A separate title of our Civil Code is devoted to the subject "Domicil and the Manner of Changing Same," and the term "domicil" is one of definite meaning in our law, and may be said to be a technical term: whereas the term "residence" is nowhere defined, and conveys only the general meaning which it possesses in the language; and we think that the word "residence" was used advisedly by the framers of the Constitution, instead of the word "domicil."

abode in the state (Spragins v. Houghton, supra), that they would presume that the framers of the Constitution used the word in the sense in which it had been defined in that case.

In Wisconsin, also, a statute governing elections provides that the term "residence" means a fixed habitation without any present intention of removing therefrom, and to which, when the person is absent, he has the intention of returning; and that one shall not be deemed to have gained a residence within the meaning of the law by merely coming into an election precinct for temporary purposes only, and thus it was held in State ex rel. Hallam v. Lally, 134 Wis. 253, 114 N. W. 447, that a person who moves into a ward a short time before an election, to stay only while engaged on a particular job of work, and has no intention of making it his home, is not a qualified voter in the ward.

The only cases found expressly holding to the contrary, that is, holding that the term "residence," as a qualification of voters, is not the equivalent of, and does not mean, "domicil," are ESTOPINAL v. MICHEL and its companion case, Estopinal v. Vogt, 121 La. 883, 46 So. 908,—a case arising out of similar facts, and depending upon the former for its decision. It will be noticed, however, as clearly appears in ESTOPINAL v. MICHEL, that not only did the defendants have their residence in the parish from the registration roll of which their names were

In like manner the registration law uses the word "residence" and "reside," and not "domicil" or "domiciliated."

In undertaking to determine, therefore, what will constitute a residence, within the meaning of the Constitution, we must go to the dictionary for the meaning of the word "residence." We need not transcribe here the definition of the word. Suffice it to say that it does not imply permanency, or the animo manendi, as does the word "domicil."

That these defendants are residents of Pilot Town, and of no other place, there can be no doubt. They certainly are not residents of New Orleans. Their families are, but not they. Such a thing would be possible as their having never set foot in New Orleans and intended never to do so. The record shows they occasionally visit their families in New Orleans, but not that they reside there.

So far as all the defendants, except Nick Trayanovich, are concerned, they were born in the parish of Plaquemines, and have always lived and voted there, and never elsewhere, and are not shown to have a domicile elsewhere; and hence the parish of Plaquemines would have to be held to be, not only their residence, but even their domicile. Where Nick Trayanovich was born, or where he lived prior to becoming a bar pilot, is not shown. He is not, at any rate, shown to sought to be stricken, but their domicile was there also, and therefore, so far as this note is concerned, these cases can have only the value of obiter dicta, since it could make no difference in the final outcome whether the terms were synonymous or not.

Another case seemingly recognizing a distinction between the two terms is Re Banff Election, 4 N. W. Terr. 140, where it was held that "residence," as used in the election ordinance, means a person's habitual physical presence in a place or country, which may or may not be his home, and that "habitual" does not mean presence in a place for either a long or short time, but the presence there for the greater part of that period. The court took occasion to say: "As an illustration of the above definition, I may cite the following example: A has resided in Calgary for two years. He goes away on business or a trip of pleasure for four months; his residence is still at Calgary, and, if an election were to take place the day after he came back, he would have a vote in Calgary, according to my reading of the elections ordinance."

It is well to note that there may be many other cases where, from the result of the decision, the court must have recognized either that the terms "residence" and "domicil" were synonymous, or that they were not, whichever the case may be; but, unless the court discussed the question here annotated, those cases have been expressly excluded from this note.

have resided elsewhere than in the parish of Plaquemines.

The place where a man's family lives does not determine his domicile, and still less his residence. The domicile of wife and children follows that of the husband, not that of the husband that of wife and children. In the case of State ex rel. Egan v. Steele, supra, the fact that the defendant had sold his home in Tensas parish and purchased another in Natchez, Mississippi, and had removed his family to this new home, was held not to have necessarily had the effect of operating a change of domicile.

Article 208 of the Constitution reads as follows: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence, by reason of his presence, or lost it by reason of his absence, while employed in the service, either civil or military, of this state or of the United States, . . . or on the high seas, or while a student of any institution of learning."

Were it not for this article of the Constitution, the fact that the defendants had accepted a life (or during good behavior) term office would of itself have sufficed, under article 45, Rev. Civ. Code, to have established their domicile at Pilot Town. That article reads: "An acceptance of an office conferred for life or during good behavior implies an immediate transfer of the domicile of the officer to the parish in which he is required to exercise his functions. But public officers who perform duties throughout the state, or in a district composed of several parishes, preserve the domicile they have before their appointment, unless they manifest a contrary intention."

Although, under article 208 of the Constitution, the acceptance of an office for life or during good behavior does not of itself operate a change of domicile to the place where the functions of the office are to be exercised, it is nevertheless a circumstance to be taken into consideration in determining the questions of domicile and residence.

The judgments appealed from are set aside, and the plaintiff's suits are dismissed, with costs in both courts.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ALVIN J. GORDON

v.

JOHN WOOD KNOTT et al.

(199 Mass. 173, 85 N. E. 184.)

Sale — good will.

1. The personal knowledge of a sales agent located at a commercial center, acquired in the sale of his line there, his experience in the business, his acquaintance with available salesmen and to probable customers, and his ability to secure a similar agency in a rival house, may be found to constitute what the parties refer to as good will which his principal purchases from him when placing another person in charge of the agency, so as to form a consideration for the amount agreed to be paid therefor.

Same — derogation from grant.

2. A sales agent located in a commercial center, who, upon surrendering the agency, sells to his principal the good will of the business, cannot derogate from his grant by engaging in a competing business and endeavor to sell similar goods to his old customers.

Same — restriction of acts.

3. Even though one selling the good will of a business cannot be restrained from engaging in a competing business, he will not be permitted to solicit orders from his former customers.

Foreign law — presumption — proof.

4. In the absence of proof of the law of a foreign country, where a contract for sale of the good will of a business was entered into, the court of the forum will presume that it is the same as its own law; and this presumption cannot be affected by statements in its own opinions, or those of the courts of the foreign country, which are not put in evidence.

(May 22, 1908.)

Case Note. — Sale of business and good will as a limitation upon right of vendor to engage in competing business.

As to the right of one copartner to the use of the firm name upon purchasing the interest of his copartner in the firm business and good will, see note to Vonderbank v. Schmitt, 15 L.R.A. 462.

As to the effect upon the right of an individual partner of the sale by a firm of its business and good will, with or without an agreement by the firm not to engage in a similar business, see case note to Southworth v. Davison, post, 769.

This note is confined strictly to the question whether the sale of a business, together with the good will thereof, imposes a restriction upon the right of the vendor to engage in a competing business in the absence of a restrictive covenant pertaining thereto, and excludes cases where such right is restricted by a covenant.

As a general rule, in the absence of an express covenant, the sale of a business, together with the good will thereof, does not import an agreement by the vendor not again to engage in a competing business. Cottrell v. Babcock Printing Press Mfg. Co. 54 Conn. 122, 6 Atl. 791; Porter v. Gorman, 65 Ga. 11; Findlay v. Carson, 97 Iowa, 537, 66 N. W. 759; Ranft v. Reimers, 200 Ill. 386, 60 L.R.A. 291, 65 N. E. 720; Drake v.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench after an interlocutory decree in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel an accounting under a contract for the transfer of a sales agency. Affirmed.

Plaintiff conducted a business in rubber goods in London, England, from 1884 to 1896, handling the goods of the Boston Rubber Shoe Company. For a time the company sold goods to the plaintiff outright without any special contract or agreement with him, but latterly the company had consigned the goods to him retaining title until they were sold, under contracts in which plaintiff is denominated the agent of the company. Finally, on August 28, 1896, the company executed an agreement with the plaintiff by which it agreed to give him the exclusive sale of its goods in Great Britain and on the Continent. On October 28, 1896, the plaintiff executed an assignment to John Wood Knott of the business as carried on by him, including lease-hold, and all the good will of the business, and all the plant, materials, stock in trade, book debts, and assets. Possession was taken under this assignment, and the company thereafter conducted the business through Knott as its agent.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles R. Darling, for plaintiff:

The effect of the assignment of the good will was to preclude the plaintiff from soliciting business from his former customers.

In Shackle v. Baker, 14 Ves. Jr. 468, Lord Eldon, said that, in the absence of anything more than a mere "purchase of the good will of a trade, the vendor would be at liberty to set up the same trade in any other situation."

One who sells a printing plant and newspaper, together with the good will and subscription list, is not thereby prohibited from setting up a rival printing plant and establishing another newspaper. Smith v. Gibbs, supra.

So, the sale of a school and the good will thereof will not prevent the vendor from opening a rival school, he being under no obligation to use his efforts to obtain pupils for the vendee. Close v. Flesher, supra.

The vendor of a business and good will is not prevented from leasing other property owned by him in the immediate vicinity of the business sold, to another, who may engage in a competing business, where the lessor has no interest therein, and there is no collusion between the lessor and the lessee. Bradford v. Peckham, 9 R. I. 250.

As above shown, it has been held in Massachusetts that, upon the sale of an ordinary 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mercantile business and good will, there is no restriction upon the right of the vendor, in the absence of an express agreement, to re-engage in a competing business. The decision in Gordon v. Knott is based upon the distinction between such a sale and the sale of a business in which the vendor of the good will could not engage in a competing business without necessarily derogating from his grant thereof.

The principle upon which this distinction rests is stated in Foss v. Roby, 195 Mass. 292, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1200, 81 N. E. 109, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 571, where it was held that a dentist who sells his interest in a partnership carrying on a dental business, together with the good will thereof, thereby impliedly covenants that he will not set up a rival business, and he will be enjoined, when, three years later, he engages in the practice of his profession in the immediate vicinity of the former business, and solicits patronage from patients of the old firm. In this connection, the court said: "By the contract of sale, while the defendant explicitly conveyed his interest in the good will, he did not expressly covenant to refrain from competition, either as to time, or territory. But, the sale being of an established practice . . . it was implied even if not expressed, that thereafter the . . . [vendor] would so practice his profession as not to injure and perhaps destroy the business he had sold. . . . In a mercantile partnership the sale of the good will conveys an interest in a commercial business the trade of which may be largely, if not wholly, dependent upon locality; and the right which the vendee acquires under such a purchase is the chance of being able to retain the trade connected with the business where it has been conducted. . . . But in a partnership for the practice of dentistry, the personal qualities of integrity, professional skill, and ability attach to and follow the person, not the place. . . . The object to be obtained was the protection of the vendee, and the agreement is to be construed as if the . . . [vendor] had expressly covenanted to render the old practice secure by not competing himself under conditions

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question argued in this case is whether the finding made by the single by which it might either be impaired or destroyed."

It was said in Moore v. Rawson, 199 Mass. 493, 85 N. E. 586, although dictum, that "usually in this commonwealth there is an implied agreement not to set up a competing business that will directly interfere with the business to be carried on by the purchaser of the good will."

This distinction is also recognized and applied in Old Corner Book Store v. Upham, 194 Mass. 101, 120 Am. St. Rep. 532, 80 N. E. 228, where one copartner, who had sold his interest in the business and good will to his copartner in a firm which for thirty-six years had conducted a book store and had dealt largely in books used in or in connection with the Episcopal Church, three years later, organized a corporation bearing his name, to deal in the same line of books,—it was held that the corporation would be perpetually enjoined from directly or indirectly employing the vendor in its business, or recognizing him as a stockholder, except to permit him to sell his shares of stock and receive what was due thereon; although the court did not dispose of the question of the right of the corporation to carry on such a business. The court, in this case, said: "It is settled in this commonwealth that, when a man voluntarily sells the good will of his business, he thereby precludes himself from setting up a competing business which will derogate from the good will which he has sold. . . . In each case where the good will of a business is sold and the vendor sets up a competing business, it is a question of fact whether, having regard to the character of the business sold and that set up, the new business does or does not derogate from the grant made by that sale." And it was further held in this case that the vendor will be enjoined from working for, or holding stock in, or otherwise being connected with, directly or indirectly, such corporation.

So, a physician who sells his practice and good will will be enjoined from re-engaging 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

justice, "that the plaintiff was the owner of something which the parties called a good will," and that the Boston Rubber Shoe Company, hereinafter called the defendant, agreed to pay the plaintiff for this quasi good will, should be reversed. Under the recognized rule, it is to be sustained unless upon the evidence reported it was clearly wrong. Elliott v. Baker, 194 Mass. 518, 80 N. E. 450; Lindsey v. Bird, 193 Mass. 200, 79 N. E. 263.

There is great force in the defendant's contention that, as the business which the plaintiff was carrying on in London in October, 1896, was and for two years had been carried on by him merely as the agent of the defendant, and as the rubber boots and shoes which constituted the stock in trade had been merely consigned to him by the defendant for sale, and it was his duty only to sell them for the defendant, so the business in practice in the same locality as that of the business sold, as such a sale carries with it an implied covenant that the vendor will do nothing to disturb or interfere with the vendee in the enjoyment of that which he has purchased. Dwight v. Hamilton, 113 Mass. 175.

And it was said in Yeakley v. Gaston (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 768, although dictum, that the sale of the good will of the business of a professional man carries with it an obligation to refrain from practising in the future in the territory from which he thereby binds himself to withdraw.

It was held in Townsend v. Hurst, 37 Miss. 679, that the good will of a physician's business passed by a sale of his dwelling and drug stock where he expressly represented to the purchaser, a physician, that he was going to remove from the state, and recommended the purchaser to his former patients, and soon after, upon returning to the same neighborhood, engaged in practising his profession among his former patients; and that, under such circumstances, the vendee would be entitled to a rescission of his contract.

Where one agrees to sell the good will and personal property used upon a milk route, it will be a good defense, when the prospective purchaser is sued for a failure to complete the sale, to show that the prospective vendor had already bargained with another person to purchase another competing milk route. Munsey v. Butterfield, 133 Mass. 492.

It may be said in passing that the case of Angier v. Webber, 14 Allen, 211, 92 Am. Dec. 748, which is cited by the court in GORDON v. KNOTT, was one in which there was an express stipulation upon the part of the vendor against engaging in a competing business.

The sale of all right, title, and good will of a paper route is violated by the vendor by calling upon the patrons thereof and inducing them not to take papers from the ness was the defendant's business, and the good will of that business was the defendant's own property and did not belong to the plaintiff at all. So far as the good will of the business depended upon the reputation of the goods which had been sold, that belonged to the defendant. So far as it depended upon the possession of a valuable list of customers in various countries who would buy rubber boots and shoes, and the consequent ability to communicate readily with probable purchasers of such goods, and thus to effect larger sales at a less expense and with less trouble than otherwise would be the case, full knowledge of all these particulars was already secured to the defendant by the agreements made between itself and the plaintiff on April 2, 1894, and August 1, 1895, respectively. So far as the good will depended upon the effect of the plaintiff's personality in the business, the defendant rightly says that this was not included in what the plaintiff turned over to Knott for its benefit.

But it could be found that these considerations do not cover the whole of the existent good will of this business. The plaintiff had built up a very large trade in England and other foreign countries, and, although this does not appear to have been profitable, yet so extensive a connection as he had formed might, under a wiser management or more fortunate circumstances, be capable of returning large gains. At any rate, the defendant regarded it as worth while to take a transfer not only of all the assets of the business and of the plaintiff's leasehold estate in the premises in which it was carried on, but also of the good will, of which the plaintiff was called in the assignment the beneficial owner. The plaintiff himself, according to one part of the vendee, but from the former, as such conduct differs from establishing a rival business it takes away the very thing sold. Wentzel v. Barbin, 189 Pa. 502, 42 Atl. 44.

Right to use similar name.

The sale of a business and good will conducted under the vendor's name, to one who adopts another name for the same, will not prevent the vendor setting up a competing business under his own name, and receiving mail directed in such name to the old address. Ranft v. Reimers, 200 Ill. 386, 60 L.R.A. 291, 65 N. E. 720.

And the sale of a business and good will will not prevent the vendor from using his own name in a competing business, although his surname is a portion of a trademark sold. White v. Trowbridge, 216 Pa. 11, 64 Atl. 862. To the same effect, see Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. La Belle Wagon Works (Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish) 82 Wis. 546, 16 L.R.A. 453, 33 Am. St. Rep. 72, 52 N. W. 595.

Upon the sale by a partner to his co-partner of his interest in a partnership business, conducted under the name of "John Douglas & Company," together with the good will thereof, John Douglas, the vendor, was enjoined from using the name "John Douglas & Company" for a competing business established next door to the old establishment, by himself and three others, who, for a long period, had been in the employ of the old firm, notwithstanding the vendee adopted a new firm name after the sale, as such conduct upon the part of the vendor amounted to a violation of the contract of sale of the good will. Churton v. Douglas, 5 Jur. N. S. 837.

Upon the sale of a business and good will to a corporation, which adopts as a corporate name the name the vendor had been using, the vendor, after being employed for four years as an officer of the corporation, may, upon severing his connection therewith, establish a rival business under his own name, and advertise himself as formerly 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with such corporation. Newark Coal Co. v. Spangler, 54 N. J. Eq. 354, 34 Atl. 932. Emery, V. C., however, said, if the only question was whether the vendor, after having sold the good will of his business, was entitled to carry on a rival business, stating his former connection with that sold, that he would be inclined to grant an injunction; but that, under the circumstances of the present case, after the vendor had been employed by the corporation for that length of time he was under no obligation, upon severing his connection with the corporation, not to state his former connection therewith.

While the vendor may use his own name upon setting up a rival business, he cannot adopt the name, not his own, formerly used by him to designate the business and good will sold. Drake v. Dodsworth, 4 Kan. 159.

So, upon the sale of a partnership business and good will carried on under the name of the Kalamazoo Wagon Company, under which the purchasers continue the business, the vendors will be restrained, upon engaging in a rival business, from using the corporate name of the Kalamazoo Buggy Company, or one so similar to that acquired by the vendee as to mislead customers as to the identity of the two companies. Myers v. Kalamazoo Buggy Co. 54 Mich. 215, 52 Am. Rep. 811, 19 N. W. 961, 20 N. W. 545.

As to the right of a vendor to use a trade-name or the name of a business establishment sold with the good will upon setting up a rival business, see note to Vonderbank v. Schmitt, 15 L.R.A. 462.

Sale under mortgage or bankruptcy proceeding.

Upon the sale of a business and good will under a commission in bankruptcy, the purchaser cannot enjoin the bankrupt, after his discharge, from setting up a rival business. Walker v. Mottram, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 355; Hudson v. Osborne, 21 L. T. N. S. 386; Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. Jr. 335.

So, where the property and good will sold competing business. He relies upon the language of Loring, J., in Hutchinson v. Nay, 187 Mass. 263, 264, 68 L.R.A. 186, 105 Am. St. Rep. 390, 72 N. E. 974, in which it is shown that the rule of Labouchere v. Dawson, L. R. 13 Eq. 322, to the effect already stated, although since doubted or denied in other cases, has been finally confirmed by the House of Lords in Trego v. Hunt [1896] A. C. 7. But to this contention there are two answers.

In the first place, even if this rule were applied to the contract before us, the plaintiff, under the agreement which he has made, would not be allowed to solicit orders from his former customers, even though he might set up a competing business. Accordingly, the extent and value of the good will which he had transferred to Knott, though much diminished, would not be wholly destroyed. But, in the second place, the real answer to this contention is that when, in a contest in our own courts, the rights of the parties depend upon any foreign law, what that law is is purely a question of fact, to be determined by such evidence as may be offered thereon. Rev. Laws, chap. 175, §§ 71, 75, 76; Demelman v. Brazier, 193 Mass. 588, 79 N. E. 812. We do not find that there was any evidence of the law of England as to this matter before the single justice; and we cannot ourselves consider evidence which was not introduced before him. But, in the absence of evidence, it cannot be presumed that the common or commercial law of England differs from ours. Callender, McA. & T. Co. v. Flint, 187 Mass. 104, 72 N. E. 345; Cherry v. Sprague, 187 Mass. 113, 67 L.R.A. 33, 105 Am. St. Rep. 381, 72 N. E. 456; Mittenthal v. Mascagni, 183 Mass. 19, 23, 60 L.R.A. 812, 97 Am. St. Rep. 404, 66 N. E. 425; Chase v. Alliance Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 311. Upon this question of fact, we can no more consider statements made in the reasoning adopted in the opinions of our own court than decisions in the English courts not put in evidence at the hearing. Accordingly this contention of the defendant must fail.

It may be added that the words of the agreement in question in which the plaintiff is called the beneficial owner of the property assigned are not without weight upon the question, though their probative value is, of course, much lessened, both by the fact that he was in no sense the beneficial owner of much of the property assigned, and by the further fact that Leland, who represented the defendant in the negotiations that preceded the making of the assignment, had refused in those negotiations to admit that the plaintiff owned any good will in the business. On the whole, we are satisfied that the findings of the single justice upon this question was warranted by the evidence and cannot be set aside; and it is conceded that in that event the further finding that the defend-pleases in the papers, stating that he is carrying on such business. He is entitled to publish any circulars to all the world that he is carrying on such a business; but he is not entitled, either by private letter or by a visit, or by his traveler or agent, to go to any person who was a customer of the old firm and solicit him not to continue his business with the old firm, but to transfer it to him, the new firm. That is not a fair and reasonable thing to do after he has sold the good will. Customers, it is true, may be affected by public advertisements and public circulars, but that does not, in the slightest degree, militate against the principle I have laid down."

But, upon such a sale by one copartner upon engaging in a competing business, he will not be restrained from dealing with those old customers of the firm who may choose to deal with him. Leggott v. Barrett, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 306.

However, it was held in Curl Bros. v. Webster [1904] 1 Ch. 685, that the vendor of a business and good will, upon organizing a corporation to carry on a rival business, would be enjoined from personally soliciting trade even from such customers of the old business as had before solicitation voluntarily become patrons of the corporation; and, although the injunction would not issue against the corporation, the vendor would be restrained from suggesting solicitation by travelers or other agents of the corporation.

Where one copartner, upon selling his interest in a partnership business and good will to his copartners, together with the right to use the firm name, expressly reserved the right to engage in a competing business, he may, under his own or any other name than that of the old firm, advertise such business in newspapers and by posters, and publish circulars, and may trade with all who choose to deal with him; but he may not apply either personally or otherwise to customers of the old firm, and request them to deal with him and not with the old firm. Burkhardt v. Burkhardt, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 185.

So, a retiring partner who sells his interest in the firm business and good will to his copartner, but expressly stipulates that he may set up a similar business in the same neighborhood, upon so doing will be enjoined from soliciting patronage from customers of the old firm. Gillingham v. Beddow [1900] 2 Ch. 242.

After the sale of a business and good will in bankruptcy proceedings, the bankrupt, after discharge, upon setting up a competing business, may solicit patronage from the customers of the old business. Walker v. Mottram, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 355. And also see supra, "Sale under mortgage or bankruptcy proceedings."

ant had agreed to pay for this something in the nature of a good will was also warranted.

It is very difficult, to be sure, to see how such a qualified and limited good will could have any considerable pecuniary value; but that question is not before us. After the decree that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting shall have been entered, the value of this good will, as well as of the leasehold premises and his office furniture, and of any commissions to which the plaintiff may have become entitled, and of any part of the deposit in the Bank of England that may be found to have been his private property, as well as the amount of the Albert L. Gordon note, and the amount of the plaintiff's indebtedness to the defendant, will all be open for investigation either before a single justice or before a master.

As to the testimony the admission of which was excepted to, we are of opinion that, so far as it has not turned out to be immaterial, it was admissible to prove the promise of the defendant to pay the plaintiff for his good will and to show the meaning put by the parties upon that term, and the conditions which existed while the contract was under consideration. Smith v. Vose & Sons Piano Co. 194 Mass. 193, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966, 120 Am. St. Rep. 539, 80 N. E. 527, and cases there cited.

Accordingly, a decree will be entered declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting with the defendant as already stated.

So ordered.

GEORGE A. SOUTHWORTH et al., Reapts.,
v.

JAY DAVISON et al., Appts.

(— Minn. —, 118 N. W. 363.)

Contracts — sale of good will — validity.

1. A sale of the good will of an established business in connection with a sale of the business is not, if reasonable in other respects, void because unlimited as to time.

Partnership — sale of good will — effect.

2. Such a sale by a copartnership binds the members thereof individually as well as copartners.

overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin them from engaging in the laundry business within a certain radius of Northfield in violation of their contract not to do so. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William W. Pye and Charles R. Pye, for appellants:

The provision requiring grantors not to engage in the laundry business within 5 miles of the city of Northfield, being unlimited as to duration, is void.

The contract is not obnoxious because unlimited in time.

Case Note. — Effect on right of individual partners of sale by firm of good will of business with or without an agreement not to re-engage in the same business.

Cases involving express and explicit covenants on the part of the individuals not to engage in the same business are excluded.

So, a stipulation, upon the sale of a partnership business and good will, not to engage for a period of ten years, "either directly or indirectly, or concern ourselves in carrying on or conducting," a similar business, either as principals, agents, servants, or otherwise, binds the copartners individually. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

And a subsequent purchaser acquiring the business and good will from the vendee may enjoin a breach of such covenant upon the part of the remote vendor. Ibid.

It was said in Moreau v. Edwards, 2 Tenn. Ch. 347, that while one copartner might, upon the sale of the partnership business and good will, bind the copartnership by an agreement not to re-engage in the same business, yet he could not thereby bind the partners individually.

It was held in Hutchinson v. Nay, 187 Mass. 262, 68 L.R.A. 186, 105 Am. St. Rep. 390, 72 N. E. 974, that the sale of the good will of a partnership, as part of the firm assets, upon a dissolution proceeding, will not preclude the surviving partner from entering into a competing business and soliciting trade from the customers of the old firm. The court said: "Where a sale of partnership assets is forced upon the survivor by the administrator of a deceased partner, the surviving partner is not in the position of a sole trader who voluntarily has parted with the good will of his business. He is not bound to retire from business, as a sole trader impliedly elects to do by voluntarily selling his good will. A sale of good will forced upon the surviving partner is like the sale of the good will of a sole trader by his trustee or assignee in bankruptcy. . . . No injustice is done to the estate of a deceased partner by this rule. If the estate gets all that the creditors of a sole trader can get, full justice is done to it, while to put the surviving partner in the position assumed by a sole trader, who voluntarily has elected to sell the good will, would be an act of great injustice."

In Moore v. Rawson, 199 Mass. 493, 85 N. E. 586, in speaking of the right of copartners to engage in a competing business after the sale of the business and good will of the partnership by a receiver in dissolution proceedings, Knowlton, Ch. J., said (obiter) that, under such a sale, either of the partners would have a right to re-establish a new business of the same kind, and solicit trade from customers of the old firm.

enjoin defendants from engaging in the laundry business within a radius of 5 miles from the city of Northfield. Defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, and appealed from an order overruling it.

The complaint alleges that, prior to December 21, 1906, defendants had established, and for several years theretofore had conducted, in the city of Northfield, a steam laundry under the copartnership name of Davison & Lyman, and were enjoying a large and profitable trade; that, on the date stated, plaintiffs and defendants entered into a contract under and by which plaintiffs purchased from defendants said business and all property used in the operation and conduct of the same for the consideration of $5,000. The contract was in writing, and contained, among other things, the

In Hall v. Barrows, 4 DeG. J. & S. 150, it was said that the sale of a partnership business and good will in a dissolution proceeding would not prevent the copartners from again engaging in a similar business.

But the purchaser of a business and good will of a partnership at a receiver's sale in a dissolution proceeding—wherein the court enjoined the copartners from in any wise derogating from the good will of such business—may restrain one of the copartners, who sets up a rival business directly across the street from the old stand, from soliciting customers of the old firm, enticing away the purchaser's employees, and from using a business sign and advertising devices similar to those upon the old place of business. Richardson v. Westjohn, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1043.

It was held in Iowa Seed Co. v. Dorr, 70 Iowa, 481, 59 Am. Rep. 446, 30 N. W. 866, that, conceding that one purchasing at a sale for benefit of creditors, under a deed of assignment, acquired the good will of a copartnership, he could not restrain one partner from again engaging in the same line of business under the old firm name.

It was held in Marcus Ward & Co. v. Ward, 40 N. Y. S. R. 792, 15 N. Y. Supp. 913, that the sale of a partnership business and good will by a firm to a corporation, without a restrictive covenant as to re-engaging therein, will not prevent an individual partner, after ceasing to be a stockholder of the corporation, from setting up a rival business and soliciting custom from the vendee's patrons.

So, he may also describe himself as late of the old partnership, the name of which had been adopted by the vendee as a corporate name. Ibid. The court relied upon Pearson v. Pearson, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 145, which, however, was overruled in Trego v. Hunt [1896] A. C. 7.

As to the right of one, including a retiring partner, who sells the good will of his business without any restrictive covenants as to re-engaging therein to engage in a competing business, see case note to Gordon v. Knott, ante, 762.

following stipulation: "It is further stipulated that vendors hereby sell and transfer the good will of the Davison & Lyman Steam Laundry to the vendees herein, and agree not to engage in the laundry business within a radius of 5 miles from the city of Northfield, Minnesota." The complaint further alleges that thereafter, and notwithstanding the sale of said business and the good will thereof, as above stated, defendants, in violation of the above agreement, organized and equipped a corporation for the purpose of conducting and carrying on a laundry business in said Northfield, and that they are now operating the same with others associated with them. The prayer for relief is that plaintiffs recover of defendants $5,000 damages for the violation of the contract, and that defendants be restrained and enjoined from continuing in said business either as members, stockholders, or agents of the corporation, or as individuals.

The sufficiency of the complaint is challenged in three respects: (1) That the contract by which the good will of the steam laundry was sold to plaintiffs is void for the reason that it is unlimited as to time; (2) that the contract bound defendants only as copartners, and not as individuals; and (3) that the contract is void for want of a sufficient consideration to support it. The objections are not well taken.

1. The rules of law applicable to the sale of the good will of business establishments have in recent years undergone material change. Formerly it was generally regarded as essential to the validity of such contracts that they be limited both as to time and place. Long v. Towl, 42 Mo. 545, 97 Am. Dec. 355; Mandeville v. Harman, 42 N. J. Eq. 185, 7 Atl. 37; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 848, and cases cited. And numerous expressions in the adjudicated cases still give out the impression that contracts not so limited are void and unenforceable. Kronschabel-Smith Co. v. Kronschabel, 87 Minn. 230, 91 N. W. 892; Espenson v. Koepke, 93 Minn. 278, 101 N. W. 168; National Ben. Co. v. Union Hospital Co. 45 Minn. 272, 11 L.R.A. 437, 47 N. W. 806. The settled modern law, however, is, both in England and in this country, that limitation as to both time and place is unnecessary, if the agreement in other respects be reasonable, and not in conflict with public policy or the general welfare. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 927. The validity of such contracts often depends upon the nature and character of the business, and whether the restraints afforded the grantee reasonable protection, or impose restrictions either as to time or place which are unreasonable. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co. v. Nordenfelt, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 273; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 86; McCurry v. Gibson, 108 Ala. 451, 54 Am. St. Rep. 177, 18 So. 806; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 80 Am. Rep. 464, 13 N. E. 419. But in cases involving ordinary business establishments or occupations the failure to prescribe a time limitation does not invalidate the contract. The rule, broadly stated, seems to be that no contract of this kind is void as being in restraint of trade where it operates simply to prevent a party from engaging or competing in the same business. Leslie v. Lorillard, 110 N. Y. 519, 1 L.R.A. 456, 18 N. E. 363. Though there are authorities which hold that no limitation of time renders the contract invalid (Mandeville v. Harman, 42 N. J. Eq. 185, 7 Atl. 37; Carroll v. Giles, 30 S. C. 412, 4 L.R.A. 154, 9 S. E. 422), the great preponderance of authority sustains the converse of the proposition where there is a proper limitation as to place (Pemberton v. Vaughan, 10 Q. B. 87; Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175, 36 Am. Rep. 64; Swanson v. Kirby, 98 Ga. 586, 26 S. E. 71; O'Neal v. Hines, 145 Ind. 32, 43 N. E. 946; Smith v. Brown, 164 Mass. 584, 42 N. E. 101; Up River Ice Co. v. Denler, 114 Mich. 296, 68 Am. St. Rep. 480, 72 N. W. 157; Webster v. Buss, 61 N. H. 40, 60 Am. Rep. 317; French v. Parker, 16 R. I. 219, 27 Am. St. Rep. 733, 14 Atl. 870; Kramer v. Old, 119 N. C. 1, 34 L.R.A. 389, 56 Am. St. Rep. 650, 25 S. E. 813; Cottingham v. Swan, 128 Wis. 321, 107 N. W. 336).

2. There is no special force in defendants' second contention, that the contract bound them only as copartners. It is thoroughly settled that the good will of business concerns is, though intangible, a species of property transferable from hand to hand as other property. Bradford v. Montgomery Furniture Co. 115 Tenn. 610, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 979, 92 S. W. 1104; Williams v. Wilson, 4 Sandf. Ch. 379; Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & El. 438. And, if sold by a copartnership, the transfer necessarily vests the entire beneficial interest in the purchaser, to the exclusion of any right of the individual members of the selling firm. It stands, so far as bargain and sale is concerned, as other partnership property; and, as an ordinary sale of an article owned by the firm binds all the members thereof, the sale of the good will has the same effect. It would be a far-fetched doctrine that would enable one of the partners to set up his individual claim to property sold by the firm in the usual course of business on the theory that the sale only affected his rights as a copartner. Hubbard v. Miller, 27

Mich. 15, 15 Am. Rep. 153. And to construe the contract in harmony with defendants' contention would expressly destroy the purpose intended by the transaction, viz., the prevention of defendants, either as partners or individuals, from competing in the laundry business in Northfield. And, though contracts of this kind are generally strictly construed, the rule is not so severe as to justify a conclusion at variance with the plain purpose and intention of the parties. Any other conclusion would not only enable the individual partner to reclaim partnership property sold for value during the existence of the firm, but justify the commission by him of a palpable fraud by doing indirectly that which he could not do as a member of the firm. Eisel v. Hayes, 141 Ind. 41, 40 N. E. 119.

3. The contract is shown to have the support of a valuable consideration in the purchase price of the property with the good will as an incident. Eisel v. Hayes, supra. The complaint also sufficiently alleges a violation of the contract. It charges that defendants have been instrumental in the organization of a corporation for the purpose of conducting a laundry business in Northfield, and that they are managing its affairs. This is a clear violation of the contract. Ibid.

Order affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM BLAKELEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
WHITE STAR LINE.

(— Mich. —, 118 N. W. 482.)

Pleasure resort — protection of patrons.

1. The owner of a pleasure resort, who permits the playing of ball away from the portion of the grounds devoted to such sport and near to that devoted to dancing, without notifying those interested in the dancing or taking precautions to protect them from injury, may be liable for an injury inflicted by a ball thrown upon a spectator of the dancing.

Same — absence of admission fee.

2. That a transportation company maintaining a pleasure resort at the termination of its line as an inducement to persons to patronize the line charges no fee for admission to it, depending for its profit on the passengers carried, does not exempt it from the rule requiring the owners of pleasure resorts to protect invited guests from unusual occurrences which may result in serious danger to them.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, Ch. J.:

The defendant owns and operates a line of boats running from Detroit to various places on the St. Clair river. It owns and controls a pleasure resort known as "Tashmoo park." It makes no entrance charge to visitors, but makes its profit by carrying passengers to and from the park. It has furnished various means of amusement, including a baseball ground known as "The Diamond," a dancing pavilion, and places for other forms of amusement. On June 18, 1905, the retail clerks of Detroit gave a special excursion to the park, and were given by the defendant the right to the possession of the diamond for the purposes of playing baseball. Plaintiff went to the park with this excursion. When the excursion arrived, the diamond was in possession of a club of players known as the "Mohawk club." They surrendered, evidently under the instruction of the defendant, the diamond to players of the retail clerks. Some members of the Mohawk club on leaving the diamond went outside, between it and the pavilion, where a dance was in progress, and commenced pitching and catching balls. Plaintiff stood near the pavilion, Case Note. — Liability of one maintaining place of amusement to which the public is invited, for safety of persons visiting the premises.

This subject is treated in a case note to Higgins v. Franklin County Agri. Soc. 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1132. A few decisions in point have been rendered since that note.

In Scott v. University of Michigan Athletic Asso. 152 Mich. 684, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 234, 116 N. W. 624, it was held that the mere employment, by persons about to give an athletic exhibition to which the public was invited upon payment of an admission fee, of competent persons to build and inspect a stand for the accommodation of patrons, did not absolve them from liability for injuries to a patron from the collapse of the stand through a patent defect discoverable by the exercise of proper care, since, by inviting the public and charging an admission fee, they impliedly contracted that, except for defects not discoverable by reasonable means, the stand was safe.

In Stair v. Kane, 84 C. C. A. 126, 156 Fed. 100, it was held that the petition and evidence made a case of negligence which was properly submitted to the jury, where it was alleged, and the evidence tended to support the allegations, that among the appliances of a theater of which the defend-with his back to the players, watching the dance. A ball was thrown towards the pavilion. The catcher failed to catch it, and it struck the plaintiff's ankle with such force that it broke the bones. Plaintiff brought this suit, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant, its agents, and servants "to keep and maintain its park and recreation grounds in an orderly manner, . . . and to see that all dangerous games, diversions, and recreations, in which there was an element of danger to patrons and the public, should not be played upon any portion of its park except that set aside for such diversions and amusements, and not in places in said park in close proximity to the paths and spots where passengers and patrons were accustomed to be and to gather, and at places not intended for the exercise and carrying on of such pastimes and diversions." The declaration further avers the duty of the defendant to employ and maintain in its park agents and servants for the purpose of seeing to the care, safety, and security of its patrons, and a violation of this duty. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court directed a verdict for the defendant. In so directing he stated that "the game of throw and catch would not be a dangerous game where it is conducted in a way that is not wild and erratic, and there is nothing in the testimony to indicate that it was extremely wild and careless, or that the conduct of the little game that was being conducted would be such that people must take notice of those people who are supposed to look out for the comfort and safety of the people in the park. It ant had control was a fire extinguisher, which was kept on the sill of an open window at the side of the stairway leading to the gallery of the theater, that it was unsecured, and was in a place where men and boys in crowding down the stairway as was usual at the close of a performance, were likely to knock it out of the window, as they in fact did, and that it fell and injured the plaintiff as he was leaving the theater after attending a night performance.

In Brown v. Batchellor (R. I.) 69 Atl. 295, it was held that a count in a declaration which set up that it was the duty of the defendant, the proprietor of a theater, to have provided some protection for spectators occupying seats at or near the stage from injury by reason of bicycles and the performers thereon riding or falling off the stage into the audience, was not demurrable on the ground that defendant was under no such duty.

In Nephler v. Woodward, 200 Mo. 179, 98 S. W. 488, it was held that whether a hole in a carpet covering the aisle of a theater was of such a character that the proprietors of the theater ought to have recognized it as being dangerous to their is just such a game as people visiting a park of this kind might naturally expect to be conducted there, and which they must look out for. They must look out for the dangers incident to such a game."

Mr. Clarence P. Milligan, for plaintiff in error:

It was the duty of defendant to render the public park a reasonably safe place for all persons who might be in attendance there.

Co.* 8 App. Div. 509, 40 N. Y. Supp. 764.

Messrs. Gray & Gray for defendant in error.

Grant, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for each party cite with approval, as the law applicable to this case, the statement of Justice Cooley, in his work on Torts (page 605): "One is under no obligation to keep his premises in a safe condition for the visits of trespassers. On the other hand, when he expressly or by implicapatrons, and have guarded against it, was a question of fact for the jury.

In the preceding case it was held that the owners of a theater were not liable for an injury to a patron, caused by catching her foot in a round hole, 3 inches in diameter, in a carpet on the floor, unless before the accident the condition was such that, by the exercise of ordinary care, they could have foreseen probable danger.

In Lumsden v. L. A. Thompson Scenic R. Co. 114 N. Y. Supp. 421, it was held that a corporation, operating a scenic railway by the use of cars which, after being drawn up a steep incline, were allowed by the force of gravity to descend steep and abrupt inclines along a devious track, was not guilty of negligence in failing to notify a passenger, who knew the general nature of the ride which she was about to take, that she must hold on to the car, and not fall off.

In Nephler v. Woodward, supra, it was held that a patron of a theater, being shown to her seat by an usher, had the right, in the absence of any warning to the contrary, to presume that it was safe to follow where the usher led the way, and was not bound to be on the lookout for holes in the carpet.

tion invites others to come upon his premises, whether for business, or for any other purpose, it is his duty to be reasonably sure that he is not inviting them into danger, and to that end he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to render the premises reasonably safe for the visit." This rule has been cited with approval by this and many of the courts of other states. The difficulty lies only in applying the rule to the facts of a given case. We find, however, no difficulty in applying the rule to the facts here. Plaintiff was invited to the defendant's park or pleasure ground to spend the day. In so far as various sports were allowed to be carried on in places allotted for them, visitors who went to the vicinity of these places to witness the sports undoubtedly assumed the risk of danger. In this case the defendant had marked off the grounds for the game of baseball. It is knowledge common to all that in these games hard balls are thrown and batted with great swiftness; that they are liable to be muffed or batted or thrown outside the lines of the diamond, and visitors standing in position that may be reached by such balls have voluntarily placed themselves there with knowledge of the situation, and may be held to assume the risk. They can watch the ball, and may usually avoid being struck. Plaintiff had no reason to anticipate a game of throw and catch of the diamond, and in close proximity to the dancing pavilion. The defendant should not have permitted such a game in close proximity to a crowd of visitors, without giving notice, or making proper arrangement for the protection of its visitors. There is testimony from which a jury might infer that this game, in this unusual place, had been going on for a sufficient length of time to give notice to the defendant's agents or superintendents that it was in progress, and that a woman had been struck nearly a half hour before, and seriously injured by a ball thus thrown. The owners of pleasure resorts may not permit dangerous sports to be played in places other than those set apart for them. This plaintiff was standing where he had been invited. He was not in any danger from a ball game played at the customary place. The defendant owed him a duty, and that was either to prevent the game at that unusual place, or to notify him and other visitors that it was to be played. It was likewise its duty to keep a reasonable number of watchmen or servants to see that its grounds were protected from the playing of games as dangerous as this was. It may safely be inferred that this ball was thrown with all the force and swiftness with which the thrower was capable. The result justifies the inference. This may not be 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"extremely wild and careless" ball throwing, as between players who were on their guard, or as to visitors who were warned that the game was in progress. But as to those who were not warned, and who have no knowledge of it, I do not agree with the circuit judge that it was not "wild and careless throwing."

We held in Cousineau v. Muskegon Traction & Lighting Co. 145 Mich. 314, 108 N. W. 720, that a common carrier of passengers owning a park owed a duty to the plaintiff, a girl, to protect her from the crowd as she was attempting to enter one of its cars. For the same reason there given, the owner of the park is bound to protect its invited guests from unusual occurrences which may result in serious danger to its patrons, if he has the requisite notice or knowledge. The rule we have thus enunciated as applicable to this case is sustained by the following authorities: Selinas v. Vermont Agri. Soc. 60 Vt. 249, 6 Am. St. Rep. 114, 15 Atl. 117; Richmond & M. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 37 L.R.A. 258, 27 S. E. 70; Lane v. Minnesota State Agri. Soc. 62 Minn. 175, 29 L.R.A. 708, 64 N. W. 382; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 998; Brotherton v. Manhattan Beach Improv. Co. 48 Neb. 563, 33 L.R.A. 598, 58 Am. St. Rep. 709, 67 N. W. 479; Id. 50 Neb. 214, 69 N. W. 767; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Dawson, 31 Ind. App. 605, 68 N. E. 909; Williams v. Mineral City Park Asso. 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 924, and note, (128 Iowa, 32, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 427, 111 Am. St. Rep. 184, 102 N. W. 783). See also Larkin v. Saltair Beach Co. 30 Utah, 86, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 982, 116 Am. St. Rep. 818, 83 Pac. 686, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 977. Invitation is sufficient. Pecuniary profit to the owner is not essential. 1 Thomp. Neg. § 968; Clarke v. Palmer, 129 Mass. 373. The learned counsel for the defendant cite and rely upon Steele v. Boston, 128 Mass. 583, and other similar cases. In that case the public park was "traversed by divers footpaths, leading in different directions," with openings in the fence, to give access to and from the adjoining streets. One of these paths had been fitted up by the public authorities for boys to coast upon with sleds. They had built a bridge over an intersecting path, and had stationed a policeman at the foot of the path to keep people from walking on it. It had turned water on it so that it might freeze and render the path slippery. The plaintiff deliberately walked along this path and was injured by a coaster. The court used the following language: "If a private person owned a similar park to which he had given the public free access, we are at a loss to see how he could be held liable for an accident like that of the plaintiff. Such person might, if he saw fit, set apart and fit for use one of the paths for the recreation of youth in coasting, and if anyone should, as was the case with the plaintiff, choose to enter upon the path, seeing that it was set apart for this purpose, he would do so at his own risk, and could not hold the owner responsible if he was injured by a passing sled." The court further held that, if the path were in a public highway, the plaintiff could not maintain his suit because the statute gave no right of action. That case does not apply to this.

So the defendant in its private park may establish places for a sport dangerous to those visitors who choose to come within the radius of danger, without incurring liability for an injury. Visitors, however, may properly assume that they may visit other places without being exposed to the dangers of the same sport elsewhere.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. DON BALES, Appt.,

v.

THOMAS BAILEY, Sheriff of Beltrami County.

(— Minn. —, 118 N. W. 676.)

Officer — de facto — courts.

1. There may be a de facto officer, though no de jure office exists, as in de facto municipal corporations or de facto courts.

Habeas corpus — legal existence of court — attack.

2. The legal existence of a court organized and created under color of law cannot be questioned in habeas corpus sued out by a person convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in proceedings had before it.

Courts de facto — collateral attack.

3. Even though defectively organized, the organization being authorized by law, the municipal court of Bemidji is at least a de facto court and the judge and clerk thereof de facto officers, and the right of the court to exercise judicial functions can be inquired into only at the instance of the state in direct proceedings brought for that purpose.

(November 20, 1908.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Beltrami County

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Note. — The question whether a de jure office is a condition of a de facto officer, is treated in a case note to Lang v. Bayonne, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 93.

discharging a writ of habeas corpus sued out to secure the release of relator from the custody of Sheriff Thomas Bailey to which he had been committed upon conviction of petit larceny by an alleged illegally established court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank A. Jackson for appellant.

Mr. Henry Funkley for respondent.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator was convicted in the municipal court of Bemidji of petit larceny, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for the term of ninety days. He thereafter sued out a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that his imprisonment was illegal and without authority of law, in that the said municipal court was never legally created or established. The writ was discharged by the court below, and relator appealed.

We are confronted at the outset with the question whether the legal existence of the court in which relator was convicted and sentenced may be inquired into in a proceeding of this kind. If not, then the other questions presented require no attention. The office of the writ of habeas corpus is to afford the citizen a speedy and effective method of securing his release when illegally restrained of his liberty. Its scope, when directed to an inquiry into the cause of imprisonment in judicial proceedings, extends to questions affecting the jurisdiction of the court, the sufficiency in point of law of the proceedings, and the validity of the judgment or commitment under which the prisoner is restrained. It cannot be employed as a writ of quo warranto to inquire into the title of the person to the office of judge of the court whose judgment or commitment is assailed. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 151. Nor as a writ of error to review alleged errors committed on the trial. Nor as an appeal or writ of certiorari. State ex rel. Rea v. Kinmore, 54 Minn. 135, 40 Am. St. Rep. 305, 55 N. W. 830. At common law courts of superior jurisdiction would review on this writ commitments by inferior magistrates, and in doing so sometimes go back of the commitment, and inquire into the grounds thereof and their sufficiency. This wide scope of inquiry, however, came from the superiority of the higher court, and not from statutory authority. But the rule in many of the states has been modified or changed, and, where so modified, the writ extends as a general rule to defects appearing upon the face of the record only. Church, Habeas Corpus, 234. The rule in this state by statute is that, if the judgment be rendered or the commitment issued by a competent court, and be fair upon its face, nothing further than the jurisdiction of the court will be inquired into. State ex rel. Noonan v. Hennepin County, 24 Minn. 87; State ex rel. Blaisdell v. Billings, 55 Minn. 467, 43 Am. St. Rep. 525, 57 N. W. 206, 794; State ex rel. Kelly v. Kilbourne, 68 Minn. 320, 71 N. W. 396; State ex rel. Lacy v. Norby, 69 Minn. 451, 72 N. W. 703. Our statutes provide (§ 4586, Rev. Laws 1905) that where, upon the return of the writ, it shall appear that the person alleged to be restrained of his liberty is held and detained by virtue of a final judgment of a competent court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, he shall be remanded to the custody of the officer. Section 4587 provides that, if it shall appear on the return of the writ that the prisoner is in custody by virtue of a process of a court "legally constituted," he can be discharged only when it shall be made to appear (1) that the court under which the prisoner is committed was originally without jurisdiction to render the judgment; or (2) by some act or omission subsequently occurring the prisoner is entitled to his discharge; or (3) when the process under which he is held is in matter of substance defective; or (4) when issued without authority; or (5) when the person detaining the prisoner is not the person authorized by law to detain him; or (6) where the process was wholly unauthorized by judgment or provision of law. These statutory provisions abrogate the common-law rule, and preclude the right of the court to go behind the judgment or commitment and determine the validity thereof from matters dehors the record, except in those cases where the evidence is brought up on certiorari as ancillary to the writ of habeas corpus as in the case of Re Snell, 31 Minn. 110, 16 N. W. 692.

It is not contended by relator that any of the grounds for release specified in the statute are present in this case, except that the municipal court of Bemidji was not legally constituted, was not a "competent court" within the meaning of the statute, and had therefore no jurisdiction to hear, try, or determine the prosecution against relator. We are of opinion that this question cannot be determined in this proceeding.

The Constitution of the state expressly authorizes the legislature to create and establish such courts inferior to the supreme and district courts as public interests may from time to time require. Under this authority, the legislature, by § 125, Rev. Laws 1905, provided for the organization of municipal courts in certain villages and cities 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the state upon a compliance with the conditions therein prescribed. In April, 1905, the city council of Bemidji, a city coming within the terms of the statute, acting under and pursuant to its provisions, duly resolved that a municipal court be established in and for that city, the resolution to take effect and be of force on August 1st following. The proceedings of the council were in all things in conformity with the law, and the resolution was duly submitted to the city mayor for his approval or rejection. The mayor vetoed the resolution, whereupon, in the due course of events, it was again brought before the council for consideration in connection with the mayor's disapproval. It was then passed by unanimous vote of the council over the veto. Thereafter the court was duly constituted by the appointment of a judge and clerk, as provided for by the statute under which the council acted, who qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties. It was before this court as thus established that relator was convicted. It is his contention that the approval of the resolution by the mayor was an essential prerequisite to the organization of the court, and, he having disapproved or vetoed the same, that was an end of the matter; that the council had no power or authority to pass the resolution over his veto, hence that the court was not legally created or established. We do not pass upon the question whether the court was legally created or intimate any opinion to the effect that it was not. The question is not reached.

The question whether the legal existence of a court may be inquired into on habeas corpus proceedings has been answered by different courts both in the affirmative and the negative (21 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 301); the weight of authority, however, as we view the matter, being with those courts which hold under statutes like those of this state that the writ cannot reach that question. That the right of a person to exercise the functions of a public office, who has qualified and entered upon the discharge thereof under color of authority, though his title be not good in point of law, cannot be called in question collaterally upon habeas corpus or other indirect method, is sustained by all the courts. Note to 87 Am. St. Rep. 177; Sheehan's Case, 122 Mass. 445, 23 Am. Rep. 374; Re Manning, 76 Wis. 365, 45 N. W. 26; Re Brainerd, 56 Vt. 495; Ex parte Ward, 173 U. S. 452, 43 L. ed. 765, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459; Patterson v. State, 49 N. J. L. 326, 8 Atl. 305. No reason occurs to us why the same rule should not apply to de facto municipal corporations and de facto courts. The authorities maintaining that the legal existence of the court may thus be inquired into proceed on the theory that there can be no such thing as a de facto court. Re Norton, 64 Kan. 842, 91 Am. St. Rep. 255, 68 Pac. 639. But that doctrine is not fully supported either on principle or authority, at least it is not without exceptions. A municipal corporation, although not legally organized, is still a de facto corporation. State ex rel. Hagan v. District Ct. 90 Minn. 118, 95 N. W. 591; St. Paul Gaslight Co. v. Sandstone, 73 Minn. 225, 75 N. W. 1050; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. 43; Cooley, Const. Lim. 309, 310; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1135; Speer v. Kearney County, 32 C. C. A. 101, 60 U. S. App. 38, 88 Fed. 749; Omaha v. South Omaha, 31 Neb. 378, 47 N. W. 1113; Miller v. Perris Irrig. Dist. (C. C.) 85 Fed. 693. And the authorities hold that in such case the acts of the municipality and its officers are as to third persons lawful and binding, and the legal existence or right of a municipality to continue to exercise its functions can be questioned only by the state in direct proceedings brought for that purpose. Logically, if a corporation has only a de facto existence, the offices created by the act or proceeding creating it can have no superior legal quality. They necessarily must be de facto, for there can be no de jure office of a municipal corporation existing only in theory, and the incumbents thereof manifestly are de facto officers of a de facto corporation. Courts, in attempting to adhere to the abstract rule that there must in all cases be a de jure office, have in cases where a de facto corporation has been held to exist invented a theory of potential existence to take the place of the lawfully created office. Carleton v. People, 10 Mich. 250; Yorty v. Paine, 62 Wis. 154, 22 N. W. 137; Fowler v. Beebe, 9 Mass. 231, 6 Am. Dec. 62; Smith v. Lynch, 29 Ohio St. 261; Buck v. Eureka, 109 Cal. 504, 30 L.R.A. 409, 42 Pac. 243. There can, however, be no difference in point of substance between an office having a potential existence—i. e., one that might lawfully be created—and one existing in fact though not legally created. In neither case is it a de jure office. This precise question was discussed by the Missouri court of appeals in Adams v. Lindell, 5 Mo. App. 197, where the court reached the conclusion, as we think correctly, that the existence of a de jure office is not in all cases indispensable to the existence of a de facto officer. If this is not sound, then there can be no such thing as a de facto corporation or a de facto court. Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 31 Minn. 472, 18 N. W. 285, 289.

This court has held, and we are supported by courts of high standing, that there may not only be de facto municipal corporations but de facto courts, and that the validity of their acts cannot be questioned in collateral proceedings. St. Paul Gaslight Co. v. Sandstone, supra; State ex rel. Childs v. Crow Wing County, 66 Minn. 519, 35 L.R.A. 745, 68 N. W. 767, 69 N. W. 925, 73 N. W. 631; State ex rel. Young v. Harris, 102 Minn. 340, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 533, 113 N. W. 887; Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. supra. In the last case cited, which is analogous to the one at bar, it was held that the municipal court of Mankato, created by an unconstitutional statute, was a de facto court, and that its legal existence could not be questioned in a collateral proceeding. A similar conclusion was reached in Trumbo v. People, 75 Ill. 561, and in Leach v. People, 122 Ill. 420, 12 N. E. 726, where the status of a school district and its officers which had been illegally established was involved. It was held that the regularity of the proceedings in the formation of the school district could not be inquired into collaterally. A de facto county organization was sustained, and the acts of its officers held immune from collateral attack in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. McKinney, 2 S. D. 106, 48 N. W. 841. See also Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 432, 4 Am. Rep. 89; Campbell v. Com. 96 Pa. 344; Walcott v. Wells, 21 Nev. 47, 9 L.R.A. 59, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478, 24 Pac. 367. In the Burt case this court, speaking through Chief Justice Gilfillan, said: "It would be a matter of almost intolerable inconvenience, and be productive of many instances of individual hardship and injustice, if third persons, whose interests or necessities require them to rely upon the acts of the occupants of public offices, should be required to ascertain at their peril the legal right to the offices which such occupants are permitted by the state to occupy. Taking even the narrowest definition of an officer de facto, viz., that he is one who is exercising the duties of an office under color of legal right to the office, the reasons that justify the doctrine apply with equal force to a court or office where the same may be said to exist under color of right; that is, under color of law. That there may be a de facto municipal corporation, and consequently de facto offices of the same, follows from the rule laid down in Cooley, Const. Lim. *254. If a municipal corporation appears 'to be acting under color of law and recognized by the state as such, such a question (that is of the legal existence of the corporation) should be raised by the state itself by quo warranto, or other direct proceeding'—and it is sustained by many authorities holding that the question cannot be raised collaterally. State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 367.

People v. Maynard, 15 Mich. 463; Stuart v. School Dist. No. 1, 30 Mich. 69; Bird v. Perkins, 33 Mich. 28; Mendota v. Thompson, 20 Ill. 197; Kettering v. Jacksonville, 50 Ill. 39; Geneva v. Cole, 61 Ill. 397; Kayser v. Bremen, 16 Mo. 88; State ex rel. Read v. Weatherby, 45 Mo. 17; St. Louis v. Shields, 62 Mo. 247; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 43 (22)."

The municipal court of Bemidji was organized under color of law, proceedings for that purpose were at most irregular, and, within the Burt Case, it was a de facto court, and its judge and clerk de facto officers. Applying the general rule referred to, namely, that the title of a de facto officer cannot be attacked collaterally, to the de facto court, it follows that relator cannot be heard to complain of the manner in which the municipal court of Bemidji was established. Ex parte Strang, 21 Ohio St. 610; Re Ah Lee (D. C.) 6 Sawy. 410, 5 Fed. 899; State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409. See note to King v. Philadelphia Co. 21 L.R.A. 141; State v. Harris, 47 La. Ann. 386, 17 So. 129. A de facto court is therefore a "competent court," or a "legally constituted court," within the meaning of our habeas corpus statute, for its judgments and proceedings are not open to collateral attack. This rule, of course, does not apply to a court created without color of authority, or to a mere usurper. Ex parte Strahl, 16 Iowa, 369.

The learned trial court therefore properly discharged the writ, and its order in the premises is affirmed.

(June 12, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of the Municipal Court of the City of New York, Borough of Richmond, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for refusal to give a street-railway transfer. Affirmed.

Statement by Hiscock, J.:

Appeal, by permission, from an order of the appellate division of the supreme court in the second judicial department, entered October 23, 1907, which reversed a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a decision rendered at a trial term of the municipal court of the city of New York.

The action was brought to recover a penalty on the theory that defendant had violated both the statute regulating the fare to be charged by a surface street railroad (railroad law, Laws 1892, chap. 676, § 101, p. 1405) and the statute requiring such road to give transfers (railroad law, § 104). The appellant is an attorney at law, and, prior to the date of the alleged violations, had very largely been engaged in bringing similar suits against this respondent and other corporations in the city of New York. On this occasion theoretically he set out with his companion, also an attorney, to make a trip from the corner of the Bowery and Delancey streets to Fifth street by a course over three different lines of road operated by respondent, and which especially involved the right of a transfer from the so-called Eighth street line to the Avenue

C line. He took a car at the starting point first mentioned, and paid the fare of himself and his companion, and obtained transfers to the Eighth street line, but was then informed by the conductor that he would not be given a transfer from the latter line to Avenue C as above stated. Notwithstanding this, he alighted at the corner of Clinton street, and, taking an Eighth street car, again asked for a transfer to Avenue C, which was refused. Again, notwithstanding this, he alighted at the corner of Stanton street and Avenue A, and boarded a car on the Avenue C line, and in substance asserted the right to have had a transfer to that line and therefore to be carried thereon without payment of fare. His assertion having been disregarded, and demand having been made for payment of another fare, he paid the same, and then alighted and returned to his office. As he knew by previous experience at Clinton street, he could have taken a car which would have given him a transfer to the line on Avenue C.

Appellant's purpose in setting out on this trip was that "of simply traveling over the line to see what would be done." He had been bringing suits for penalties for refusals of transfers similar to that here complained of, and he "rode for the purpose of gaining information." He "had no destination whatever on Fifth street . . . ; was traveling over the line to see what information would be given to passengers desiring transfers." The learned appellate division, by a divided court, held that, under these circumstances, he was not such a passenger as was entitled to the benefits of § 104, above referred to, and then certified to this court for answer the following questions:

"(1) Is plaintiff entitled to a judgment under the provision of §§ 39 and 101 of the railroad law?

"(2) Is plaintiff entitled to a judgment under the provisions of § 104 of the railroad law?"

. Mr. Harcourt Bull, in propria persona:

The object or motive which actuated the plaintiff at the time he made the trip is immaterial, and, if the defendant refused the transfer that the law required, every such refusal or overcharge was a legal wrong to the plaintiff who was thereby aggrieved, and who, within the meaning of the act and by its express terms, is thereupon entitled to sue for the penalty.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We shall answer the questions above certified to us in the inverse order of their statement.

The respondent was operating the lines of road on which appellant sought to ride, and many other lines under leases and contracts authorized by statutory provisions now incorporated in railroad law, Laws 1892, chap. 676, p. 1382, and therefore the following provisions of § 104 of said statute were applicable: "Every such corporation . . . shall . . . carry between any two points on the railroads or portions thereof embraced in such contract any passenger desiring to make one continuous trip between such points for one single fare. . . . Every such corporation shall, upon demand, and without extra charge, give to each passenger paying one single fare a transfer, entitling such passenger to one continuous trip to any point or portion of any railroad embraced in such contract, to the end that the public convenience may be promoted by the operation of the railroads embraced in such contract substantially as a single railroad with a single rate of fare. For every refusal to comply with the requirements of this section the corporation so refusing shall forfeit $50 to the aggrieved party." In the cases of Myers v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 10 App. Div. 335, 41 N. Y. Supp. 798, and Nicholson v. New York City R. Co. 118 App. Div. 858, 103 N. Y. Supp. 695, decided, respectively, by the second and first appellate divisions, it was held in effect that a person traveling over a street railroad simply for the purpose of being denied a transfer in order that he might bring a suit for a penalty under the statute quoted does not come within the protection and benefits thereof, and cannot recover such penalty.

We agree with the results reached in those cases, and, reinforced as they are by what was written in the cases of Southern P. Co. v. Robinson, 132 Cal. 408, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 497, 64 Pac. 572, and Jolley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 119 Iowa, 491, 93 N. W. 555, we might very well content ourselves with basing the affirmance of the judgment now appealed from upon the authority of those cases so far as this question is concerned, were it not for the fact that the appellant claims that his case may and should be distinguished from those of Myers and Nicholson. The tangible and practical result of the refusal to appellant of the transfer complained of seems to be, as in those former cases, a suit for a penalty. But he doubtless is entitled to have his purposes and mental operations on the occasion in question measured by the evidence by which he has chosen to define them. According to this, he desired to ride over certain lines of respondent's road for the purpose of ascertaining whether at a given point a transfer would be issued to him enabling him to ride over a certain route in the direction of the point which he had proposed to himself as the termination of his journey, and this information he was seeking in order that, as attorney, he might conduct various suits for penalties for refusals to issue transfers at the point he was investigating. It is at once apparent that the margin between this case and the former ones cited is at best very narrow. There the plaintiff had ridden for the purpose of laying the foundation for a suit to be commenced in his behalf for the penalty. In this case the appellant has ridden for the purpose of acquiring information as attorney, and which was to be utilized for the benefit of suits already commenced in behalf of his clients for penalties. If we assume, however, that there is a narrow margin, the question is whether it is sufficient to place this case within the provisions and benefits of the statute when the other ones lay outside thereof. The statute which we have quoted was passed for the benefit of a "passenger desiring to make one continuous trip between" certain points for one single fare; and it requires that the corporation shall "give to each passenger paying one single fare a transfer entitling such passenger to one continuous trip to any point," etc. It was passed "to the end that the public convenience may be promoted by the operation of the railroads . . . substantially as a single railroad with a single rate of fare," and it gives a right of action to one who has been "aggrieved."

Whether we contemplate this statute from the standpoint of a passenger as a remedial one or from the standpoint of the railroad as one for penalties, a reasonable construction of it seems to make some things manifest. It was passed in the interest of public convenience, which we suppose to mean in the interest of the general traveling public. It was passed in the interest of a passenger "desiring to make a continuous trip" between certain points, and we believe that this means a person who enters on or continues a trip with the real and actual desire of getting to some place and whose controlling purpose is interfered with or defeated if the railroad company unjustly refuses to give him a transfer which would enable him to reach the point for which he has set out, and who, therefore, by such refusal, is disappointed and defeated of his aim and an "aggrieved party." We do not believe that the appellant comes within the contemplation of the statutory purposes thus outlined. His controlling thought and aim when he started out was to acquire information in regard to the custom of respondent to issue or not issue transfers at a certain point over a certain route, and which information he desired for use in litigation. If he fixed in his mind a definite point of destination, it was simply because he conceived it might be necessary for him to travel to that point in order to acquire the information. As a matter of fact, he acquired the information which he desired at every separate stage of his journey from beginning to end, and he as well might have stopped at the end of the first stage as to have continued to the last one, except that he apparently desired to accumulate evidence as well as information, and also to lay the foundation for a claim for illegal conduct against the respondent on the second theory involved in this case. As soon as he had completed this purpose, he alighted from the car and returned to his office. By the failure to issue the transfer he was not defeated in any purpose which led him to take the respondent's cars for he had accomplished all that he had desired or intended to. He was not aggrieved because the respondent by a refusal to issue the transfer had prevented him from consummating some plan which it was bound to assist him in consummating by issuing the transfer.

It is, however, urged by the appellant, and was written in the dissenting opinion below, that we ought not to construe the statute before us as we have done because this court, in the case of Fisher v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 644, has decided that which forbids such construction. We do not regard such decision as so holding. In that case, as is well known, the court had before it for consideration chapter 185, p. 432, Laws 1857, providing, "any railroad company which shall ask and receive a greater rate of fare than that allowed by law shall forfeit $50, which sum may be recovered, together with the excess so received, by the party paying the same;" and it was held by a bare majority of the court that a recovery could be had by a party who rode and paid the excessive fare simply for the purpose of obtaining the penalty, the court saying: "The forfeiture is imposed upon the company for its act, and this entirely irrespective of the object or motive of the passenger in traveling." We accept this decision and the reasoning which led to it. The penalty or "forfeiture," as it was called, was regarded as a punishment inflicted on the railroad for its wrongful act, and any "party" was made a proper agent for inflicting the punishment. As we have already indicated, we do not regard the language used in the statute now before us in meaning, purpose, or effect as at all similar to or the equivalent of the language which was used in the statute of 1857, and thus interpreted. It is stated, in substance, in the dissenting opinion below, that no distinction is to be drawn between the two statutes narrowing the right to sue under the later one simply because the earlier one, in conferring a right of action, uses the word "party" while the other one employs the word "passenger;" that the "party" authorized by the earlier statute to bring an action would necessarily be a "passenger;" and that, therefore, such word "passenger" employed in the later statute is not any more restrictive or limited in its meaning than the word "party." Neither statute is well construed by reference to a single word. We may concede that the "party" mentioned in the statute involved in the Fisher Case was in a certain sense a passenger, but, as we have pointed out, § 104 requires that the successful plaintiff shall be more than a passenger simply in the sense of paying a fare and traveling over a railroad. If we have read the language aright, it contemplates and requires a passenger or traveler of a certain character, one who actually desires to reach some point of destination for a purpose only accomplished by reaching that point, or who desires to be carried for some recognized purpose even though nothing more than recreation, and whose desire is defeated rather than consummated by the refusal to give him the necessary transfer. Neither do we agree, as stated in the dissenting opinion below, that "in the present case 'the forfeiture is imposed upon the company for its act' of refusing a transfer, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

charging another fare, 'and this entirely irrespective of the object or motive of the passenger in traveling.'" In the Fisher Case, as we have pointed out, it was stated that "the forfeiture is imposed upon the company for its act, and it is entirely irrespective of the object or motive of the passenger in traveling." Under the present statute, whatever may be said of the intent to punish the corporation, that punishment can only be inflicted at the instance of a passenger who has been "aggrieved" through being prevented from accomplishing that which the statute attempted to make secure.

We pass to the consideration of the other question submitted to us, whether appellant is entitled to a judgment under the provisions of §§ 39 and 101 of the railroad law. Section 101, so far as it is material, provides as follows: "No corporation constructing and operating a railroad under the provisions of this article, or of chapter 252 of the laws of 1884, shall charge any passenger more than 5 cents for one continuous ride from any point on its road, or on any road, line, or branch operated by it, or under its control, to any other point thereof, or any connecting branch thereof, within the limits of any incorporated city. . . . Not more than one fare shall be charged within the limits of any such city. . . . for passage over the main line of road and any branch or extension thereof if the right to construct such branch or extension shall have been acquired under the provisions of such chapter or of this article." This section, by its own terms, provides no penalty for violation thereof, and for the right to recover a penalty resort must be had to the provisions of § 39. We shall assume for the purposes of this case, without deciding it, that § 39 does apply to and supplement § 101. The line on Avenue C, on which appellant claimed the right to ride without payment of additional fare, does not directly and of itself connect with the line in Delancey street on which he first took passage and paid his original fare, but one must reach the former line from the latter one by passage over a third line. It also sufficiently appears that these lines originally were owned or controlled respectively by different companies and were independent of and distinct from one another, and finally, under various leases and contracts, were assembled with very many other lines into a general railroad system controlled and operated by the respondent which was originally incorporated and organized for the purpose of operating an entirely distinct and insignificant line of road. We shall assume, without discussion, that, under the provisions of the statute quoted, appellant would have been entitled to ride for a single fare over the entire length of any one of the three lines. That, however, does not meet his needs in this litigation. He is compelled to claim and ask us to hold that the Delancey street line and the Avenue C line were respectively a road owned, operated, or controlled by the respondent and a "connecting branch thereof," or a "main line of road and a (any) branch or extension thereof." That is, the narrow question is whether the Avenue C line can be regarded as a connecting branch or extension of the Delancey street line or vice versa. We do not think that it can be. We agree with the learned counsel for the appellant that his right to recover in this litigation is not to be decided by the sole fact that he did or did not attempt to take his ride in a single car, and whatever was said or intimated in O'Connor v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 123 App. Div. 784, 108 N. Y. Supp. 471, appearing to limit on that ground the right of the litigant to recover, is, we think, too narrow. But it does seem to us that it would be extravagant and unreasonable to hold that the two lines of road mentioned, originally constructed and owned by separate companies and operating different lines of cars and brought into physical relation on the route selected by appellant only by means of a third intervening line of road, constituted a road and "connecting branch thereof" or "main line of road and any branch or extension thereof." These terms suggest an original or main line which by an off-shoot and secondary and tributary line has been extended or continued, the two constituting a single continuous and connected line of road. They do not naturally suggest two originally distinct and separate lines of road not constructed with reference to one another or coming into connection with each other, and which have become related to each other simply because they have been taken into a general railroad system. A practical test of appellant's theory would be presented by the question whether the road which he took on Delancey street and another road in the extreme upper part of New York, originally entirely distinct in construction and operation and separated by many miles, could be regarded as road and connecting branch simply because at some time by separate leases they were incorporated into a single system, and one could be reached from the other by traveling over many different intervening lines. The construction which we adopt as in accordance with what we regard as the ordinary meaning of terms is, we think, fortified by § 90 of the railroad law, which deals with and gives a pretty definite idea of what the legislature intended when it spoke of roads and branches and extensions thereof.

Our construction of this statute adverse to the appellant's contention is, we think, also supported and sanctioned by another consideration of much importance. In construing a statute, we have a right to consider conditions existing when it was adopted, and which it must be assumed the legislature intended to meet, and also other statutes relating to the same subject. Section 101 is, in effect, a re-enactment of statutory provisions originally found in § 13, chap. 252, p. 314, Laws 1884. Under the provisions of that act, surface street railroad companies enjoyed what, in practical effect, was only a limited right to make contracts to run upon and use the railroad tracks of one another, and it is doubtful whether any right would have existed enabling the Delancey street and Avenue C lines to make a contract or lease one with another because parallel lines. We think it cannot be claimed that the legislature then could have contemplated the existence of any such extensive and complicated street surface-railroad system as was afterwards created in the city of New York, or that it then intended to deal in the matter of fares with all of the constituent lines incorporated into such a system, but that it had in mind, as the statute expressed, the ordinary case of a road and direct and actually connecting branches and extensions. Subsequently chapter 305, p. 525, Laws 1885, was passed, which, in effect, re-enacted some of the provisions of earlier statutes and added others, and which expressly secured to different surface railroad companies the right to make leases and contracts of and with one another; and under which provisions, continued and amended from time to time, it became possible and practical to gather together an extensive system of former independent railroad lines like that now operated by the defendant. When this condition presented itself, the legislature recognized the necessity for broader safeguards securing to the traveling public the right of travel over various lines in a single system for a single fare, and therefore, by the same statute last referred to, adopted provisions requiring the company operating the different roads, for a single fare to give a transfer entitling the person receiving it to a continuous trip over the different roads gathered together under a contract and lease as therein provided, and which provisions have now been carried into § 104.

The question at once arises, and we think cannot be satisfactorily answered in accordance with appellant's theory: What was the object in adopting these provisions of 1885, requiring transfers over different roads of a system, if the prior provisions of 1884, providing for a single fare over a road and its extension or connecting branch, already covered roads which did not actually connect, but were parts of a general system? We do not think that any of the cases especially relied on by the appellant to sustain a conclusion different from that reached by us fairly do so. Muckle v. Rochester R. Co. 79 Hun, 32, 29 N. Y. Supp. 732, was an action of assault for unlawfully ejecting the plaintiff from one of defendant's cars, and all of the questions therein arose in connection with a transfer which the defendant had issued. The court did say: "The payment by the plaintiff of a single fare of 5 cents entitled him to one continuous passage from any one to any other point of the railroad operated by the defendant. Laws 1890, chap. 565, § 101, p. 1113." We are not able to determine just what this statement under any circumstances might mean as applied to the railroad operated by the defendant, but the question of the right of the plaintiff to ride for a single fare where he was going does not appear to have been at all disputed or considered. The defendant assumed this and based its defense entirely on other considerations. In the case of Senior v. New York City R. Co. 111 App. Div. 39, 97 N. Y. Supp. 645, subsequently affirmed by this court in 187 N. Y. 559, 80 N. E. 1120, the controversy and discussion proceeded on quite different lines from those involved here. In Baron v. New York City R. Co. 120 App. Div. 134, 105 N. Y. Supp. 258, no three of the learned judges, as we read the different opinions, united in passing upon the question here involved in the manner desired by the appellant. The actual question involved in that case grew out of facts quite different from those presented here.

In conclusion, we think that each of the questions certified to us should be answered in the negative, and that the order appealed from should be affirmed and judgment absolute entered against the appellant, on his stipulation, with costs in all courts.

ROCHESTER CANDY WORKS, Appt.

(— N. Y. —, 87 N. E. 77.)

Master — minor — negligence.

1. A master cannot be charged with negligence in employing a minor to work on 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dangerous machinery in violation of the terms of a statute making it a misdemeanor to do so, if, in the exercise of proper vigilance and due caution, he was led to believe that the employee was above the statutory age.

Same — care — representations.

2. One about to employ a minor cannot rely alone on his own representation or that of his parents as to his age in order to absolve himself from liability for negligence in case the employee is injured in his service and is actually of such an age that the statute makes it a misdemeanor to employ him.

Evidence — admissions — age.

3. The declarations of a minor as to his age are admissible in evidence in an action by him to hold his employer liable for personal injuries because he was employed contrary to the provision of a statute making it a misdemeanor to employ minors of less than a specified age.

Witness — impeachment — admissions.

4. That one makes the adverse party his witness, does not prevent his proving admissions which had been made by him in conflict with his testimony.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

An employer honestly believing a minor's statements as to his age, and being induced thereby to hire him, cannot be charged by that minor with negligence in hiring him.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is brought, servant against master, to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the defendant's negligence. The complaint charged the defendant, which conducted a candy factory, with employing the plaintiff, who at the time was an infant under the age of fourteen years, in the operation of dangerous machinery, in violation of § 70 of the labor law (Laws 1897, chap. 415, p. 477), and that the machinery was not protected by proper safeguards, as required by § 81 of that law. The answer put in issue the extent of the plaintiff's injuries, and the other allegations of the complaint, except plaintiff's employment and the character of the business carried on by the defendant. The plaintiff recovered a verdict at the trial term, which has been affirmed by the appellate division by a divided court. On the trial evidence was given by the plaintiff's parents as to the date of his birth, which established that at the time of the accident he was a few months less than fourteen years of age. The defendant gave evidence to the effect that, when the plaintiff sought employment, he represented that he was more than sixteen years old. In submitting the case to the jury the learned trial judge charged: "If you find that plaintiff did in fact make this statement as to his age, then you are further to inquire and determine whether defendant's agent, Colebrook, was justified in relying, as he says he did, upon that statement, or whether, in the exercise of reasonable prudence and caution before actually hiring the plaintiff, he should have made further inquiry and received further assurance and proof of the fact. If he was not justified in relying solely upon plaintiff's representation as to his age, aided by his observation of the personal appearance of the boy, if you find he made such representation, if there was in his appearance, or in any other fact coming then to the attention of this agent of defendant, which has been disclosed by the evidence, which would naturally have led him to suspect that plaintiff was not telling the truth about his age, and would have led an ordinarily prudent person to make further inquiry on that subject before actually hiring the plaintiff, then those facts are to be considered by you, and given their due weight in determining whether or not this agent actually believed, and was justified in believing, the statement plaintiff made as to his age." This was the whole of the court's instructions on the question. The defendant requested the court to charge, "If the plaintiff falsely stated his age to the officers of the defendant, and led them to believe that he was actually over fourteen years of age at the time he was hired, and if they were justified in that belief, then they are not guilty of negligence in hiring him, and the jury must dismiss that provision of the labor law from further consideration." This the court refused. The defendant thereupon excepted, and that exception presents the first question for our consideration.

The labor law makes a violation of its provisions a misdemeanor, but does not give a civil remedy therefor to the party injured. Nevertheless it was held by this court, in Marino v. Lehmaier, 173 N. Y. 530, 534, 61 L.R.A. 811, 66 N. E. 572, 573, that a violation of the statute was, per se, evidence of negligence for which a jury might find the defendant liable. It was there said by Judge Haight: "We think it is very evident that these reasons induced the legislature to establish definitely, an age limit under which children shall not be employed in factories; and, to our minds, the statute, in effect, declares that a child under the age specified presumably does not possess the judgment, discretion, care, and caution necessary for the engagement in such a dangerous avocation, and is therefore not, as a matter of law, chargeable with contributory negligence or with having assumed the risks of the employment in such occupation." Under this doctrine, the gist of civil liability is the negligence of the master in employing a person of such tender years that the legislature has forbidden his employment. Therefore, if the employer, in the exercise of proper vigilance and due caution, is led to believe that the employee is above the statutory age, he cannot well be charged with negligence in employing an infant, whether such belief would be available in a criminal prosecution or not. The representation of the employee as to his age, even if accompanied by a similar statement by his parents, is not conclusive on the question. No principle of estoppel is applicable to the case. The question always is whether the employer is justified in believing that the employee is of sufficient age to authorize his employment. For this purpose he may not rest alone on the representation of the plaintiff, but is required to exercise proper vigilance to discover the fact. What such vigilance would dictate differs in different cases. There can readily be imagined a case where the employee is of such mature appearance that the employer may naturally and properly accept his statement as to age. In other cases the appearance of the employee might be the exact reverse. No definite rule can be laid down to relieve the employer from liability in violating the statute. The jury must be satisfied that, under the circumstances of the particular case, the employer believed, and was justified in the belief, that the employee was of the prescribed age for work. In this respect the charge of the learned trial judge as to the circumstances under which the defendant would be liable, despite any statement by the plaintiff as to his age, was entirely correct, but the difficulty is that as to this question he submitted only one side of the case to the jury; that is to say, what facts would render the defendant liable. The converse of the proposition, what would relieve the defendant from liability, he omitted to state, and it was simply this omission which the defendant asked to have supplied in its request to charge. The refusal was therefore error.

On the trial the plaintiff did not testify in his own behalf as to his age. The question, however, was asked him by the defendant on cross-examination. His testimony was in accord with that given by his parents. For the defense it was sought to prove various declarations made by the plaintiff as to his age. That made to the defendant at the time of his employment was admitted, but those made to third parties at other times were excluded. The ruling is sought to be justified by the learned counsel for the respondent on several grounds. It is first claimed that a person is not a competent witness as to his own age, and therefore his declarations to that effect are also incompetent. While I can find no express decision in this state that a witness may testify to his age, as far as my experience goes the practice has been universal to permit such testimony, and I have never heard its competency challenged. The question has been, however, the subject of determination in many other states, and the authorities seem to be uniform that the witness is competent. Hill v. Eldridge, 126 Mass. 234; Com. v. Stevenson, 142 Mass. 466, 8 N. E. 341; Hancock v. Supreme Council C. B. L. 69 N. J. L. 308, 55 Atl. 246; Cheever v. Congdon, 34 Mich. 296. To the same effect is the doctrine of text-books. 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 667. See cases there cited. But even were the witness incompetent to testify to that fact from lack of personal recollection as to his birth, it would not justify the exclusion of his admission on the subject when offered in behalf of the opposite party. In Reed v. McCord, 160 N. Y. 330, 54 N. E. 737, the plaintiff introduced in evidence a statement made by the defendant as to the details of an accident at which he was not present. It was contended that, as the defendant's admissions related to facts not of his personal knowledge, they should have been excluded. It was held that the admissions were properly received.

It is sought to justify the ruling of the trial court on the further ground that the defendant, by examining the plaintiff as to his age, made him its own witness, and could not impeach him. The limitations of the rule which forbids a party to impeach his own witness (assuming the plaintiff to have been such, which we do not decide) are well settled. He may not thereafter introduce witnesses to prove that his general reputation is bad, and that he is unworthy of credit; nor can he prove statements made out of court in contradiction of his testimony on the stand, and he cannot contradict him as to collateral facts. But he may prove by competent testimony that the facts material to the issue are the exact reverse of those testified to by his witness, and may ask the jury to disbelieve his statement, and credit that of the later witnesses. When, however, it is said that one cannot impeach his own witness by contradictory statements made out of court, this statement must be limited to the case of a witness who is not the adverse party. The effect of such contradictory statements in the case of other witnesses is merely to impeach the witness because they are mere hearsay, and are not proof of the fact stated. The case of an adverse party is the exact reverse. "In a civil action the admissions by a party of any fact material to the issue are always competent evidence against him, wherever, whenever, or to whomsoever made" (Reed v. McCord, 160 N. Y. 341, 54 N. E. 740), excepting, of course, confidential communications, the disclosure of which is prohibited by statute, such as from client to counsel, from patient to physician, from penitent to clergyman or priest, and the like. The cases relied upon by the learned counsel for the plaintiff as asserting a contrary doctrine are not in point. In Thompson v. Blanchard, 4 N. Y. 303, 311, the plaintiff called one of the defendants, who had made default in the action, as a witness against his codefendant, and, having been disappointed in his testimony, gave evidence of contradictory statements made out of court. This was held error, but of course the declarations of the witness were not competent evidence against his codefendant. The opinion in that case states the true rule: "But the party calling a witness is not precluded from proving the truth of a particular fact by any other competent testimony, in direct contradiction to what such witness may have testified." And, as already stated, the admissions of a party are always original competent evidence. In Coulter v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 56 N. Y. 585, the witness whom it was sought to contradict was not the adverse party. The situation was the same in Fall Brook Coal Co. v. Hewson, 158 N. Y. 150, 43 L.R.A. 676, 70 Am. St. Rep. 466, 52 N. E. 1095. The misconception as to the rule arises from the failure to distinguish between declarations and the admissions of a party, which latter, though undoubtedly declarations, are also very much more. Declarations, as a general rule, are mere hearsay, and therefore incompetent, while admissions of a party are original evidence against the party making them, and are as a rule sufficient to establish a cause of action or defense without further evidence of the fact.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA, Appt.,

v.

JOSIE WESIE, Respnt.

('— N. D. —, 118 N. W. 20.)

Adultery — prosecution.

Section 8903 of the Revised Codes of 1905 reads: "Adultery is the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than the offender's husband or wife; and when the intercourse is between a married woman and a man that is unmarried the man is also guilty of adultery. No prosecution . . . shall be commenced except on the complaint of the husband or wife, and no prosecution shall be commenced after one year from the time of the committing of the offense." Held, that, by the provisions of this section, the spouse of either of the guilty parties is empowered to make complaint against either or both of them.

(October 29, 1908.)

Headnote by SPALDING, J.

Case Note. — Adultery; construction and effect of provisions requiring prosecution to be upon complaint of husband or wife.

Such provisions are said to be grounded in the regard which the law has for the marital relation and the right of the husband and wife to condone the wrongs of either towards the other. State v. Corliss, 85 Iowa, 18, 51 N. W. 1154; State v. Andrews, 95 Iowa, 451, 64 N. W. 404; State v. Oden, 100 Iowa, 22, 69 N. W. 270.

No new element of the crime is added by such provisions. State v. Donovan, 61 Iowa, 278, 16 N. W. 130; State v. Maas, 83 Iowa, 469, 49 N. W. 1037; People v. Isham, 109 Mich. 72, 67 N. W. 819; State v. Brecht, 41 Minn. 50, 42 N. W. 602.

There appears to be a conflict of authority upon the substantive question as to whether the innocent spouse can commence a prosecution against the invading guilty party where such guilty party is also married, or whether, in such case, the prosecution must be by the latter's spouse. The weight of authority favors the view taken by the court in STATE v. WESIE.

Thus, in Serra v. Mortiga, 204 U. S. 470, 51 L. ed. 571, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 343, it appears, and was conceded, that, under the Philippine law, adultery is a private offense, and can be prosecuted only upon the complaint of the aggrieved husband, who can enter such complaint against his wife, or her paramour, or both.

And in People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N. W. 362, Willson v. Daboll, 104 Mich. 155, 62 N. W. 293, and State v. Brecht, supra, it was held that, where the guilty parties were both married, the husband of the one or the wife of the other could make the PPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County sustaining a demurrer to an information charging defendant with having committed the crime of adultery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Barnett and Seth W. Richardson, for appellant:

The innocent husband of the guilty wife, or the innocent wife of the guilty husband, or vice versa, may institute the prosecution against both guilty parties.

State v. Brecht, 41 Minn. 50, 42 N. W. 602; State v. Maas, 83 Iowa, 469, 49 N. W. 1037; Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221, 9 N. W. 257; People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N. W. 362; Willson v. Daboll, 104 Mich. 155, 62 N. W. 293.

Mr. V. R. Lovell for respondent.

Spalding, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court for Cass county, sustaining a demurrer to an information charging the respondent, a married woman, with having committed the crime of adultery with one Pratt, a married man, and not the husband of said respondent. The information further alleges that the prosecution against the respondent was begun upon the complaint of the wife of said Pratt. The only question for determination is whether the wife of a man charged with adultery is, under the statute, competent to make complaint, as a basis for the institution of a criminal prosecution, against the other party to the crime, namely, the guilty woman. Section 8903 of the Revised Codes of 1905 provides, among other things, that "no prosecution for adultery shall be commenced, except on complaint of the husband or wife." The construction of this clause will determine this appeal. The same section defines adultery as "voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than complaint against either of the guilty parties; and that it was not necessary that the complaint should be made by the wife of the defendant.

But in Bush v. Workman, 64 Iowa, 205, 19 N. W. 910, a contrary view was taken, and it was held that, where the defendant was married, only the spouse of such defendant could commence the prosecution.

The authorities agree, however, that, where such invader is unmarried, and by statute both participants are made guilty of adultery if either is married (as to "adultery" where but one of the parties is married, see note to Bashford v. Wells, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580), it is competent for the aggrieved spouse of the paramour to make complaint against the guilty invader. State v. Wilson, 22 Iowa, 364; Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221, 9 N. W. 257.

In State v. Oden, supra, it was held that the requirement that the prosecution must be upon the complaint of the husband or wife did not apply where the defendant was unmarried when the crime was committed, though he was married before complaint was made and before indictment found.

In State v. Mahan, 81 Iowa, 121, 46 N. W. 855, it was held that, where the indictment disclosed no fact from which the marriage of defendant could be inferred, it was not necessary to aver that the prosecution was commenced on the complaint of defendant's spouse; and that, if defendant was in fact married, the failure of his wife to make complaint was a matter of defense.

It is not necessary to allege in the indictment that the prosecution was begun by the husband or wife of defendant. State v. Harmann, 135 Iowa, 167, 112 N. W. 632; State v. Brecht, supra.

And it need not be alleged in the complaint that the complainant is the wife of defendant. People v. Ishman, 109 Mich. 72, 67 N. W. 819, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The fact that the prosecution was commenced by the unoffending spouse of defendant may be proved, though there is no allegation to that effect in the indictment. State v. Maas, 83 Iowa, 469, 49 N. W. 1037; State v. Andrews, 95 Iowa, 451, 64 N. W. 404; State v. Harmann, supra.

In State v. Henke, 58 Iowa, 457, 12 N. W. 477, it was held that the averment in the indictment that the prosecution was commenced by the defendant's wife raised no presumption that it was so commenced; and it devolved upon the state to establish that fact.

And the fact is not sufficiently established to sustain the averment that the prosecution was commenced by the wife, by merely showing that she went before the grand jury as a witness in obedience to a subpoena, and there testified as a witness. State v. Stout, 71 Iowa, 343, 32 N. W. 372.

But it is not incumbent upon the state to establish this fact beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Donovan, 61 Iowa, 278, 16 N. W. 130; State v. Athey, 133 Iowa, 382, 108 N. W. 224.

In State v. Donovan, supra, it was held that the mere appearing of a wife before the grand jury in response to a subpoena, and testifying before them in the case, supposing that she was required to do so, but not intending to prefer the charge of adultery against her husband, was not a complaint by her against her husband, within the meaning of the law.

In State v. Roth, 17 Iowa, 336, it was held that neither an averment in the indictment, nor an indorsement on its back, that the prosecution was commenced by the defendant's wife, was conclusive against him; but that he could show the fact to be otherwise, and have the benefit of it.

Such provision does not require that the husband or wife shall continue to prosecute to conviction; but it is sufficient if the the offender's husband or wife," and provides that, when the intercourse is between a married woman and a man that is unmarried, the man is also guilty of adultery. The state contends that the prosecution can be instituted against either of the guilty parties, by the spouse of either one of them, while the respondent insists that the statute, correctly construed, admits only of a prosecution upon the complaint of the spouse of the party who is being proceeded against; hence that the prosecution cannot proceed or be maintained, or a conviction had, based upon the complaint of Mrs. Pratt against Mrs. Wesie. Laws of this character are evidently enacted for the purpose of protecting the sanctity of the home, and in recognition of the principle that the crime of adultery is a crime peculiarly infringing upon the rights of the innocent parties to the marriage relation, and that, if such innocent parties see fit to condone the offense, and, from a desire to avoid scandal and humiliation, and to preserve the integrity of the home, and prevent the disgrace of children and relatives, refuse to prosecute, the public is not sufficiently interested or injured to justify the institution of criminal proceedings, as in other cases, by any member of the community.

It may be assumed at the outset that the meaning of this statute in respect to who is competent to make the complaint within the limits mentioned is not clear, and that in such case the court is justified in seeking aid from the apparent intention of the legislature, and the construction which other courts have placed upon similar or identical language in statutes of other states. When the crime of adultery is committed between parties who are married, it is an injury to two innocent parties. The act cannot be committed by one person alone, but requires the participation of two, and the husband and wife of the guilty parties are each injured, as the guilty party not only injures his own spouse, but in the same measure injures the spouse of the other party to the crime, and we are of the opinion that the intent of the legislature was to provide for the commencement of the prosecution for this crime by either of the injured parties against either or both of the guilty ones. We are supported in this conclusion by what we consider the better reason, by authority, and by certain facts of history connected with this legislation, as well as by consideration of the whole of § 8903, supra. This provision is found in the statutes of Michigan, Minnesota, and Iowa, and has been passed upon by the courts of each of these states. It is held in Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221, 9 N. W. 257, that the complaint may be made by the spouse of the party who is not being prosecuted; and in People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N. W. 362, the court states that it sees no reason to doubt the correctness of the decision in Bayliss v. People. It has been referred to and passed upon in other Michigan cases, which it is unnecessary to refer to. In State v. Brecht, 41 Minn. 50, 42 N. W. 602, the supreme court of Minnesota, in passing upon this provision, uses the following language: "It must be entirely apparent, the policy of the statute as to this offense being that, if the parties injured choose to acquiesce in the wrong done, no one else ought to be allowed to move in the matter; that, where there are two persons injured, either may complain, as, where the guilty parties are both married, the husband of the one or the wife of the other may make the complaint."

In Iowa the opposite conclusion has been reached; but the court of that state has prosecution is commenced on his or her complaint. After it is thus commenced, it may be continued without further co-operation on his or her part. State v. Baldy, 17 Iowa, 39; State v. Dingee, 17 Iowa, 232.

When the prosecution is commenced by the husband or wife, it is not necessary that he or she appear further in the case to prosecute it. State v. Briggs, 68 Iowa, 416, 27 N. W. 358.

Upon the request of the complaining spouse the prosecution should be discontinued. People v. Dalrymple, 55 Mich. 519, 22 N. W. 20; Hosford v. Gratiot Circuit Judge, 129 Mich. 302, 88 N. W. 627.

After the husband and wife have been divorced, the one cannot institute a prosecution against the other for adultery committed prior to the divorce and during the existence of the marriage relation. State v. Loftus, 128 Iowa, 529, 104 N. W. 906; Re Smith, 2 Okla. 153, 37 Pac. 1099, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It was held, however, in State v. Smith, 108 Iowa, 440, 79 N. W. 115, that, on the remarriage of husband and wife after a divorce, the husband could commence a prosecution against a third person for adultery committed with the wife during their former marriage.

The fact that the prosecution must be commenced on the complaint of the unoffending spouse of one of the guilty parties does not make the complainant a party so as to render him incompetent to testify in the case. Parsons v. People, 21 Mich. 509.

The statute which allows to the injured wife or husband the exclusive privilege of prosecuting the guilty parties contemplates that the injured wife will proceed irrespective of her husband's consent and in spite of him. People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 36 Am. Rep. 438, 3 N. W. 927.

held that an exception exists to the rule which they have established, when one of the guilty parties is unmarried. In such case it holds that the complaint may be made by the spouse of the guilty married party, against the guilty unmarried party. It is unnecessary to discuss at length the reasoning of the court, but we see no reason for excluding the guilty married party, and at the same time including the guilty unmarried party, in the construction of the language in question, when it is clearly as applicable to one as to the other. This detracts very largely in our estimation from the weight which should be given the Iowa authorities upon this question. One of the authorities cited from that state is State v. Roth, 17 Iowa, 336. The decision was by a divided court; and, while a strong argument is made in the majority opinion in support of its theory, we deem the reasoning of Chief Justice Wright, in his dissenting opinion, far more convincing than that of the majority. Some of his reasoning is worthy of quotation. Among other things, he says: "At best the clause of the statute under consideration may and does permit, in too many instances, a crime which shocks the moral sense of the community to go unpunished; but, under the construction given to it by the majority, it becomes even more obnoxious and objectionable. It is certainly a monstrous anomaly that the feelings of society should be outraged, and a whole community injured, by the undisputed commission of this offense continued for months and years, and that, under the law, there is no remedy so long as the husband or wife, either from fear of his own or her own degradation, declines or refuses to apply the remedy. But, when we go one step further and say that the wife of a guilty husband cannot complain against the wife of another husband, but can only complain of her husband, and that such other wife must escape punishment if her husband does not complain against her, the outrage, to my mind, is still greater, and we ought to hesitate long, and be justified by the most cogent considerations, before giving to the statute a construction involving such consequences. . . . And so I say in this case, when the wife complained against Mary Slarett, she could not do so without, in the language of the court below, 'making the same against the husband as well.' The law will not allow her to make a half complaint, to make a partial prosecution, to commence, and not to commence, to halve the adultery, to say to the grand jury, 'Do your duty, and have regard to the oaths you have sworn as to one party, but disregard all as to the other.' But I am told that the language 'the husband or wife' means the husband or wife of the party against whom the prosecution is commenced. And stress is placed upon the definite article 'the' as favoring the construction. I answer that the legislature, in expressing their intention, had to use language, either definite or indefinite, and suppose they had 'a' husband or wife, instead of 'the' husband or wife. Then anyone who was so fortunate as to have a husband or wife could set the wheels of the law in motion, the unmarried portion of society only being insulted, and wronged without the power of redress. This, however, was not the purpose of the legislature, and hence they used the language more definite and limited in its scope and purpose. The meaning, I think, is that the husband or wife whose domestic peace and quiet has been disturbed, whose rights have been violated, who is unwilling to submit to the disgrace and ignominy, may commence the prosecution against either or both of the parties to the crime; and that, while they alone can commence the prosecution, when once they do commence, it must go through, and the law take its course with all connected with the crime, or who are legitimately involved in the prosecution,—not against them by name and in terms, but in the crime of which complaint is made." Again, it is self-evident, in view of the provisions of the section quoted, that where an unmarried man is guilty of the crime of adultery, if the contention of the respondent in this case is to be sustained, the legislature has branded him as a criminal, but has provided no possible means whereby he can be prosecuted. Such an absurdity goes a long way toward sustaining the contention of the state.

There is, however, one additional reason supporting our construction of this language. When the Code was revised and re-enacted in 1895, as shown by the records, it included the words "of the accused," making the provision read, "No prosecution for adultery shall be commenced except on the complaint of the husband or wife of the accused." The added words were omitted from the Code as printed, and in 1897 the legislature amended the section in question by striking out the limitation. Undoubtedly the legislature had two objects in doing this, one of which was to make the law stand as printed in the Code, and the other to open the door to prosecution being commenced by either innocent party against either guilty party. We are not justified in presuming that the only purpose of the legislature was to harmonize the law with the printed Code, because, had this been its only intent, it could have re-enacted the provision, and included the words omitted in the printed law.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

EVA HENSON, Admr., etc., of William S. Henson, Deceased, Resp't.,
v.

LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD COM-PANY, Appt.

(— N. Y. —, 87 N. E. 85.)

Master — negligence — evidence.

1. Evidence that a bolt was missing from a car which had been in a wreck, after it had been removed to the railroad yards, is not sufficient to charge the railroad company with negligence which would render it liable for injuries growing out of the wreck, although the absence of such a bolt might be found to increase the chance of the accident which occurred.

Same — sufficiency.

2. A cause of action against a railroad company for injuries to a brakeman by the derailment of a train is not established by evidence that one of the trucks under the car was defective, without showing which one, and that a defective forward truck might have caused the accident without showing that it was so caused.

Same — overturning car — presumption.

3. The derailment and overturning of a freight car in a train is not such evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company towards its brakeman as to cast upon it the burden of exonerating itself from the charge of negligence to absolve itself from liability for injury to him thereby.

(January 29, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of a trial term for Ontario County granting a nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Hiscock, J.:

The action was brought to recover damages sustained by the death of the plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in the maintenance and operation of its road and cars. Although quite unsatisfactory at some points, we shall assume that there was evidence tending to establish the following facts: The intestate was a freight brakeman in the employ of defendant. One evening as he was riding in the line of his duty on top of a train of freight cars, one of the latter became derailed and tipped over on him and killed him. This happened as the train was going around a curve of about 6 degrees at a speed of from 4 to 6 miles an hour. The car which tipped over was a loaded one. After the accident it was found lying on its side diagonally across the track detached from the car both in front and in the rear of it with its top turned towards the engine and its trucks derailed. Car-wheel marks were found on the ties for a distance of about 170 feet back from where the car lay, and at that distance a mark or cut was found on the right-hand rail (looking towards the engine) indicating that a car wheel had run across the rail at this point. This mark and the marks on the ties showed that the wheels left the track towards the right, increasing their divergence as they moved along. Near this point of the commencement of the wheel marks there was a space at the joint of two rails $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch in width which was from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch more than the ordinary space. Within this distance of 170 feet there were two or three ties of which the ends on one side of the track were not close up against the rails, and a few ties which showed signs of superficial wear and decay; also, some appearance of quicksand in the track ballast. The end of the car next in the rear of the one mentioned also was derailed by the accident. The wreckage was taken to defendant's yard at Sayre, and subsequently two trucks, somewhat identified as those belonging to the overturned car, were examined. In the case of one of them it was found that a column bolt was missing, and also that the nut at one end of one of the trusses designed to support the bolster was wanting, and that the truss had receded from its proper position by several inches;

Note. — As shown in the note to Fitzgerald v. Southern R. Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, there is a conflict of authority upon the question whether the rule of res ipsa loquitur is ever applicable as between master and servant. New York, however, is one of the jurisdictions which recognizes such rule as between master and servant when the circumstances are such as to make it applicable. The opinion and decision in HENSON v. LEHIGH VALLEY R. Co. illustrate the point, elaborated in that note, that the doctrine has a much narrower application between master and servant than between carrier and passenger, for the reason that—according to the common phraseology, at least—the carrier owes a higher degree of duty to a passenger than a master to a servant. The necessity of reasonably repelling the application of the doctrine of assumed risk and the fellow-servant rule, which are distinctive of the relation of master and servant and entirely inapplicable between carrier and passenger, frequently affords another reason for the narrower application of the rule res ipsa loquitur as between master and servant.

the thread where the nut was missing being worn and rusted. The column bolt and this truss rod were each part of the construction designed to support and distribute the weight of the superstructure of the car, and the absence of the column bolt and the defective condition of the truss rod tended to weaken this construction and allow the weight of the car to break down the bolster and settle down on the side gearing of the truck, and thus prevent the latter from turning readily on a curve, and, on the other hand, make the wheels of the truck liable to "jump" the rails. The bolster was found broken after the accident. There was nothing to indicate how long the column bolt had been missing.

Mr. Lyman M. Bass, with Messrs. Kenefick, Cooke, & Mitchell, for appellant;

The presumption is that the master has exercised due care in providing for servants safe appliances and a safe place to work.

Mr. W. Smith O'Brien, for respondent:

The death of plaintiff's intestate having been caused by the derailment of a car, the ownership, management, and control of which, as well as of the roadbed, was vested exclusively in the defendant, proof of the accident and the attendant circumstances cast upon the defendant the burden of ex- 19 L.R.A. Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A decision in this case is not free from difficulties whichever way it goes. The appellate division, in reversing the judgment of nonsuit, held that the plaintiff had failed to establish her allegations of negligence with one exception. We think that this decision was clearly right in so far as it held that no sufficient connection had been shown between the accident and various alleged defects in defendant's track and car. It would not only be speculation, but speculation in the face of opposing evidence, to hold that the space between two of the rails or the alleged defects in the ties or ballast caused the car which killed intestate to leave the track. While a jury probably might be permitted to say that the absence of a column bolt tended to impair the construction of a loaded freight car so as to in-sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Crew, J.:

On January 31, 1907, the plaintiff in error, David B. McGill, commenced an action in the court of common pleas of Lorain county, Ohio, against the defendant in error, the Cleveland & Southwestern Traction Company, to recover damages for personal injuries received by him on October 23, 1906, while in the employ of said defendant company. The petition filed by him, omitting caption and verification, was in the words and figures following: "Now comes the plaintiff, David B. McGill, and says that the defendant, the Cleveland & Southwestern Traction Company, is now, and was, on the 23d day of October, 1906, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Ohio, and, as such corporation, owned, operated, and controlled a line of electric railway extending from the city of Cleveland, in the county of Cuyahoga, to the village of Wellington, county of Lorain, and elsewhere; that in said village of Wellington at said time, near the public square, defendant maintained a certain side track and other equipment used by the defendant in the operation and maintenance of its said line of railway; avers that on and prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant company, in the capacity of helper to one Mike Gibbons, who was then in the employ of the defendant company in Wellington, Ohio, as car inspector. Plaintiff avers that he controlled no person, and was subject to the orders, direction, and control of his said foreman or boss, Mike Gibbons; avers that, at said time, defendant maintained, as aforesaid, a certain side track along the main street in said village of Wellington, where the defendant placed certain of its cars, from time to time, to be inspected, repaired, and cleaned; avers that it was plaintiff's duty, among other things, at said time, to assist, under the direction of said boss or foreman, in cleaning, washing, and repairing the cars of defendant company; that it became and was necessary in cleaning and washing said cars of defendant company, and particularly the windows and window frames on the outside of said cars, for this plaintiff to use a certain stepladder about 7 feet high; said ladder being furnished by defendant company for that purpose in the performance of his work; avers that some days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, plaintiff discovered that said ladder, which defendant had furnished him to be used while performing his duties, as aforesaid, had become old, worn, and defective to such an extent that the same was unfit for plaintiff to use in connection with his said work, in that the steps of said ladder were loose and worn, and the iron braces holding said steps to the side pieces of said ladder were loose, broken, and defective; avers that a few days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, this plaintiff complained to his said foreman, Mike Gibbons, of the defective and dangerous condition of said ladder, and plaintiff avers that said defendant through its foreman assured and promised plaintiff that he would have said ladder repaired with a new, proper, and sufficient one, so that plaintiff could safely perform his work. Plaintiff avers that about a week or 10 days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, he further complained to the master mechanic of defendant company, Fred Strail, of the defective and dangerous condition of said ladder, and that said master mechanic then and there promised and assured plaintiff that he would be furnished with a new, sufficient, and proper ladder with which to perform his work as soon as the same could be made, and that he should use said ladder until a new ladder was furnished; that plaintiff relied upon defendant's fulfilling its said promises and assurance, and he continued to perform his labor as directed by said foreman, Mike Gibbons, until the 23d day of October, 1906, when plaintiff was injured in the direct line of his duty and without fault or negligence upon his part, as hereinafter set forth. Plaintiff avers that on said 23d day of October, 1906, he was ordered by defendant's foreman, Mike Gibbons, to clean the windows on the outside of the vestibule on the west end of one of defendant's cars placed on said side track in said village, and, in order to properly perform his work, it became and was necessary for plaintiff to use said ladder furnished by the defendant company, and that, while attempting so to do, the steps of said ladder and braces thereof gave way, by reason of its old, defective, and dangerous condition, and plaintiff was thrown upon and across the bumper on the west end of said car, and was precipitated to the fender of said car, bruising plaintiff and inflicting serious and permanent injuries, as hereinafter set forth. Plaintiff avers that the defendant was guilty of negligence and carelessness in permitting and allowing said ladder to be and remain in said defective, worn-out, and dangerous condition, and in ordering said plaintiff to work with the same at said time. That the defendant was guilty of carelessness and negligence in not furnishing plaintiff with a new, proper, and sufficient ladder, in accordance with the promises and assurance of defendant. Plaintiff avers that his injuries were caused solely by reason of the fault and negligence of the defendant, as aforesaid, and without any fault or negligence upon his part; that, by reason of the negligence of the defendant aforesaid, plaintiff was thrown upon the iron bumper of said car, thereby suffering a fracture of two ribs on his right side; that his right arm and shoulder were severely sprained and bruised; that he is unable to use said right arm and shoulder as he formerly did, and he believes he never will have the proper use of said arm and shoulder; avers that the same gives him constant pain; that he sustained a severe injury to his head and neck; that his head causes him constant pain, and that he suffers from dizziness; that he received a severe bruise to his right hip; that he further received a severe injury and shock to his entire nervous system; that he suffers from sleeplessness as a result of the injury to his head; avers that by reason of the fracture of the ribs on his right side his right lung has become affected, the exact nature and extent of which plaintiff is unable at this time to determine; that he was confined to his bed for a period of about two weeks; that prior to said injury he was able to perform, and did perform, manual labor; that since said injury, he has not been able to perform any manual labor, and believes he will be incapacitated from performing the same as he formerly did; avers that his injuries are permanent, all to his damage in the sum of $10,000. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant for his damages so sustained, as aforesaid, in the sum of $10,000." A general demurrer to this petition was sustained by the court of common pleas, and, the plaintiff not desiring to amend or to further plead, his petition was dismissed, and judgment rendered against him for costs. On error this judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. A reversal of both of said judgments is here asked by the plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Skiles, Green, & Skiles, and Stroup & Fanver, for plaintiff in error:

The servant has a right to rely upon the promise and assurance of the master to remedy a defect, and meantime to continue his employment without assuming the risk of injury from such defect.

Messrs. E. G. Johnson, H. C. Johnson, and T. C. Johnson, for defendant in error:

A stepladder does not come within the rule that a servant may complain of a defect therein, and, upon promise of the master to repair, may remain in the service without accepting the risk.

The defects in the ladder, as disclosed in the petition, were so patent and of such a character that plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury even though promise to repair is shown.

The rule that a servant may relieve himself from the assumption of the risk incident to defects and dangers of which he has full knowledge by exacting from the master a promise to repair does not apply in those cases where the servant is engaged in ordinary labor, or the tools used are only those of simple construction, with which the servant is as familiar and understands as fully as the master.

Crew, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In support of the claim that the averments of the petition in this case sufficiently allege and show a liability on the part of the traction company to plaintiff for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by him through the negligence of said traction company, reliance is had upon the general rule that, where the servant notifies the master of a defect in machinery or in his place of work, and the master promises to repair the same or to obviate and remove the danger, and the servant, reasonably relying upon such promise, remains in the service, the master thereby assumes the risk of injury to the servant, and is liable to him in damages for an injury resulting to him from such defect pending the making of the repair promised. While such doubtless is the general rule applied in cases where the servant is engaged in working with machinery or appliances of which he has but a limited and imperfect knowledge, and in cases where some measure of skill and experience is necessary to enable the servant to know and appreciate the particular defect and the danger incident thereto, yet that this rule was never designed or intended to apply to cases of common and ordinary labor, such as requires in its performance the use only of some simple implement, instrumentality, or tool with which the employee is himself entirely familiar, is, we think, clearly and abundantly established by the overwhelming weight of authorities.

Judge Bailey in his work on Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant (vol. 2, at § 3103), in speaking of this rule and its limitations, says: "A master is not liable to a servant of mature years and ordinary mental capacity who is injured in his employ by reason of a defect in a ladder of which he was aware, though the servant had notified the master of such defect, and was told to use the ladder until another was furnished. The rule exempting an employee from an assumption of the risk in case of a promise to remedy the defect is designed for the benefit of employees engaged in work where machinery and materials are used of which they can have little knowledge, and not for those engaged in ordinary labor which only requires the use of implements with which they are entirely familiar."

In the case of Meador v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Ind. 290, 46 Am. St. Rep. 384, 37 N. E. 721, which was an action to recover for a personal injury occasioned by a defective ladder used by a watchman in lighting and extinguishing lamps at street crossings, the court, in discussing this rule said: "In cases, however, where persons are employed in the performance of ordinary labor, in which no machinery is used, and no materials are furnished the use of which requires the exercise of great care and skill, it can be scarcely claimed that a defective instrument or tool furnished by the master, of which the employee has full knowledge and comprehension, can be regarded as making out a case of liability within the rule laid down. A common laborer who uses agricultural implements while at work upon a farm or in a garden, or one who is employed in any service not requiring great skill and judgment, and who uses the ordinary tools employed in such work, to which he is accustomed, and in regard to which he has complete knowledge, cannot be said to have a claim against his employer for negligence, if, in using an utensil which he knows to be defective, he is accidentally injured. . . . The fact that he notified the master of the defect, and asked for another implement, and the master promised to furnish it, in such a case does not render the master responsible if an accident occurs. A rule imposing a liability under such circumstances would be far-reaching in its consequences, and would extend the rule of respondet superior to many of the vocations in life for which it was never intended. It is a just and salutary rule, designed for the benefit of employees engaged in work where machinery and materials are used of which they can have little knowledge, and not for those engaged in ordinary labor, which only requires the use of implements with which they are entirely familiar. The plaintiff, in the case at bar, was of the latter class of laborers, and the work in which he was engaged was not of a character which would entitle him to the protection of the principle referred to, as applied to the use of complicated machinery."

In Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56, in the opinion of the court by Miller, J., it is said: "As a general rule, it is to be supposed that the master who employs a servant has a better and more comprehensive knowledge as to the machinery and materials to be used than the employee, who has claims upon his protection against the use of defective or improper materials or appliances while engaged in the performance of the service required of him. The rule stated, however, is not applicable in all cases, and, where the servant has equal knowledge with the master as to the machinery used, or the means employed in the performance of the work devolving upon him, and a full knowledge of existing defects, it does not necessarily follow that the master is liable for injuries sustained by reason of the use thereof. In considering the application of the rule just stated, due regard must be had to the limited knowledge of the employee as to the machinery and structure on which he is employed and to his capacity and intelligence, and to the fact that the servant has a right to rely upon the master to protect him from danger and injury, and in selecting the agent from which it may arise. Powers v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 274, 280. In cases, however, where persons are employed in the performance of ordinary labor, in which no machinery is used, and no materials furnished, the use of which requires the exercise of great skill and care, it can scarcely be claimed that a defective instrument or tool furnished by the master, of which the employee has full knowledge and comprehension, can be regarded as making out a case of liability within the rule laid down. . . . It does not rest with the servant to say that the master has superior knowledge, and has thereby imposed upon him. He fully comprehends that the instrument which he employs is not perfect, and if he is thereby injured, it is by reason of his own fault and negligence. The fact that he notified the master of the defect, and asked for another instrument, and the master promised to furnish the same, in such a case does not render the master responsible if an accident occurs."

In Gunning System v. Lapointe, 212 Ill. 274, 72 N. E. 393, a comparatively recent case, it is said: "It is not in all cases that the servant may relieve himself from the assumption of the risk incident to defects and dangers of which he has full knowledge by exacting from the master a promise to repair. The cases where the rule of assumed risk is suspended, and the servant exempted from its application under a promise from the master to repair or cure the defect complained of, are those in which particular skill and experience are necessary to know and appreciate the defect and the danger incident thereto, or where machinery and materials are used of which the servant can have little knowledge, and not those cases where the servant is engaged in ordinary labor, or the tools used are only those of simple construction, with which the servant is as familiar and as fully understands as the master."

In Vanderpool v. Partridge, 79 Neb. 165, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 668, 112 N. W. 318, the first two paragraphs of the syllabus are as follows: "(1) The law requires masters to exercise ordinary care to provide reasonably safe tools and appliances for their servants. (2) But the foregoing rule has no application where the servant possesses ordinary intelligence and knowledge, and the tools and appliances furnished are of a simple nature, easily understood, and in which defects can be readily observed by such servant." The rule as announced by the foregoing authorities has found recognition and has been declared in many other cases, among which are Bowen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 117 Ill. App. 9; Corcoran v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 81 Wis. 191, 51 N. W. 328; Jenney Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy, 115 Ind. 566, 18 N. E. 30; Webster Mfg. Co. v. Nisbett, 205 Ill. 273, 68 N. E. 936; Conley v. American Exp. Co. 87 Me. 352, 32 Atl. 965; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Kelton, 55 Ark. 483, 18 S. W. 933; Gowen v. Harley, 6 C. C. A. 190, 12 U. S. App. 574, 56 Fed. 973; International Packing Co. v. Kretowicz, 119 Ill. App. 488; Erdman v. Illinois Steel Co. 95 Wis. 6, 60 Am. St. Rep. 66, 69 N. W. 993; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brentford, 79 Tex. 619, 23 Am. St. Rep. 377, 15 S. W. 561.

Tested, then, by this apparently now well-settled rule, we are of opinion that the allegations of plaintiff's petition in the present case do not state a cause of action. In his petition plaintiff avers: "That some days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, plaintiff discovered that said ladder which defendant had furnished him to be used while performing his duties, as aforesaid, had become old, worn, and defective to such an extent that the same was unfit for plaintiff to use in connection with his said work, in that the steps of said ladder were loose and worn and the iron braces holding said steps to the side pieces of said ladder were loose, broken, and defective; avers that a few days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, this plaintiff complained to his said foreman, Mike Gibbons, of the defective and dangerous condition of said ladder, and plaintiff avers that said defendant through its foreman assured and promised plaintiff that he would have said ladder repaired with a new, proper, and sufficient one, so that plaintiff could safely perform his work. Plaintiff avers that about a week or 10 days prior to the 23d day of October, 1906, he further complained to the master mechanic of defendant company, Fred Strail, of the defective and dangerous condition of said ladder, and that said master mechanic then and there promised and assured plaintiff that he would be furnished with a new, sufficient, and proper ladder with which to perform his work as soon as the same could be made, and that he should use said ladder until a new ladder was furnished." It sufficiently and affirmatively appears from the foregoing allegations that the unfit and unsafe condition of this stepladder, on and prior to October 23, 1906, was fully known to and understood by the plaintiff. He knew, as he alleges, "that the same was unfit for plaintiff to use in connection with his said work." He was familiar with and appreciated its condition and defects, all of which were alike open to his observation and within his comprehension, and it would seem from the averments of his petition that he was so impressed by this defective and unsafe condition that he not only complained of the same to his foreman, but to the master mechanic as well. Plaintiff knew as well as the foreman, master mechanic, or master that said stepladder, in its then condition, could not be used with any assurance of safety, and, having such knowledge, he must be held to have assumed the risk of its use. To hold the master liable to an employee, under such circumstances, for injuries resulting to the latter from the use of so simple an implement or tool as an ordinary stepladder, would be to extend the rule of respondet superior beyond its reasonable limit, and to apply it as never intended. The case of Union Mfg. Co. v. Morrissey, 40 Ohio St. 148, 48 Am. Rep. 669, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error as supporting their contention in the present case, is not in point; that being a case where the injury to the employee was caused by a complicated machine, and not by a simple instrumentality or appliance such as the stepladder in the case at bar.

Judgment affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

FRANK M. BEARD, Resp.,
v.
ROYAL NEIGHBORS OF AMERICA, Appt.

(— Or. —, 99 Pac. 83.)

Insurance — false answer — materiality.

1. A negative answer to a question in an application for insurance the answers in which are made warranties, as to having had la grippe, will avoid the policy where it appears that the applicant had had such disease, although it was a very light attack and may have had nothing to do with his death.

Evidence — insurance — proofs of loss.

2. The proofs of death are admissible in evidence in an action upon a mutual-benefit certificate.

Insurance — consulting physician.

3. Consultation by an applicant for insurance with a physician, within the meaning of a question in the application, is shown by the fact that her husband notified the physician that she was indisposed and asked him to attend her, and that, upon his arrival at the house, she advised him of her symptoms and received aid from him.

Trial — question for court — truth of answers.

4. The truth or falsity of warranties by an applicant for insurance may be determined by the court when the beneficiary has confessed upon the witness stand that they were not true.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover upon a benefit-insurance certificate. Reversed.

Statement by Slater, C.:

This is an action to recover the amount of a benefit certificate issued by the defendant association to Nancy C. Beard, wife of plaintiff. Application for issuance of the certificate was made August 22, 1903, and the certificate was issued to, and received and accepted by, the insured, on November 13, 1903. By its terms it was issued and accepted upon certain warranties, conditions, and agreements therein expressed, to the general effect: (1) That the application and medical examination are a part of the contract, and that the literal truth of such application, and each and every part thereof, shall be held to be a strict warranty, and to form the only basis of the liability of the society to the member applying for the benefit, and to the beneficiary, the same as if fully set forth in the certificate; (2) that, should said application, and each and every part thereof, not be literally true, then the certificate as to the member or beneficiary shall be null and void; (3) that the certificate was issued in consideration of the warranties and agreements made in the application; and (4) that, if the application shall be found in any respect untrue, then the certificate shall be void and all rights under it forfeited. Nancy C. Beard died June 8, 1905, and proof thereof was made to the defendant on June 9, 1905, by Frank M. Beard, the beneficiary named in the certificate, who demanded payment of the amount therein specified, and, the company failing to pay, he brought this action to recover the same. The answer denies generally all of the material averments of the complaint, except that it expressly admits the issuance of the certificate and the terms thereof, as stated in the complaint: that plaintiff is named therein as the beneficiary; that due and timely proofs of the death of Mrs. Beard were made and furnished to the defendant; but the defendant denied any and all liability to plaintiff by reason of the certificate. As an affirmative defense there are set forth the terms of the application, which are in part to the general effect that the applicant agreed that the application should be the sole basis of her admission to the order, and of the benefit certificate to be issued, and that any untrue statement or answer made in the application or to the examining physician, or any concealment of facts, intentional or otherwise, should forfeit her rights, and that of her beneficiary, to any and all benefits therein. It also contains this provision: "That I have verified each of the foregoing answers and statements, numbered from 1 to 33, both inclusive, and adopt them as my own, whether written by me or not, and declare and warrant that they are full, complete, and literally true; and I agree that the exact truth of each shall be a condition precedent to any binding contract." There are then set forth a number of interrogatories contained in the application and the answers made thereto by Mrs. Beard, among which are these: "(18) Have you within the last seven years consulted any person, physician, or physicians in regard to personal ailment? No. If so, give dates, ailment, length of illness, and person, physician, or physician's name and address"—and "(25) Have you ever had any . . . of the following diseases: . . . La grippe? No." It is then averred that each of these answers are untrue, in that she had had la grippe, and that, within seven years preceding the date of her application, she had consulted a physician in regard to a personal ailment. The affirmative matter of the answer was denied by the reply. The cause being at issue, a trial was had before a jury. At the close of the taking of testimony defendant moved for a directed verdict in its favor, which was denied by the court. A verdict for plaintiff having been returned, judgment thereon was according- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Slater, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion for a directed verdict is based upon the averment that the answer given by Mrs. Beard to the eighteenth interrogatory, contained in her application, was not true, and that the evidence conclusively shows that she had consulted a physician regarding a personal ailment within seven years prior to making such answer. The proof on the part of the defendant consisted, first, of an offer of the application, which showed a negative answer to that inquiry, the genuineness of the signature of Mrs. Beard thereto being admitted by plaintiff when called upon by defendant to testify in regard to that matter; and, second, of an offer of the proofs of death, which it is claimed contain an admission against plaintiff's interest to the effect that the answer given by Mrs. Beard to the eighteenth interrogatory was not in fact true. The proof consisted in part of an affidavit, made on June 26, 1905, by Dr. K. L. Miller, who, it appears therefrom, attended Mrs. Beard in her last illness, in which he stated that she died of tuberculosis, the predisposing cause of which he did not know. But he stated that, following an attack of la grippe, she had a hacking cough; that he had been the medical attendant or adviser of the deceased for three years, and had treated her two or three years prior thereto, for four or five days, for the disease called "la grippe." Further, to explain his attendance upon deceased as her physician, Dr. Miller testified in person, at the instance of defendant, that he was by profession a physician and surgeon, and had practised his profession at Roseburg since 1882, and was acquainted with the deceased during her lifetime. In answer to the question whether or not he was ever consulted by Nancy C. Beard in her lifetime as a physician and surgeon, he stated that he was called to see Mrs. Beard early in the fall of 1902; that from the symptoms he discovered at the time he considered it a mild case of la grippe; that he gave her one prescription, and never saw her any more during that sickness. On cross-examination he stated that at that time (1902) he was requested to attend upon deceased by her husband, the plaintiff, and in response to the following cross-interrogatory: "She never consulted you at all; you were sent there by her husband?"—he replied, "Of course she consulted me after I got there, so far as she had anything to do with it." In response to further interrogation, he stated that he informed the patient that her trouble was "just la grippe in a mild form;" the symptoms being a cold in the head, accompanied with pain in the limbs and head.

An attempt was made by counsel to have the witness declare that the ailment of Mrs. Beard, for which she was then treated, was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"what ordinarily would be called a bad cold," but the witness replied, "Well, of late years we term it 'la grippe.' We used to call it 'influenza.'" On being urged to fix more definitely the date of his attendance upon the deceased, the witness stated that he could not fix the exact date, but that it was in August or September, 1902, and that he fixed this date from the written prescription on file with the druggist. In rebuttal plaintiff testified in part, in his own behalf, as follows: "I went home one day at noon, and Mrs. Beard was laying down, feeling bad. She seemed to have quite a cold in her head and headache and kind of fever, and I came back uptown and met Dr. Miller on the street, and I told him that Mrs. Beard was feeling bad, and I wished he would go down and see what was the matter. So he went down, and when he came back he gave me a prescription, and I asked him, I think, at the time, what was the matter with her. He says, 'Oh, a severe cold, or la grippe, or something of that kind,' and he says, 'She will be all right in a short time,' or something to that effect, and I says, 'If there is anything serious in any way, go ahead and straighten her out.' And I guess he never considered it that way, for he never went back any more,—never asked me any more about it;" that the doctor "gave one little prescription, and that was the end of it." He gave further testimony to the effect that his wife never had any symptoms of consumption prior to the time she made application for insurance in the order, but that the first he ever knew that she was afflicted with such disease was on the 10th day of December, 1904, which followed a severe cold contracted by her about that time; that when she made application she was strong and healthy. Other testimony was offered by plaintiff through Dr. Hoover, who was the examining physician of the defendant association at the time of Mrs. Beard's application, tending to show that his examination of the applicant was thorough, and that, relying upon his report made in this case, he testified that there were no symptoms or evidence of any trouble of the lungs at that time.

No evidence, however, was offered by plaintiff tending in any degree to controvert the truth of the statements made by Dr. Miller in the death proofs, or in his evidence in person to the effect that the deceased, early in the fall of 1902, had consulted him as a physician regarding a personal ailment, and that at that time he had treated her for the disease called "la grippe." Under such state of the record, there is no conflict in the evidence or dispute as to the essential facts above stated; and, as we view the law, it was the duty of the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant when so requested by it. Coffin v. Hutchinson, 22 Or. 554, 30 Pac. 424; Crawford v. Hutchinson, 38 Or. 578, 65 Pac. 84. By an express agreement of the parties, the statements contained in the application of Nancy C. Beard for a benefit certificate were made material to the consideration thereof, and warranties on her part, and the literal truth of each of them is a necessary prerequisite to a recovery. Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 197; Buford v. New York L. Ins. Co. 5 Or. 334; Chrisman v. State Ins. Co. 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. 466. Objection was made by plaintiffs to the reception in evidence of the proofs of death, when offered by the defendant, as being irrelevant and immaterial; but it has been generally held that, being an admission by the beneficiary, they are admissible, and that the effect thereof is to make a prima facie case of the truth of the facts stated therein, as against the beneficiary and in favor of the society. 3 Elliot, Ev. § 2387; Bliss, Life Ins. § 265; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 22 Wall. 32, 22 L. ed. 793; Home Ben. Asso. v. Sargent, 142 U. S. 691, 35 L. ed. 1160, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332; Grand Lodge I. O. M. A. v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123, 48 N. E. 59. And by some authorities it is even held that, in the absence of evidence to contradict the statements in the proofs of loss, the prima facie case thus made becomes conclusive. 3 Elliot, Ev. § 2387.

The interrogatory "Have you, within the last seven years, consulted any person, physician, or physicians in regard to personal ailment?" was answered by the applicant in the negative, while the next inquiry "If so, give dates, ailment, length of illness, and person, physician, or physician's name and address" remained unanswered. The truth of the answer given is directly impeached by the affidavit of Dr. Miller in the proofs of death. The application was made August 22, 1903, while Miller's affidavit was made June 26, 1905. He there says that he had been the medical attendant or adviser of the deceased for three years, and that two or three years prior to that time he had treated the deceased four or five days for the disease known as "la grippe." When called to testify in person, he evidently attempts to minimize the gravity of the case by saying that early in the fall—August or September of 1902—he was called once to see Mrs. Beard; that he found her suffering with a mild case of la grippe, and gave her one prescription. This much is expressly admitted by the plaintiff when testifying in his own behalf, although he attempts further to palliate the admission by saying that he sent Dr. Miller to the house to see Mrs. Beard, and that the latter did not seek the advice of the doctor. But it is testified by Dr. Miller that when he arrived at the house she consulted with him regarding her trouble, and that he prescribed for her ailment. It is not material to the issue to be tried in this case whether Mrs. Beard's ailment was a serious or mild form of the disease known as "la grippe." So long as it is admitted that she had such a disease and was treated for it by Dr. Miller, it cannot be gainsaid that she consulted a physician in regard to a personal ailment.

In Cobb v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. 163 Mass. 176, 10 L.R.A. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 619, 26 N. E. 230, the presiding judge at the circuit had instructed the jury that, if the insured, being, as he supposed, in need of a physician, went to one for the purpose of consulting him as to what was his ailment, and had an interview answering such inquiries as the physician deemed pertinent, receiving aid, advice, or assistance from him, the insured consulted a physician within the meaning of the interrogatory. On appeal the supreme court approved this ruling. The mere fact that Dr. Miller was not sought out by Mrs. Beard, with a view of consulting him as a physician, but, instead, was met on the street by Mr. Beard, who advised him of his wife's illness, and directed him to go to the house and attend her, does not prevent it from being considered a consultation by her with a physician. She approved and adopted the act of her husband as her own by accepting the services of the physician, advising him of her symptoms, and receiving aid from him, thereby making the act of her husband in summoning the physician her own act, if that were necessary—which we think was not—to constitute a consultation of a physician. The material part of the facts constituting consultation, within the meaning of this contract is having an interview with him, acquainting him with the nature of the ailment, and accepting and receiving aid, advice, or assistance from him. Some effort was made by counsel to parry the effect of these admissions by attempting to show that the statements on which the breach is predicated are in no way material to the risk, and that the admitted personal ailment, in relation to which Mrs. Beard consulted Dr. Miller in August or September, 1902, could not have been the predisposing cause of her last illness. But from the general principle that the materiality of the fact warranted to be true is wholly essential in a defense based upon a breach thereof, it necessarily follows that when it is shown that there is a breach of warranty upon which a policy is based, the policy is avoided, though the statement is in no way material to the risk. Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 197; Buford v. New York L. Ins. Co. and Chrisman v. State Ins. Co. supra; McDermott v. Modern Woodmen, 97 Mo. App. 636, 71 S. W. 833; Hoover v. Royal Neighbors, 65 Kan. 616, 70 Pac. 595.

Again, it is urged by plaintiff that the truth or falsity of answers in the application are questions of fact for the jury to decide, and not for the court. That this is so in the first instance cannot be questioned; but, when the issue joined as to the falsity of such answers has been sustained by the defendant by competent and relevant testimony, which has not only been uncontroverted by plaintiff as to its material elements, but is confessed by him in person upon the witness stand, there is no dispute as to the facts; and, under the rule stated by Mr. Chief Justice Strahan in Coffin v. Hutchinson, supra, the question becomes one of law for the court.

The court erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Witness — accused — instructions.

An instruction to the jury in a criminal case in which accused has testified in his own behalf: You are not bound to consider the testimony of defendant as absolutely true . . . you are to bear in mind that he speaks in his own behalf, to discharge himself from a criminal accusation, and you are to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under so to speak as to procure an acquittal,—is calculated to leave with the jury the impression that they are to consider defendant's testimony false, and therefore reject it, and is erroneous, notwithstanding the statute provides that the credit to be given the testimony of accused is to be left to the jury, under the instructions of the court.

State v. Clements, 15 Or. 250, 14 Pac. 410.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, E. W. Bartlett, was jointly convicted with one S. A. Gardinier of the crime of attempting to extort money, alleged in the information to have been committed by unlawfully threatening to accuse certain persons of the offense of gambling, and to prosecute them therefor. Bartlett appeals from the judgment which followed, and his counsel contend, inter alia, that the trial court erred in charging the jury. The jury. This right includes the parties to the cause, as well as witnesses generally, and exists in both criminal and civil cases.

A charge to the jury is perfectly exceptionable only when the judge confines himself to the duty of setting forth the law applicable to the case, without either expressing or intimating any opinion as to the credibility of statements made by the party accused or by the witnesses. The court should not instruct the jury to give full credit to the testimony of the accused, nor generally as to the credence or weight to be given to his testimony. But the court may, in the absence of a statute forbidding it, direct the jury as to matters which they may consider in determining the credibility of the accused, such as his good character, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of his account of the transaction, the probability or consistency of his testimony, and his intelligence or want of intelligence. Nor does the rule against singling out a particular witness and charging the jury as to his credibility preclude the court from referring in an appropriate way to the weight to be given to the testimony of the accused.

It would be manifestly improper for the court, by a hostile or adverse charge, to deprive the accused of the benefit of his testimony, as by an intimation of disbelief in the truth of the defendant's testimony; but the court may properly authorize the jury to disregard the defendant's testimony if they believe it to be wilfully false as to any material matter, but the charge should not be of such a nature as to lead the jury to conclude that they may arbitrarily or capriciously reject the testimony of the accused.

It is permissible for the court to direct the jury to take into consideration the fact, if it be a fact, that the testimony of the accused has been contradicted, as well as the fact, if they find it to be a fact, that he has been corroborated by other credible evidence.

The court has a right to instruct the jury, in determining the credibility of the accused, to consider the fact that he is the party on trial; but whether the court may go further, and advise the jury that such fact is not of itself sufficient to discredit his testimony, has been both affirmed and denied. It is objected to on the grounds that such an instruction would tend to do the accused more harm than good, and that it would also invade the province of the jury.

The jury may properly be authorized to consider the interest the accused has in the result of their verdict, as affecting his credibility, but the court should refrain from suggesting the degree of weight to be given to that fact. While the court may suggest to the jury that the interest of the accused may color his testimony, yet the charge should not be of such a nature as to disparage his evidence. The jury should not be told that the prisoner's interest tends to discredit his testimony, nor should the court place such stress upon the fact of his interest as would discredit his evidence in advance. It is improper to charge the jury to scrutinize the evidence of the accused with great caution; and a charge that the jury may disregard the testimony of the accused on account of his interest is prejudicial; but an instruction that the jury are not required blindly to receive the testimony of the accused as true is not regarded as prejudicial, especially when coupled with a further statement that they are not to disregard his testimony, but must give it due consideration.

It is generally proper to instruct the jury to treat the testimony of the accused the same as that of other witnesses, bearing in mind, however, his interest in the result, since he does not stand in the position of a disinterested witness. Instructions referring to the interest of the accused usually have been upheld as against an objection that his testimony is thereby prejudicially singled out, although sometimes considered ill-advised, and, in one jurisdiction, declared to be invasive of the province of the jury. A general instruction upon the fact of interest, applicable to all the witnesses, obviously is unobjectionable.

The court may properly authorize the jury to consider a former conviction of the accused, as affecting his credibility, where proof of such fact is admissible for that pur-ed to testify under the act of 1872 (9 Sess. Assem. p. 95), her testimony became a fair subject of criticism before the jury, and the counsel for the people was at liberty to analyze her testimony, to compare it with the other testimony in the cause, and comment upon the omissions and contradictions, if any, therein. The prisoner was at liberty to contradict Knauss, and to give her own account of the matters related by him, and the fact that she did not do so might well be considered by the jury in determining the credibility of Knauss. People v. Dyle, 21 N. Y. 578. The prisoner was not required to testify, and, by the terms of the statute, if she had chosen to remain silent, no inference of guilt could be drawn from her conduct. By taking the witness stand she opened the door to criticism, and cannot now complain that an effort was made to measure her testimony by the ordinary rules which govern human conduct." The foregoing observation, relating to the declarations upon oath of the accused as a witness in her own behalf, constitutes the only reference made by the court to any instruction requested by her counsel or to any charge given to the jury as to her testimony. How, then, can it be said, as indicated in the note adverted to, that the language quoted in the text by the noted author, and as given by the court in the case cited, was approved, when the instruction does not appear even to have been challenged by counsel for the accused, or commented upon in any manner by the justice who wrote the cused and that of other witnesses, the court should not charge that the good character for peaceableness and honesty which the prisoner had established should have great weight with them; but the utmost that he ought to say to the jury is that, if they believe that the prisoner has established a good character, that will be a circumstance to be taken into consideration by them in forming their conclusion. State v. Brown, 34 S. C. 41, 12 S. E. 662.

A charge that the fact that accused had been drunk at a theater, and had been put out of the house, may or does weaken his testimony and affects his credibility as a witness, is a charge upon the weight of the testimony, and is erroneous. Tally v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 474, 88 S. W. 339.

The jury may properly be instructed that, in determining the credit to be given to the testimony of the accused, they may take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant's account of the transaction. Blair v. State, 60 Ark. 558, 64 S. W. 948; Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299; Com. v. Breyessee, 160 Pa. 451, 40 Am. St. Rep. 729, 28 Atl. 824; Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635.

An instruction that the jury have a right to take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant's account of the transaction does not tend to discredit the defendant's testimony before the jury, where they are further told not to disregard the testimony of any witness, and that the weight to be given to the testimony of any witness is a matter solely within their province. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 24 S. W. 885; Jones v. State, 61 Ark. 88, 32 S. W. 81.

Nor does such a charge direct them to test the testimony of the accused by a more rigid rule than that which is applicable to other witnesses. McIntosh v. State, supra.

The jury may properly be told to consider the probability or improbability of the testimony of the accused. Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 467, 4 N. E. 63; Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4; State v. Hilsabeck, supra; United States v. Kenney, 90 Fed. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

257; Housh v. State, 43 Neb. 163, 61 N. W. 571.

An instruction that the jury have the right, in determining the credibility to be accorded to the testimony of the defendant, to take into consideration the probability of his statements in connection with the other evidence in the case, does not unreasonably and improperly disparage the defendant's testimony, especially where the jury were instructed that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses. Younger v. State, 12 Wyo. 24, 73 Pac. 551.

A charge that, in determining the credibility of the defendant, the jury may consider the consistency of his testimony with the established facts in the case, is properly given. Com. v. Breyessee, supra.

An instruction informing the jury in an action in which the accused testified, that they are at liberty to consider the consistency or inconsistency of the statements of a witness, one with another, is not erroneous. Minich v. People, supra.

The jury may be told that the testimony of the accused, if rational, natural, and consistent, may outweigh the testimony of all other witnesses. People v. McArron, 121 Mich. 1, 79 N. W. 944.

Such a charge is not objectionable on the ground that it should have used the words "any other witness or witnesses" instead of "other witnesses," since the language used by the court is in no sense limited, but applies to any other witness and to all other witnesses. People v. Willett, 105 Mich. 110, 62 N. W. 1115.

An instruction in reference to the testimony of defendants who were jointly indicted and tried together for murder, each of whom sought to exculpate himself and impute the crime to the other, that the jury could not believe them both, because they were wholly inconsistent as to the principal fact in the case, does not transgress a statutory and constitutional prohibition against charging jurors as to matters of fact, since the court may state the testimony as well as declare the law to jurors. State v. McLane, 15 Nev. 345.

disbelieve the sworn statements of the defendants if they are inconsistent with their actions or with the circumstances connected with the alleged offense.

An instruction which advises the jury that the actions of the defendant at the time of the commission of the alleged offense are a safer foundation from which to draw a conclusion as to his intention at the time of the alleged taking than his sworn statements as a witness is a decision upon a question of fact, and is erroneous. State v. Maynard, 19 Nev. 284, 9 Pac. 514.

An instruction to the jury as to the testimony given on his own behalf by one accused of murder, which substantially says to them that the circumstances as to the killing and concealment of the death of the deceased cannot be bribed, but the defendant can be; therefore you must consider that these circumstances outweigh his testimony, — is erroneous. Hickory v. United States, 160 U. S. 408, 40 L. ed. 474, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327.

A charge that while defendant, who had been indicted for murder, has been permitted to testify what his intention was in doing any of the acts charged against him, yet that the jury should not take his statements as to what his intentions were as conclusive, but should weigh them in connection with the other circumstances connected with the perpetration of the offense, and, if the circumstances connected with the perpetration of the offense convince them that the statements of the defendant as to what his intentions were in shooting at the deceased are opposed to the circumstances connected with the perpetration of the offense, then it will be their duty to find that his intentions in so shooting were as manifested by the circumstances, to the exclusion of what he may say his intentions were, invades the province of the jury, which has exclusive power to pass upon the credibility of witnesses and determine the weight and sufficiency of evidence. Lynch v. People, 33 Colo. 128, 79 Pac. 1015.

In People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802, Mr. Justice McFarland, referring to the rule announced in the preceding case, says: "That instruction has been approved in subsequent cases, and it is now too late to question its correctness; but, if courts and prosecuting attorneys think it their duty to have an instruction on that subject in every case, they should be careful not to go further in that direction than courts have already gone. An instruction giving the general rule can do no harm, and is not of much importance, for every intelligent juror knows, without any instruction on the subject, that a defendant, whether innocent or guilty, is deeply interested in being acquitted. But when such an instruction is reiterated, and put into exceedingly strong jury would be justified in believing that the defendant intended to kill the prosecuting witness, even though death did not ensue, and although the defendant testified that he did not intend to kill him, does not attempt to prescribe the weight to be given to the evidence of the accused, but rather to define and measure the weight and force they would be justified in giving to a legal presumption, and is not erroneous. *Newport v. The jury, in weighing the evidence of defendant, charged with embezzlement, and in determining how far, if at all, it is worthy of credit, may be told to regard, among other things, his intelligence or want of intelligence, and his opportunities for knowledge of business methods. United States v. Kenney, 90 Fed. 257.

In a prosecution for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, in which the defendant testified that he acted as agent for a non-resident dealer who had a right to make sales in original packages, the court may properly state that the failure of the defendant to call his alleged principal as a witness bears upon the credibility of the testimony of the defendant, since it leaves the testimony of the accused unsupported and reflects upon the good faith of his defense. Com. v. Pendergast, 138 Pa. 633, 21 Atl. 12.

In California it is not proper for the court to direct the jury as to the ways and methods by which they shall exercise their exclusive power to weigh the testimony of witnesses; but an instruction that the jury should carefully scrutinize all the testimony in the case, and, in so doing, consider all the circumstances under which each witness has testified, and which enumerates various matters which they are to take into account in weighing the testimony, although outside the proper powers of the court, which should not direct them as to the way in which they shall weigh the testimony of the witnesses and determine the facts, is not prejudicial to the accused, who testified in the action, since it merely tells the jury to do certain things which jurors would evidently do without being so told. People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 60 Pac. 405.

language, so as to give it peculiar emphasis, it is too apt to lead the jury to believe that the court thinks the defendant in the particular case on trial to be unworthy of belief."

In People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520, the trial court, in referring to the declarations under oath made by the defendant as a witness in his own behalf, charged the jury as follows: "In weighing his testimony you are to consider what he has at stake. You are to consider the temptations that may be brought to bear upon a man in his situation to tell a falsehood for the purpose of inducing you to acquit him, or to disagree." The defendant, having been convicted, appealed, and, in reversing the judgment, the court says: "If the question were entirely an open one, we would feel constrained to hold, upon principle, that any instruction at all as to the credibility of any witness, or the weight to be given to his testimony, is violative of § 19 of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides that 'judges shall not charge jurors with respect to matters of fact,' and § 1887 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, referring to a witness, provides that 'the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility.'" It is further intimated that the instruction last above quoted was more restrictive than the charge approved in People v. Cronin, supra. It will thus be seen that the supreme court of California practically condemned the instruction given in People v. Cronin, supra, but felt impelled to follow the rule thus an-

An instruction in a criminal action in which the accused has testified, that the jury "will" take into consideration certain specified matters in determining the credibility of the witnesses, is not erroneous, since "will" has not an imperative force like the word "shall," the use of which, although condemned, has never been held to constitute reversible error. *State v. Where homicide is sought to be justified as committed in self-defense by the testimony of the accused, the instruction to the jury that "you must have something more tangible, more real, more certain than that which is a simple declaration of the party who slays, made in your presence by him as a witness, when he is confronted with a charge of murder. All men would say that,"—is erroneous, as practically depriving him of the benefit of his testimony. Allison v. United States, supra.

A charge which virtually tells the jury that the testimony of the accused, who, in support of his defense of an alibi, swore that he was at a certain place on the day on which the burglary with which he was charged was committed, was not true, but was false, and simply leaves it with the jury to say whether that statement was wilfully false or only inadvertently so, violates the constitutional provision that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact," where the evidence upon the point is not necessarily open to such an interpretation. People v. Lang, 104 Cal. 363, 37 Pac. 1031.

respect to matters of fact, and constitutes reversible error. State v. Addy, 28 S. C. 4, 4 S. E. 814.

So, a charge calculated to lead the jury to the conclusion that the judge has no confidence in the testimony of the accused is a charge on the facts, in violation of the constitutional provision forbidding it, and constitutes reversible error. State v. Caddon, 30 S. C. 609, 8 S. E. 536.

A charge in a homicide case which discusses the question of self-defense, and states that the only testimony bearing upon that question is the testimony of the defendant himself, and which, from the manner in which the testimony is discussed, discloses to the jury that the court puts little or no confidence in the defendant's statements, is a charge upon matters of fact, in violation of the state Constitution. State v. Wyse, 32 S. C. 45, 10 S. E. 612.

A remark by the court, in instructing the jury, that the accused—who was charged with the larceny of a team of horses and a buggy, and who claimed that he met the real thief with the team, who escaped unobserved when the officers appeared—must either have stolen the team himself or have ascertained particulars in reference to the larceny from the thief, and that it was somewhat "significant" that he could have learned so many things from the alleged thief and given him so much advice in addition, in so short a time, does not amount to the expression of an opinion. State v. Young, 67 Vt. 450, 32 Atl. 251.

An instruction to the jury "that they should consider the opportunities the witnesses had for observing what was going on" is not objectionable as cautioning the jury against the testimony of the defendants, where they had the best of opportunities for knowing what took place at the time of the alleged assault with intent to rob, with which they were charged. People v. Blanchard, 136 Mich. 146, 98 N. W. 983.

A charge to the effect that the facts as testified to by the accused are not sufficient to constitute a ground for self-defense under the requirements of the law cannot be logically considered as a reflection on the tesnounced, because of its repeated approvals for nearly a generation.

In Johnson v. United States, 157 U. S. 320, 39 L. ed. 717, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, cited by counsel for the state in the case at bar, the jury were charged as follows: "The defendant goes upon the stand before you, and he makes his statement,—tells his story. Above all things in a case of this kind you are to see whether that statement is corroborated substantially and reliably by the proven facts; if so, it is strengthened to the extent of its corroboration. If it is not strengthened in that way, you are to weigh it by its own inherent truthfulness,—its own inherent proving power that may belong to it." This instruction was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States; timony of the defendant, or a criticism of his credibility as a witness. Hicklin v. Territory, 9 Ariz. 184, 80 Pac. 340.

An instruction that when it is successfully proven that the general reputation of a witness for general moral character is bad, the witness is impeached, and the jury will be warranted in disregarding the testimony of such witness, as unworthy of belief; that the defendants have been witnesses in their own behalf, and are subject to be impeached the same as any other witness, does not erroneously assume that the defendants were impeached, since the use of the expression "when it is successfully proven" is equivalent to saying "if it be successfully proven." State v. Haberle, 72 Iowa, 138, 33 N. W. 461.

So, an instruction advising the jury that they are to determine what weight impeaching evidence shall have is affecting the credibility of defendant as a witness, and what weight shall be given his testimony, and telling them under what circumstances his evidence may not be rejected entirely, is not erroneous as assuming that the defendant has been impeached. State v. Chingren, 105 Iowa, 169, 74 N. W. 946. The court said: Such evidence may affect the credibility of the witness and yet not warrant the rejection of his testimony entirely. Under such circumstances the jury are to say the extent to which his credibility is impaired. The instruction correctly stated the law.

For instruction upon interest as coloring testimony, see VII. b, infra.

III. Instruction singling out testimony of accused generally.

An instruction in relation to the credibility of the defendant, who offered himself as a witness, is not objectionable on the ground that it is not for the court to single out a particular witness and charge the jury as to his credibility. People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191. The court observed: The less abstract the more useful the charge. . . . It seldom happens that the exigencies of a case bring in question the credibility of all the witnesses, and, when they do not, there 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but, as the cause was originally tried in a Federal court, where the rules of the common law prevail, thereby permitting the judge to comment upon the weight of the testimony, no other deduction could well have been made. Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 1, 79, 7 L. ed. 761, 789; Magniac v. Thompson, 7 Pet. 348, 389, 8 L. ed. 709, 723. The conclusion there reached, however, is not controlling in the case at bar, in consequence of our statute prohibiting such method of charging the jury.

In Territory v. Romine, 2 N. M. 114, a similar charge was upheld on the assumption that such an instruction was permissible under the rules of the common law, which, at the time of that trial, had not been changed, but subsequent thereto, and can be no reason why the charge upon that subject should be made so general as to embrace them all. In our judgment such a course would be likely to cast suspicion where none is due, and thus tend to mislead the jury. Hence the judge should confine his charge to those whose credibility has been assailed by counsel, or is clouded by the circumstances of the case.

There is no rule prohibiting the court's mentioning in an appropriate way a particular witness or class of witnesses. Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4.

But, in view of the difficulty in so framing an instruction where the defendant's name is mentioned at all, as not to give his testimony undue prominence either for or against him, it has been suggested that it would be better for trial judges to let him pass with all the other witnesses under the purview of a general charge as to the credibility of all the witnesses, leaving it to the attorneys to call the attention of the jury, in their argument, to any peculiar facts applicable to any particular witness. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 24 S. W. 885.

In Territory v. Romine, 2 N. M. 114, the court intimates that it would be better practice not to name the defendant; but the court does not hold the instruction to be error because the defendant was referred to.

An instruction that, although the law makes the defendant a competent witness, still the jury are the judges of the weight which ought to be attached to the testimony, and, in considering what weight should be given to it, the jury should take into consideration all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, as disclosed by the evidence, and give the defendant's testimony only such weight as they believe it entitled to in view of all the facts and circumstances proven on the trial, is not erroneous as singling out the defendant by naming him. Territory v. Gonzales, 11 N. M. 304, 68 Pac. 925.

In Texas, however, the testimony of an accused person is regarded the same as that of any other witness, and is held to be prior to the hearing of the cause in the supreme court, a statute had been adopted by the legislative assembly of New Mexico, which precluded a court from commenting upon the weight of the evidence. In that case it is intimated that, after the passage of the statute, the giving of such an instruction would have been erroneous. Our statute regulating the giving of instructions was adopted in its present form, December 20, 1865 (Or. Laws 1865, p. 37), and is as follows: "In charging the jury, the court shall state to them all matters of law which it thinks necessary for their information in giving their verdict, but it shall not present the facts of the case, but shall inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact." Bellinger

& C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 139. This section practically prohibits the giving of an instruction as to the weight of the evidence, for, if a court cannot present the facts of a case, it is necessarily precluded from charging the jury in respect to any particular conclusion which might be deduced from a consideration of the testimony.

An early statute of this state prevented a defendant in a criminal action from becoming a witness for or against himself. Section 166, title 1 of chapter 16 of the Criminal Code, as compiled by Matthew P. Deady and Lafayette Lane. This section was amended October 25, 1880 (Or. Laws 1880, p. 28), so as to read, as far as deemed involved herein, as follows: "In the trial of within the rule forbidding the court to sing out the testimony of any witness. For this reason the court should even refuse to instruct the jury that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that the jury are the sole judges of his testimony, and that they should weigh it as they would the testimony of any other witness. Tardy v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 214, 78 S. W. 1076.

For instruction upon interest of accused as singling out defendant, see VII. b, infra.

IV. Instruction as to disregarding testimony of accused.

An instruction that, if the jury are not satisfied that the testimony of the accused is true, then they may disregard it, is correct. Lewis v. State, 88 Ala. 11, 6 So. 755.

In a criminal prosecution where there is a direct conflict between the evidence of the defendant and of the complaining witness and of at least one other witness, statements by the court upon being requested to charge, that, if any witness had wilfully perverted the truth, the jury could disregard the whole of the testimony of such witness, that he did not charge it as matter of law, but that the jury have a right to consider the whole testimony, and further remarking, upon a repetition of the request, that they have a right to do so, but that he cannot instruct them as a matter of law upon the point that they must do so, are not erroneous. People v. Reavey, 38 Hun, 418.

A charge that, if the jury believe that the accused has wilfully sworn falsely as to any material matter in the case, they may, in their discretion, disregard his whole testimony, is properly given. Parham v. State, 147 Ala. 57, 42 So. 1.

But a charge that, if the jury find from the evidence that the defendant has sworn falsely in the case, then it will be their duty to disregard his testimony entirely, is erroneous for failure to hypothesize that the defendant was wilfully false in his evidence with regard to a material fact or facts. Funderburk v. State, 145 Ala. 661, 39 So. 672.

An instruction stating that, if the accused has wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to any fact material to the issue, the jury have the right entirely to disregard his testimony, is not erroneous on the ground that it calls particular attention to the defendant instead of relating to the witnesses generally. McCracken v. People, 209 Ill. 215, 70 N. E. 749.

A charge that if the jury believe that any witness is unworthy of credit, or that any one of them has wilfully sworn falsely to any material fact in the cause, they are at liberty, if they see proper so to do, to disregard the whole or any part of such witness's testimony, does not, where the only witnesses for the defense were the defendants themselves, authorize the jury to reject their testimony arbitrarily. State v. Kelly, 9 Mo. App. 512.

An instruction in reference to the testimony of the accused, that a witness who testifies to a wilful falsehood is not entitled to credit, and that that fact authorizes the jury to disbelieve his entire testimony, does not direct the jury wholly to disregard the defendant's evidence in making up their verdict, and is not erroneous. People v. Petmecky, 99 N. Y. 415, 2 N. E. 145.

But a charge in a criminal case that, if any witness has made statements out of court, different and contradictory from those made in court, then the jury may disregard the whole testimony of such witness if they see proper to do so, is reversible error where the defendant testified in the case, since it would operate on the mind of the average juror as an injunction not to believe anything the defendant said if someone else testified that he, anywhere in his testimony, contradicted anything he had said outside. McDonald v. State (Miss.) 28 So. 750.

An instruction that the jury are bound by the testimony of the accused so far as they believe it true; that, if they believe that what the defendant states on the stand is false, and a story made up for the occasion, it is their duty to disregard it so far as it would, if believed, tend to show his innocence, but that they may give it such weight or examination upon all indictments, complaints, information, and other proceedings before any court . . . against persons accused or charged with the commission of crimes or offenses, the person so charged or accused shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the court." Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 1400. As this alteration was made after the passage of § 139, supra, it would seem, from a construction of such amendment in pari materia with that section, that it had been impliedly amended so as to permit the court to call the attention of the jury to the credibility of a defendant in a criminal action when he appeared as a witness in his own behalf. Our statute, elucidating the general principles of evidence, contains the following clause: "A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be overcome by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character or motives, or by contradictory evidence; and, where the trial is by the jury, they are the exclusive judges of his credibility." Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 695. It has been the practice of courts to give this entire section or the substance thereof in charging juries. Construing this clause together with § 1400, supra, it would further appear that § 695, supra, was also impliedly amended, so as to allow the court as it may, in their judgment, be entitled to as against his innocence, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances in evidence, of which they are the sole judges, leaves the credibility of the defendant as a witness to the exclusive judgment of the jury, and is not erroneous. People v. Callaghan, 4 Utah, 49, 6 Pac. 49.

So, an instruction which tells the jury that, if the testimony of the defendant is convincing, and carries with it a belief in its truth, they may act upon it; if not, then they have the right to reject it, but this does not mean that they have a right arbitrarily to reject it, is not erroneous. People v. Hill, 1 Cal. App. 414, 82 Pac. 398.

It is proper for the court to charge the jury that while the law says that the accused is a competent witness and may testify in his own behalf, and that the jury should not capriciously disregard his testimony, it does not mean that they should believe it, but only that they should consider it, and ascertain, to the best of their judgment, whether it is true; and, if true, that they should act upon it as upon truth from any other source; that, if they should not believe it, they should reject it, and are the sole judges of the truth of the evidence. Harrison v. State, 144 Ala. 20, 40 So. 568.

A charge that the jury must not capriciously reject the testimony of the accused, but must give it the same consideration that they would any other witness, is calculated to mislead, as tending to lead the jury to believe that they are bound to give to the testimony of the defendant as much weight as they would give to that of any other witness, and should not be given. McKee v. State, 82 Ala. 32, 2 So. 451.

An instruction that the accused is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that the jury "have a right to consider his evidence," and are to give it such faith and credit as they believe it entitled to receive, is not objectionable as making it optional with the jury whether they will consider the evidence of the accused. State v. Buffington, 71 Kan. 804, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 154, 81 Pac. 465.

A charge that, if the testimony of the defendant is convincing and carries with it a belief in its truth, the jury "have a right to" act upon it; if not, they have a right to reject it, does not, in effect, direct the jury that it is entirely optional with them whether they should act upon the testimony of the defendant even though they believe in its truth, where they were otherwise told they "must consider all the evidence." State v. Johnny, 29 Nev. 203, 87 Pac. 3.

As to discrediting or disregarding testimony of accused on the ground of the relation of the accused to the case, see VII. a, VII. b, infra.

V. Instruction as to contradiction of accused.

An instruction that, in determining the credibility of the testimony of the accused, the jury should take into consideration the fact, if such is the fact, that he has been contradicted by other witnesses, is not erroneous. Rider v. People, 110 Ill. 11; Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 32 N. E. 431; Miller v. People, 229 Ill. 376, 82 N. E. 391; Com. v. Breyessee, 160 Pa. 451, 40 Am. St. Rep. 729, 28 Atl. 824; Wilkins v. State, 98 Ala. 1, 13 So. 312.

Such a charge is not calculated to induce the jury to conclude that the court believed accused had been contradicted. Moeck v. People, 100 Ill. 242, 39 Am. Rep. 38.

Nor is such an instruction erroneous for failing to declare "if the accused was contradicted by credible witnesses," where there was no effort to impeach or call in question the reputation of witnesses for the people whose evidence contradicted the evidence of the defendant. Higgins v. People, 98 Ill. 510.

An instruction which directs the jury that, in determining the degree of credibility to be accorded to the testimony of the accused, they have a right to take into consideration, among other things, the fact, if it is a fact, that she had been contradicted by other and credible witnesses, is not erroneous on the ground that it authorizes the jury to discredit the defendant as a witness if she was contradicted by other credto inform the jury that a defendant in a criminal action, when he appeared as a witness in his own behalf, is interested in any verdict which they might return.—a fact of which they have knowledge without such declaration. People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802.

An instruction stating that, while the defendant in a criminal action is a competent witness in his own behalf, the jury, nevertheless, have the right to take into consideration his interest in the result of the trial, and all the facts and circumstances of the case, and to give his testimony only such weight as they, in their judgment, think it entitled to,—has been held proper. Smith v. State, 107 Ala. 139, 18 So. 306; Hamilton v. State, 62 Ark. 543, 36 S. W.

ible witnesses. Maguire v. People, 219 Ill. 16, 76 N. E. 67.

A charge that the jury are to take into consideration the fact, if such is the fact, that the accused has been contradicted by other witnesses, is not objectionable as assuming that the accused is contradicted. Hirschman v. People, 101 Ill. 568.

But an instruction informing the jury that, in determining the credibility of any witness, they might take into consideration, among other things, "proof of his having made statements which he denies under oath," is fatal error where the accused was the only witness in his behalf, and had denied making threats attributed to him by a witness for the state, since the instruction contained not only a suggestion of the probable falsity of the defendant's testimony, but it assumes that the discrediting fact that statements which had been made and denied under oath had been proved. Glenn v. State, 64 Miss. 724, 2 So. 109.

The judge's charge to the jury in a criminal case, that there was or might be "a conflict as to material facts between the statements of the accused while testifying in his own behalf, and the statements of the other witnesses, who are telling the truth," and that "then you would have a contradiction that would weigh against the statements of the defendant as coming from such witness," is objectionable in its assumption that the other witnesses whose statements contradicted those of the accused were "telling the truth." Hicks v. United States, 150 U. S. 442, 37 L. ed. 1137, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 144.

An instruction that although the defendant may, on the day of the homicide, have made statements as to the manner of the death of the deceased different from what he testified to on the trial, there is no presumption of law from his doing so that what he testifies to is untrue, encroaches upon the province of the jury to pass upon the credibility of the defendant as a witness in the case. Kent v. State, 53 Fla. 51, 43 So. 773.

Remarks by the court, in ruling upon an objection to the admission in evidence of 1054; State v. Ryan, 113 Iowa, 536, 85 N. W. 812; People v. Calvin, 60 Mich. 113, 26 N. W. 851; Gatliff v. Territory, 2 Okla. 523, 37 Pac. 809; Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145. Under the rule thus announced, the first part of the charge in the case at bar, which was manifestly modeled after § 2447 (2 Thompson Trials), a note to which is as follows: "Approved in State v. Jones, 78 Mo. 280," is supported by authority, though the jury were not instructed to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case, nor informed that they were the exclusive judges of the defendant's credibility. No request, however, appears to have been made to enlarge the instruction in these particulars.

In Chambers v. People, 105 Ill. 409, the letters, that the accused, who was on trial on the charge of receiving stolen goods, "had contradicted herself several times in the record," and "that is the chief reason why I admit those letters in evidence," which were neither retracted nor explained after being objected to, violate the constitutional provision that judges shall not charge jurors with respect to matters of fact. People v. Willard, 92 Cal. 482, 28 Pac. 585.

VI. Instructing as to corroboration of testimony of accused.

The jury may be told that, in determining how far, if at all, the testimony of the accused is worthy of credit, they should regard, among other things, to what extent, if any, he has been corroborated by other evidence in the case. United States v. Kenney, 90 Fed. 257.

After noticing the fact that the accused has been contradicted by other witnesses, the court should instruct that it is the right and also the duty of the jury to take into consideration the fact, if such is the fact, that the accused has been corroborated by other credible evidence. McElroy v. People, 202 Ill. 473, 66 N. E. 1058.

The court may properly instruct the jury that, if they find that the accused has wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to any material fact, they are not bound to believe his evidence any further than it may have been corroborated by other credible evidence. Hirschman v. People, 101 Ill. 568; Gullihier v. People, 82 Ill. 145; Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 32 N. E. 431.

An instruction that, if the jury believe from the evidence that any witness in the case has wilfully sworn falsely on the trial as to any matter or thing material to the issues in the case, then the jury are at liberty to disregard his entire testimony except in so far as it has been corroborated by other evidence or by the facts and circumstances proved on the trial; that the defendant, having gone upon the stand as a witness in his own behalf, subjects himself to all the rules governing the credi-following charge was given: "The court instructs the jury, for the people, that they are not bound to believe the evidence of the defendant in a criminal case, and treat it the same as the evidence of other witnesses, but the jury may take into consideration the fact that he is defendant, and give his testimony such weight as, under all the circumstances, they think it entitled to." In that case it was held that such instruction was calculated to mislead, and was, therefore, erroneous. A similar instruction was also condemned in Sullivan v. People, 114 Ill. 24, 28 N. E. 381, and Hellyer v. People, 186 Ill. 550, 58 N. E. 245.

In State v. Pomeroy, 30 Or. 16, 46 Pac. 797, the jury were instructed as follows: "In this case the defendant and members of his family have given testimony. You have no right to reject the testimony they have given, simply because it comes from a source in which there would be strong motives to give the most favorable coloring possible to the facts on behalf of the defendant, but you have a right to consider, and you should consider, that testimony the same as you would other testimony, taking into account the relationship of the parties and the motives which may induce them to testify." The defendant, having been convicted, appealed, and, in reversing the judgment, it was held that the instruction was erroneous, as an expression of opinion on the motives of the witnesses.

Any person who carefully notices the trial of a cause before a jury must surely observe bility of other witnesses, and that this instruction applies equally to him as well as to any other witness,—states the law correctly and is unobjectionable. State v. Melvern, 32 Wash. 7, 72 Pac. 489.

In a criminal prosecution in which the accused testifies, an instruction relating to the weight and credibility to be given to the testimony of witnesses who, in the judgment of the jury, may have wilfully and corruptly sworn falsely, that the jury are at liberty to reject all of it not corroborated by other testimony, or give it such weight and credit as, in their judgment, from the circumstances, it is entitled to, is not erroneous. State v. Clark (W. Va.) 63 S. E. 402.

An instruction that, if the jury should deem the testimony of the accused untrustworthy, they may disregard it altogether, except such portion of it as may be corroborated by other credible testimony, although not as full and accurate as it should have been, does not constitute reversible error. Padfield v. People, 146 Ill. 660, 35 N. E. 469.

Nor is such an instruction objectionable as directing special attention to the testimony of the defendant himself in his own behalf as being under great suspicion. Ibid.

An instruction that if, after considering all the evidence in the case, the jury find that the accused or any other witness has wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to any fact material to the issue in the case, they have the right entirely to disregard "his" testimony excepting in so far as "his" testimony is corroborated by other evidence or facts and circumstances in evidence, cannot be logically or grammatically considered as informing the jury that, if they find that any witness had committed perjury, they have a right to disregard the uncorroborated testimony of the defendant. Aldrich v. People, 224 Ill. 622, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1149, 115 Am. St. Rep. 166, 79 N. E. 964, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 284.

A charge that if the jury believe that the defendant in a criminal prosecution wilfully swore falsely as to any of the facts in issue in the case, they may disregard all 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his testimony unless corroborated, is not erroneous for failure to limit the falsity of the testimony to material facts, since all facts in issue are undoubtedly material, because the whole case depends upon the facts in issue. Johnson v. People, 94 Ill. 505.

But an instruction that, in determining what weight to give to the evidence of the accused, the jury are not bound to believe his testimony any further than it may be corroborated by other credible evidence in the case, in effect treats the accused as a witness already impeached, and leads the jury to think that he should be corroborated in order to be believed, and should not be given. State v. Hunter, 118 Iowa, 686, 92 N. W. 872. The court observed: There is no case which sustains this doctrine. The one which comes most nearly doing so is Hirschman v. People, supra. But there the right to disbelieve was founded on the premise that the accused had wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to a material fact in issue. That is a very different proposition from the one announced in the instruction now under consideration. The instruction should not have been given.

A charge the general effect of which is to discredit the prisoner as a witness, and to lead the jury to throw out his testimony except where it was corroborated, is erroneous. Com. v. Pipes, 158 Pa. 25, 27 Atl. 839.

An instruction that the testimony of a defendant witness occupies the same attitude as that of an accomplice in crime regarding corroboration in order to be believed, is erroneous. State v. Patterson, 98 Mo. 283, 11 S. W. 728.

An instruction to the jury, on a trial for murder, that if the testimony of defendant, who took the stand as a witness for himself, was corroborated by facts otherwise proved, it was thereby strengthened; if it was not so corroborated, it was still to be considered in and of itself and in the light of "its own inherent proving power," is not erroneous. Johnson v. United States, 157 U. S. 320, 39 L. ed. 717, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614.

the attention which they give to the remarks, gestures, facial expressions, or tones of voice which the judge may adopt, in their evident desire to gain from him some information as to the kind of verdict they think he would expect in the case. Any language, therefore, which might seem even to hint at what the court thought of the merits of a case, ought always to be avoided at a trial of the issue before a jury. Though the judge, in the instruction complained of, said to the jury: "You are not bound to consider the testimony of the defendants as absolutely true . . . and you are to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under, so to speak as to procure his acquittal,"—he seems to leave an implication that it was incumbent upon them to consider the defendants' testimony as false, and for that reason to reject it. Clark v. State, 32 Neb. 246, 49 N. W. 307.

We think the language thus used is not warranted, and hence the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

An instruction which in effect tells the jury that they may believe the testimony of the accused if corroborated, and disbelieve it if contradicted, although faulty is not prejudicial, where defendant's evidence was not only corroborated by other witnesses, but the facts testified to by him were undisputed. State v. Sanders, 106 Mo. 188, 17 S. W. 223.

But a charge that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that it is the duty of the jury to give his testimony such weight as they think it is entitled to in connection with all the evidence, if any, which tends to corroborate his statements, is objectionable, since it requires the jury to weigh his testimony in connection with all the testimony which tends to corroborate it instead of with all the evidence. Dennis v. State, 118 Ala. 72, 23 So. 1002.

VII. Instruction as to relation of accused to case.

a. Fact that he is party.

An instruction which tells the jury, in determining what weight to give the testimony of the accused, to consider the relation that he bears to the case, is not erroneous, since it is what any jury would do in fact. People v. Herrick, 59 Mich. 563, 26 N. W. 767.

An instruction which tells the jury that the fact that the defendant is a party is proper to be taken into consideration by them as affecting his credibility as a witness is properly given. Smith v. State, 118 Ala. 117, 24 So. 55; State v. Moelchen, 53 Iowa, 310, 5 N. W. 186; State v. Zorn, 71 Mo. 415.

So, a charge that, in considering the evidence of the accused, the jury may look to the fact that he is the defendant in the case, in connection with all the other evidence, in determining what credibility they will give to his testimony, is properly given. Smith v. State, 107 Ala. 139, 18 So. 306.

The court may properly charge the jury that, in determining the weight they will give to the defendant's testimony, they should consider, along with all the other circumstances having any bearing on the matter, the fact that he is the defendant. Wilkins v. State, 98 Ala. 1, 13 So. 312; Helms v. United States, 2 Ind. Terr. 605, 52 S. W. 60.

But a charge that the Indiana statute makes it the duty of the court to tell the jury that the fact that the accused is the defendant is a matter to be taken into consideration by the jury in determining what weight they will give to his testimony is incorrect. Hartford v. State, 96 Ind. 461, 49 Am. Rep. 185.

It is not erroneous to instruct the jury that they should consider the fact that the defendant is the prisoner on trial, in weighing his evidence. State v. Morrison, 104 Mo. 638, 16 S. W. 492; State v. Morse, 66 Mo. App. 303.

An instruction that the fact that the accused is the party on trial should be taken into consideration for the purpose of affecting his credibility as a witness is properly given. State v. Sanders, 76 Mo. 35; State v. Mounce, 106 Mo. 226, 17 S. W. 226; State v. Turner, 110 Mo. 196, 19 S. W. 645.

An instruction that, in passing on the evidence in the case, the jury may consider the fact that the accused is the defendant on trial, together with any other fact or circumstance affecting the credit to be given to the testimony of any of the witnesses in the case, although subject to verbal criticism, is not erroneous. State v. Wisdom, 84 Mo. 177.

A charge that the jury, in considering what weight and credibility they will give to the testimony of the accused, should take into consideration, as affecting his credibility, the fact that he is the accused party on trial, is not invasive of the province of the jury. State v. Young, 99 Mo. 666, 12 S. W. 879, second appeal, 105 Mo. 634, 16 S. W. 408.

An instruction that, in weighing the testimony of the accused, the jury have a right to take into consideration his relation to the offense charged in the information, is not erroneous. People v. Resh, 107 Mich. 251, 65 N. W. 99.

Nor is a charge in the language of Mont. Penal Code, § 2442, that the jury, in judging of the credibility of the accused and the weight to be given to his testimony, may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant, and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he is accused, erroneous on the ground that it singles out a particular witness, and directs the attention of the jury to his testimony. State v. DeLea, 36 Mont. 531, 93 Pac. 814. The court said: It is a general rule that the court ought not to single out a particular witness and direct the attention of the jury to his testimony, but the Code, in § 2442, has made an exception to this general rule.

An instruction that, in determining the weight which should be attached to the defendant's testimony in his own behalf, the jury may take into consideration the fact that he is such defendant, is not erroneous, where the court, upon its own motion, instructed the jury that they had no right to disregard the testimony of the defendant on the ground alone that he is the defendant, and stands charged with the commission of a crime. Randall v. State, 132 Ind. 544, 32 N. E. 305.

In Montana it is permissible to instruct the jury that the fact that the accused is the defendant is not of itself sufficient to impeach or discredit his testimony. State v. Metcalf, 17 Mont. 417, 43 Pac. 182.

But in California it is held that a charge that the jury are not permitted under the law to discredit or reject the testimony of the defendant simply on the ground that he is accused and on trial on a criminal charge should not be given, since it would tend to discredit his testimony, and would invade the province of the jury. People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 Pac. 1067.

So, a charge that the jury should not disregard the testimony of the accused simply because he is the defendant should not be given because it invades the province of the jury. Stevens v. State, 139 Ala. 71, 35 So. 122; Dick v. State, 87 Ala. 61, 6 So. 395.

A charge that the jury have no right to disregard the testimony of the defendant on the ground alone that he is the defendant and stands charged with the commission of a crime, but that they should fairly and impartially consider his testimony together with all the other evidence in the case, and if, from all the evidence, they have any reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, they should give him the benefit of that doubt and acquit him, invades the province of the jury, and should not be given. Lang v. State, 42 Fla. 595, 28 So. 856.

An instruction that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that his evidence should not be discarded by the jury for the reason alone that he is the defendant on trial, but that such fact may be considered by the jury in determining the credit to be given to his testimony, tells the jury by implication that the defendant's evidence should be discarded on some ground, but not alone because he is the defendant on trial, and constitutes reversible error. State v. Austin, 113 Mo. 538, 21 S. W. 31. The court said: The jury may consider the fact that the defendant is on trial in weighing his credibility, but they should not be invited to discard his evidence, but to weight it.

This decision was followed in State v. Hobbs, 117 Mo. 620, 23 S. W. 1074, and State v. Miller, 162 Mo. 253, 85 Am. St. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rep. 498, 62 S. W. 692, where similar instructions were given.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to instruct the jury that they should not arbitrarily disregard what the defendant testifies simply because he is the defendant. Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299.

An instruction that the jury have no right to disregard the testimony of the defendants through mere caprice or simply because they are defendants; that the law makes them competent witnesses, and the jury are bound to consider their evidence, and are the sole judges of their credibility, is properly modified by adding, "yet the jury are under no legal obligation to believe them if, from all the facts proved in the case, they think their testimony not reliable." Creed v. People, 81 Ill. 565.

An instruction which in effect tells the jury that it is their duty to keep in mind the fact that accused is the defendant, and that his testimony, for that reason, cannot be taken as of controlling weight unless consistent with all the facts and circumstances in evidence, is erroneous. Bird v. State, 107 Ind. 154, 8 N. E. 14.

But an instruction which, after correctly giving the rules for weighing testimony, advises the jury that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that his testimony should be weighed by the same rules, is not only correct, but in the interest of defendant, since it is an admonition that his evidence should not be cast aside because he is a party, but that it must be weighed by the rules given. State v. Case, 96 Iowa, 264, 65 N. W. 149.

An instruction which tells the jury that, in determining what weight to give defendant's testimony, they "should" consider the fact that he is the party accused and on trial in the cause, is not invasive of the province of the jury because of the use of the word "should" instead of "may." State v. Cook, 84 Mo. 40; State v. Young, 99 Mo. 666, 12 S. W. 879; State v. Bryant, 134 Mo. 246, 35 S. W. 597; State v. Stanley, 123 Mo. App. 294, 100 S. W. 678; State v. Brown, 104 Mo. 365, 16 S. W. 406. In the latter case the court said: Section 4218, Rev. Stat. 1889, provides that the fact that the defendant is the party on trial may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility. When it is shown, however, it is the duty of the jury to consider it. . . . They have no more right to leave it out of consideration entirely, than any other fact admitted in evidence.

A charge that the jury "should" take into consideration the fact, as affecting the credibility of defendant, that he is the accused party on trial, is not objectionable as using the word "should" instead of "might." State v. Renfrow, 111 Mo. 589, 20 S. W. 299.

In charging what credibility and weight are to be given to the testimony of the accused, an instruction that the jury "must" take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant, and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he is accused, is not prejudicially erroneous for failure to use the statutory word "may." State v. Dotson, 26 Mont. 305, 67 Pac. 938.

An instruction that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, "but" that the fact that he is a witness testifying in his own behalf might be considered by the jury, is not objectionable in using the conjunction "but" instead of "and." State v. Miller, 190 Mo. 449, 89 S. W. 377.

b. Interest in result.

A charge that, in considering the testimony of the accused, the jury would be authorized to consider the interest he has in the result of their verdict, is not erroneous. Dryman v. State, 102 Ala. 130, 15 So. 433; Hammond v. State, 147 Ala. 79, 41 So. 761; State v. Nordstrom, 7 Wash. 506, 35 Pac. 382; State v. White, 10 Wash. 611, 39 Pac. 160, 41 Pac. 442; State v. Carey, 15 Wash. 549, 46 Pac. 1060; State v. McCann, 16 Wash. 249, 47 Pac. 443, 49 Pac. 216; Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145.

Another statement of the rule is that the court may properly call the attention of the jury to the interest of the defendant on trial as affecting the question of his credibility. Smith v. State, 118 Ala. 117, 24 So. 55; Felker v. State, 54 Ark. 489, 16 S. W. 663; Blair v. State, 69 Ark. 558, 64 S. W. 948; Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299; Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635; Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 32 N. E. 431; Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 467, 4 N. E. 63; State v. Noeninger, 108 Mo. 166, 18 S. W. 990; State v. Maguire, 113 Mo. 670, 21 S. W. 212; State v. Lingle, 128 Mo. 537, 31 S. W. 20; State v. Hilsabeck, 132 Mo. 348, 34 S. W. 38; State v. Miller, 159 Mo. 113, 60 S. W. 67; State v. Adair, 160 Mo. 391, 61 S. W. 187; State v. Maupin, 196 Mo. 164, 93 S. W. 379; Territory v. Taylor, 11 N. M. 588, 71 Pac. 489; People v. Hess, 8 App. Div. 143, 40 N. Y. Supp. 486; United States v. Kenney, 90 Fed. 257.

An instruction that the fact that the defendant is a witness, testifying in his own behalf, may be considered by the jury in determining the credibility of his testimony, is in conformity with the statute, and is properly given. State v. Maguire, 69 Mo. 197; State v. Jones, 78 Mo. 280; State v. Miller, 93 Mo. 263, 6 S. W. 57; State v. Napper, 141 Mo. 401, 42 S. W. 957; State v. Smith, 164 Mo. 567, 65 S. W. 270.

A charge that, in determining the degree of credit to be given to the testimony of the accused, the jury are "at liberty to consider the great interest which he has in the result," is properly given. Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4; St. Louis v. State, 8 Neb. 405, 1 N. W. 371. In the latter case the court said: It is insisted that the court in effect told the jury they should not credit the testimony of the defendant, given in his own behalf. This is an unjust criticism of the charge. That the prisoner whose life was at stake was vitally interested in the trial cannot be questioned, and it was not error for the court to state as much to the jury. Not only were the jury "at liberty to consider" this interest, but it was their duty to do so in determining the credit to be given to the prisoner's testimony.

An instruction which repeats a caution that the jury, in weighing the credibility of the witness, should consider the interest of the accused in the prosecution, is not reversible error, where the repetition is not of such a character as to prejudice the rights of the accused. Dixon v. State, 46 Neb. 298, 64 N. W. 961.

In Mississippi the rule is established that the trial court has no right to instruct the jury in either civil or criminal cases that they are authorized to take into consideration the interest of a party in determining his credibility.

An instruction that, if the jury believe from the evidence that any witness who has testified in the case has any feeling or interest in the result of the trial, then the jury should consider such feeling or interest, in connection with all the evidence in the case, in determining how far, if at all, they will believe such witness or consider such testimony, constitutes reversible error where the defendant was the only witness in his behalf. Woods v. State, 67 Miss. 575, 7 So. 495.

In Texas it is held that an instruction in a criminal prosecution in which the accused has testified, that, in determining the credibility of the witnesses, the jury may consider their interest in the case, is a charge directly on the weight of the evidence, and constitutes reversible error. Harrell v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 612, 40 S. W. 799; Williams v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 40 S. W. 801; Penny v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 42 S. W. 297; Oliver v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 42 S. W. 554; Shields v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 13, 44 S. W. 844.

An earlier decision had held such a charge not objectionable as directly calling the attention of the jury to the testimony of the defendant. Cockerell v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 585, 25 S. W. 421.

The rule is sometimes stated to be that an instruction that the interest accused has in the case may be considered by the jury in weighing his testimony is not erroneous. Reagan v. United States, 157 U. S. 301, 39 L. ed. 709, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610; Wright v. State, 148 Ala. 596, 42 So. 745; Norris v. State, 87 Ala. 85, 6 So. 371; Wilkins v. State, 98 Ala. 1, 13 So. 312; Brown v. State, 142 Ala. 287, 38 So. 268; Hamilton v. State, 62 Ark. 543, 36 S. W. 1054; Weatherford v. State, 78 Ark. 36, 93 S. W. 61; People v. Wheeler, 65 Cal. 77, 2 Pac. 892; State v. Hossack, 110 Iowa, 194, 89 N. W. 1077; State v. Wiggins, 50 La. Ann. 330, 23 So. 334; State v. McGinnis, 76 Mo. 326; State v. Patterson, 98 Mo. 283, 11 S. W. 728; Davis v. State, 31 Neb. 247, 47 N. W. 854; Johnson v. State, 34 Neb. 257, 51 N. W. 835; Philamalee v. State, 58 Neb. 320, 78 N. W. 625; State v. Hymer, 15 Nev. 51; State v. Hartley, 22 Nev. 342, 28 L.R.A.

33, 40 Pac. 372; State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 512, 6 S. E. 420; Haines v. Territory, 3 Wyo. 168, 13 Pac. 8.

An instruction which tells the jury that, in weighing the testimony of the accused, taken before the examining magistrate and introduced in evidence upon the trial, they have the right to consider the fact that he is the defendant and is interested in the result of the suit, is not erroneous. Gott v. People, 187 Ill. 249, 58 N. E. 293.

An instruction for the people that while the defendant was a witness in his own behalf, yet, in weighing his testimony, the jury have a right to take into consideration his interest in the result, and should apply all the tests applicable to any witness, and may "consider the interest he has in the case and the motive to swear falsely in his own behalf," while not technically accurate, is not of a character to mislead the jury. Kirkham v. People, 170 Ill. 9, 48 N. E. 465. The court said: The purpose of considering the interest of the defendant when he offers himself as a witness in the case is that the jury may consider the influences which will affect his testimony. His interest is the motive which may influence his testimony.

The jury ought to be instructed that, in passing upon the weight to be given to defendant's testimony, they "should" instead of "may" take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant in the case and his interest in the result. State v. Fairlamb, 121 Mo. 137, 25 S. W. 895; State v. Cook, 84 Mo. 49.

Yet an instruction that the jury, in determining the credibility to be accorded to the testimony of the defendant, "should" consider his interest in the result of the trial, in addition to noticing his manner, and taking into consideration the probability of his statements in connection with the other evidence in the case, is not erroneous, although it would be better practice to inform the jury that they "may" or "have a right to" take into consideration the matters mentioned, rather than to state that they "should" do so. Younger v. State, 12 Wyo. 24, 73 Pac. 551.

An instruction which in effect tells the jury that, in ascertaining the extent of the credibility of the defendant, it is proper to consider the situation in which he is placed, and that they should give proper weight and effect to all of his evidence if they are convinced of its truth, or so much thereof as, in their best judgment, is entitled to credit, is not erroneous. State v. Slingerland, 19 Nev. 135, 7 Pac. 280; Bulliner v. People, 95 Ill. 394; Bressler v. People, 117 Ill. 422, 8 N. E. 62; Wilson v. United States, 162 U. S. 613, 40 L. ed. 1090, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895.

It is not error for the court to remind the jury of the defendant's particular personal interest in the trial, provided he refrains from intimating or suggesting the degree of weight to be given to it. Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4.

After telling the jury that the interest of the defendant in the result of the prosecution should be considered by them in determining the credibility of his testimony, a further instruction that "when the witnesses appear to be equally capable in every other respect, the one who appears to have the greater interest in the result of the case is to have the less weight of the two," invades the province of the jury. Lee v. State, 74 Wis. 45, 41 N. W. 960.

An instruction that a wise rule, which juries may adopt for their guidance when there is a conflict of testimony between the witnesses, is to give credence to the testimony of that witness or those witnesses who have the least inducement, through interest or other motives, to testify falsely, invades the province of the jury, and constitutes reversible error. Schutz v. State, 125 Wis. 452, 104 N. W. 90.

An instruction that the jury, in determining what weight, if any, they will give the testimony of the accused, have the right to consider his interest in the result of the prosecution, and that what he has testified to against his interest, if anything, is to be taken as true, and what he testifies to in his favor is to be given only such weight as the jury believe, from all the evidence in the case, it is entitled to, is not objectionable on the ground that it directs the jury that defendant's statements against his interest as a witness at the trial are to be taken as true. State v. Brooks, 99 Mo. 137, 12 S. W. 633. The court said: It is difficult to discern how a defendant could be prejudiced by an instruction directing the jury to take any part of his testimony as true.

An instruction that the jury have a right, in determining what weight to give to the evidence of the accused, to consider his interest in the case and the temptation to shield himself from the consequences of crime, does not erroneously assume that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged, or deny him the presumption of innocence which the law creates, where the jurors were further instructed that the defendant was presumed to be innocent until the evidence should convince them, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he was guilty. State v. Harris, 97 Iowa, 407, 66 N. W. 728.

An instruction that defendant is a competent witness in her own behalf, and that the jury should take her testimony into consideration and give it such weight as they may believe it entitled to, and that, in passing upon her testimony and weighing her statements, they may take into consideration the fact that she is the defendant, and her interest in the result of the case, is not objectionable on the ground that it comments on the testimony of the defendant, and is in conformity with the terms of the statute authorizing one on trial on a criminal charge to testify in his own behalf. State v. Ihrig, 106 Mo. 267, 17 S. W. 300.

Under the statutes of Oregon, providing that the credit to be given to the testimony of the accused is to be left solely to the jury under the instructions of the court; that the jury are the judges of the effect or value of evidence except where it is by law declared to be conclusive; and that the credibility of a witness who has an interest in the event of the suit may be drawn in question,—the trial court is authorized to instruct the jury as to those particulars in which the evidence is to be declared conclusive, to advise them that the witness is presumed to speak the truth, but that such presumption may be overcome by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, by evidence affecting his character or motive, by contradictory evidence, or by his having an interest in the event of the prosecution, the jury to be the exclusive judges of his credibility. State v. Clements, 15 Or. 249, 14 Pac. 410.

In State v. Swain, 68 Mo. 605, it is said that a jury should be told that a defendant testifying in his own behalf in a criminal case has as much credibility attached to his testimony as if testifying in a similar manner in a civil one.

But in State v. Cooper, 71 Mo. 436, it was held that a similar instruction was properly refused. In support of this holding the court remarked: In a criminal proceeding the defendant's status as a witness is the same as that of a party to a civil suit who becomes a witness for himself; but it cannot be declared, as a matter of law, that his testimony in his own behalf is entitled to the same credit as if he were testifying in a civil suit in his own behalf. The credit of a witness testifying for himself in a criminal cause is to be determined by the jury, as in a civil suit, by the demeanor of the witness, the character of his testimony, and the magnitude of his interest in the event; but it is not a correct proposition of law that he is entitled to the same credit, when testifying in his own behalf in a criminal cause involving his liberty or his life, as if he were testifying for himself in a civil suit involving but a trifling sum of money. Nothing appears in the opinion of the court in State v. Swain, 68 Mo. 616, on this subject, but the following paragraph: "Relative to the testimony of defendants themselves, we do not think that the instruction asked for them on that point should have been given. But we do think that the jury should have been told that a defendant testifying in his own behalf in a criminal case has as much credibility attached to his testimony as if testifying in a similar manner in a civil one." I do not know exactly what that paragraph means, but presume that the court meant that when he comes upon the witness stand his status is the same as if testifying for himself in a civil cause. The court certainly did not mean that, as a matter of law, one testifying to save his life was under no greater temptation to swear falsely than one testifying to recover or avoid the payment of an insignificant sum of money. It should not be declared, as a legal proposition, that one testifying for himself in a civil cause involving a thousand dollars has as much credibility attached to his testimony as if testifying in a case involving five dollars.

An instruction that a defendant in a criminal prosecution is ordinarily entitled to the same credit as a party in an important civil suit should not be given. Murphy v. State, 15 Neb. 383, 19 N. W. 489.

Interest as coloring testimony.

An instruction that, in determining the credit to be given to the testimony of the accused, the jury may consider the very great interest which he must have and feel in the result of the case, and the effect which a verdict would have upon him, and determine to what extent, if at all, such interest may color his testimony or affect his credibility, is not erroneous, where there is no animadversion upon the testimony which he has given in the case. Prior v. Territory (Ariz.) 89 Pac. 412; Halderman v. Territory, 7 Ariz. 120, 60 Pac. 876.

A remark of the trial judge to the jury that the defendant had every interest to falsify if that would secure immunity to him is not prejudicial, since every member of the jury knew that fact. People v. Kiernan, 3 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 247.

Nor is an instruction reversible error which, in referring to the testimony of the accused, suggests the interest that he has in the result of the trial, and the inducements and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation, since it only undertakes to lay down for the guidance of the jury a matter that they would be apt to know about and act upon without any such instruction. People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Cal. 904.

A charge that, in determining whether the defendant has told the truth and all the truth, it will be proper for the jury to consider the fact that he is the defendant, and that the greatest possible temptation is presented to him to testify in his own favor if he is really guilty, although not commended, was held not erroneous. Territory v. Romine, 2 N. M. 114.

An instruction that it is proper for the jury to consider whether the interest of the accused may not affect his credibility and color his testimony is properly given. People v. Knapp, 71 Cal. 1, 11 Pac. 793; People v. Faulke, 96 Cal. 20, 30 Pac. 837; People v. Hitchcock, 104 Cal. 482, 38 Pac. 198.

A charge that the jury should consider the situation under which the accused gave his testimony, the consequences to him from the result of the trial, and the inducements and temptations "which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation," is not erroneous. People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191; People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142; People v. O'Neal, 67 Cal. 378, 7 Pac. 790; People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470; People v. Curry, 103 Cal. 548, 37 Pac. 503; State v. Streeter, 20 Nev. 403, 22 Pac. 758.

Such a charge was reluctantly approved in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 Pac.

45. The court said: This instruction received its first sanction from courts acting under Constitutions which had no such inhibition as that found in art. 6, § 19, providing that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, and never ought to have been approved here; but, as the provision of the Constitution referred to is the same as that of the Constitution of 1879, under which there were decisions holding it was not error so to charge the jury, the construction which was placed upon it by those decisions has become a part of the provision itself, and we are not at liberty to depart from it. As a slight change in the phraseology of the instruction, however, is liable to be considered as going beyond the limits of what has been approved, it would be a safer course, and one which would work no injustice to the people, if it were entirely omitted from the instructions asked and given on behalf of the prosecution.

In People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 215, 72 Pac. 899, the court again felt constrained to say concerning this charge, as it had theretofore said in People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520, that it is difficult logically to attribute the giving of any instruction whatever on the subject of defendant's testimony to anything else than a purpose expressly to disparage a witness before a jury,—the very thing that the court has no authority to do, in view of our constitutional provision. Justice would be more thoroughly accomplished if no such instruction were given, and the credibility of the defendant were left entirely to the jury, as this court has often said.

If the instruction referring to the temptation an accused person is under to color his testimony is of such a nature as to disparage his evidence, it is erroneous.

The court should not inform the jury that, in looking at the testimony of the accused, they must remember that it is the testimony of an accused man who has a powerful motive to swear himself out of the charge, and that, while they are not to disbelieve him merely because he is in that situation, still they should not shut their eyes to the fact that he has that motive. People v. Lang, 104 Cal. 363, 37 Pac. 1031.

An instruction which tells the jury that, in weighing the testimony of the accused, they are to consider what he has at stake and the temptations that may be brought to bear upon a man in his situation to tell a falsehood for the purpose of inducing the jury to acquit him or to disagree, constitutes reversible error. People v. Van Ewan, supra.

A charge that where the defendant offers himself as a witness it is proper to take into consideration, in determining his credibility, the consequences, inducements, and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation, is reversible error. People v. Maughs, 140 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187.

The giving of an instruction calling the special attention of the jury to the situation of the defendant and the manner in which he would be affected by the verdict and informing them that they should consider this in determining the weight to be given his statements and the likelihood of his coloring his testimony, is prejudicial error. People v. Borrego, 7 Cal. App. 613, 95 Pac. 381.

A charge that one on trial for murder has such an interest in the result of the case as might cause a person to make statements to influence a jury in passing upon the case that would not be governed by the truth tends to discredit the testimony of the accused, and is improper. Hicks v. United States, 150 U. S. 442, 37 L. ed. 1137, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 144.

An instruction that it is proper for the jury to consider whether the position and interest of the accused may not affect his credibility or color his testimony is erroneous. State v. Webb, 6 Idaho, 428, 55 Pac. 892.

A charge that "there is, in every criminal case, a greater or less temptation for a defendant to testify falsely in his favor," is clearly erroneous. State v. Johnson, 16 Nev. 36.

An instruction that the jury should receive the testimony of the accused with great caution, for when one is being tried for a capital offense the temptation to pervert or distort the facts in favor of himself is very great, constitutes reversible error. State v. Vasquez, 16 Nev. 42.

An instruction that the jury are to consider the fact that defendant is the accused person, testifying in his own behalf, and are not bound to consider his testimony as absolutely true, nor as equal to the testimony of disinterested witnesses, but are to bear in mind that he speaks in his own behalf, to discharge himself of a criminal accusation, and they are to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under so to speak as to procure his acquittal, is erroneous as implying that the jury must consider the defendant's testimony as false, and reject it for that reason. State v. Bartlett, 50 Or. 440, 93 Pac. 243.

A statement in the charge of the court, when speaking on the subject of the credit to be given to several witnesses, that the jury "must bear in mind the tendency on the part of the guilty when accused of crime, to fabricate some story or stories which they think may effect their acquittal," may have caused the jury to understand the statement as referring to the defendant, and as casting upon him the imputation of guilt, and is reversible error. State v. Hoy, 83 Minn. 286, 86 N. W. 98.

An instruction in a criminal case in which the defendant has testified in his own behalf, that his testimony is subject to the usual tests of credibility as other interested witnesses, but that "one interested will not usually be as honest and candid as one not so," invades the province of the jury, and is erroneous. Greer v. State, 53 Ind. 420; Veatch v. State, 56 Ind. 584, 20 Am. Rep. 44.

Discrediting or disregarding testimony.

An instruction given in a criminal prosecution in which the accused has testified, that, if a witness is interested in the result of the prosecution, this tends to discredit his testimony, constitutes reversible error. Pratt v. State, 56 Ind. 179.

The court should not instruct the jury to bear in mind whatever interest the accused has in the case, as to whether his testimony is true, and that it is the duty of the jury to consider the interest of any witness in the case as to whether his testimony is true, since it tends to lead the jury to believe that the court did not give any credence to the testimony of the accused because of his great interest, and that he desired to impress upon them that they should not give it any credence for the same reason. Hampton v. State, 50 Fla. 55, 39 So. 421.

Nor should the court charge the jury that the defendant is most deeply interested in their determination, and that they would be warranted in discrediting his testimony so far as it is not substantiated or corroborated by other testimony. Com. v. Pipes, 158 Pa. 25, 27 Atl. 839.

The court should not, in its charge, place too much stress upon the interest of the accused in the case, or refer to it in a manner calculated to disparage his testimony. Clark v. State, 32 Neb. 246, 40 N. W. 367.

That the accused is an interested party is a fact that the jury may consider in weighing his testimony, and it is proper to instruct them that they may exercise that right; but it is not proper so to instruct them as to impose a consideration of his interest as a duty, and thereby cast discredit upon his testimony in advance. Bird v. State, 107 Ind. 154, 8 N. E. 14.

An instruction that the accused testifies as an interested witness and from an interested standpoint, and, as such, the jury should consider his testimony with all the surrounding circumstances developed by the evidence, and give the testimony such weight, in connection with other evidence in the case, as they think it entitled to, and no more, is not objectionable as throwing discredit on the testimony of the witness. State v. Sterrett, 71 Iowa, 386, 32 N. W. 387.

A charge that, in judging of the credibility of the defendant and the weight to be given to his testimony, the jury may take into account the fact that he is especially interested in the result of the action of their deliberations, and that they may give such testimony only such weight and credit as they think it fairly entitled to receive under all the circumstances of the case, and in view of the special interest of the witness in the result of the action, does not cast discredit upon the defendant's testimony. Faulkner v. Territory, 6 N. M. 464, 30 Pac. 905.

An instruction telling the jury that they might take into consideration defendant's interest in the result of the trial as affecting his credibility as witness is not erroneous, as disparaging the standing of the witness in his own behalf. Keating v. State, 67 Neb. 560, 93 N. W. 980.

A charge that, in passing upon the credibility of a witness, they may consider "the interest he may have in the result of the case," does not in effect tell the jury that he should be disbelieved because of his "interest." Territory v. Leyba (N. M.) 47 Pac. 718.

An instruction that defendant's testimony is to be treated the same as if he were not a party and were not interested, but that, in weighing the whole evidence, the jury may consider the interest, prejudice, or bias of any witness who may have testified in the case, does not unfavorably comment upon the defendant's testimony. State v. Wells, 111 Mo. 533, 20 S. W. 232.

A charge that the jury may consider the interest of the accused in the result of their verdict as affecting his credibility does not tend to discredit his testimony, where the jury are further told not to disregard the testimony of any witness, and that the weight to be given to the testimony of any witness is a matter solely within their province. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 24 S. W. 885; Jones v. State, 61 Ark. 88, 32 S. W. 81.

An instruction that the jury have the right, in determining the credibility to be accorded to the testimony of the defendant, to consider his interest in the result of the trial, does not improperly disparage his testimony, where a similar instruction, applicable to all the witnesses, was given. Younger v. State, 12 Wyo. 24, 73 Pac. 551.

But a charge as to the credibility of an interested witness, given in a criminal prosecution, is erroneous although the accused was not the only witness on his own behalf, where he was the only one interested in the result of the jury's verdict in any proper sense, so that the instruction unmistakably marked him for discredit by the jury. Townsend v. State (Miss.) 12 So. 209.

An instruction that jurors should, in every instance, consider the testimony of a defendant with great caution, invades the province of the jury, and is erroneous and prejudicial. State v. Johnson, 16 Nev. 36.

It is erroneous, as constituting a charge upon the weight of evidence, to advise the jury that it is their duty to weigh the testimony of the accused carefully, and to scrutinize the same with great caution. Thomas v. State, 61 Miss. 60.

An instruction that it is the duty of the jury, in passing upon the evidence of the accused, to scrutinize his evidence with great caution, considering his interest in the result of the verdict, and, after so considering, to give it such weight as they deem proper, is erroneous, since, if they find the witness to be credible, and that he has sworn the truth, his testimony should have the same weight as if he were not interested. State v. McDowell, 129 N. C. 523, 39 S. E. 840; State v. Holloway, 117 N. C. 730, 23 S. E. 168; State v. Graham, 133 N. C. 645, 45 S. E. 514; State v. Collins, 118 N. C. 1203, 24 S. E. 118.

An instruction that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused as true, but are to consider whether it is true and made in good faith or only for the purpose of avoiding conviction, has been upheld. Blair v. State, 69 Ark. 558, 64 S. W. 948; State v. Walker, 133 Iowa, 489, 110 N. W. 925; Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299.

A charge that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused as true, but are to consider whether it is true and made in good faith or only for the purpose of avoiding conviction, does not tend to discredit his testimony, where the jury are further told not to disregard the testimony of any witness, and that the weight to be given to the testimony of any witness is a matter solely within their province. Vaughan v. State and Jones v. State, supra.

An instruction that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused as true is not erroneous as casting discredit in the minds of the jury upon his testimony, where they were further told that they were not at liberty to disregard the testimony of the defendant, but must give it due consideration, and determine whether or not his statements were true. McIntosh v. State, 151 Ind. 251, 51 N. E. 354.

A charge that the jury are not required "blindly" to receive the testimony of the defendant as true, but the jury are fully and fairly to consider whether it is true and "made in good faith," is not erroneous, since the use of the word "blindly" implies no disbelief by the court. Carleton v. State, 43 Neb. 373, 61 N. W. 699.

But an instruction that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused as true, but are to consider whether it is true and made in good faith or only for the purpose of avoiding conviction, is calculated to disparage the testimony of the accused, and constitutes reversible error. Donner v. State, 72 Neb. 263, 117 Am. St. Rep. 789, 100 N. W. 305. This case is distinguishable from the preceding one on the ground that the instruction there considered did not go to the extreme length of suggesting that the testimony of the accused might have been given in bad faith and for the purpose of avoiding a conviction.

An instruction that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused person as true, but are to consider whether it is true and made in good faith or only for the purpose of avoiding conviction, places the defendant in a different class from that of the other witnesses, and lays down the duty of the jury to scrutinize his testimony in a way that tends to discredit him, and goes beyond the province of the court. State v. White, 10 Wash. 611, 39 Pac. 160, 41 Pac. 442.

But, on the other hand, it has been held that a charge that the jury are not required to receive blindly the testimony of the accused as true, but are to consider whether it is true and made in good faith or only for the purpose of avoiding conviction, is not 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

objectionable as making the defendant a mark for suspicion. since, as the instruction relates to the weighing of the evidence of the accused, it, of necessity, applies to the defendant alone. State v. Mecum, 95 Iowa, 433, 64 N. W. 286.

The one isolated fact of the interest of the accused, however great, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to authorize the jury to disregard his evidence.

A charge that, in considering the defendant's testimony and what weight they may give to it, it is the duty of the jury to remember that he is the defendant, and interested in the result of the verdict, and that they may, for this reason, if they think it sufficient, entirely disregard his testimony if it is in conflict with the other evidence in the case, is erroneous. Allen v. State, 87 Ala. 107, 6 So. 370.

An instruction that, because of the interest of the accused in the result of the verdict, the jury may arbitrarily reject his evidence and refuse to consider it, is reversible error. Townsend v. State, supra.

It is reversible error to instruct the jury that, in weighing the testimony of the accused, the jury should consider the interest he has in the result, and that they may disregard his testimony altogether. Buckley v. State, 62 Miss. 705.

A charge that the jury should consider all the evidence, and that they should not ignore the testimony of the defendant merely because he had a vital interest in the outcome of the case is not erroneous. State v. Ames, 90 Minn. 183, 96 N. W. 330.

An instruction that the jury have the right to and should take into consideration the fact that the defendant is on trial, charged with an offense, and an interested witness, yet that this should not cause them to disregard his testimony, is properly given. State v. Ryan, 113 Iowa, 536, 85 N. W. 812.

A charge that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that the jury may consider his testimony, but, in determining what weight and credit they will give it, they may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant on trial, and interested in the result of the trial, is not erroneous as directing the jury to ignore the testimony of the defendant. State v. Brown (Mo.) 115 S. W. 967.

An instruction that the persons on trial are competent witnesses, but that the fact that they are the defendants on trial may be taken into consideration by the jury as well as their interest in the result of the trial, in determining the weight, "if any," that should be given to their testimony, is not reversible error where the jury were also advised that each of the defendants is a competent witness to testify in his own behalf and in behalf of his codefendant, and that their evidence cannot be disregarded because they are the defendants and stand charged with the commission of a crime, but should be fairly and impartially weighed and considered, together with all the other testimony in the case. State v. Taylor, 134 Mo. 109, 35 S. W. 92.

An instruction that defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf and his testimony is to be weighed by the same rules that govern the testimony of other witnesses, but, in passing upon the weight to be given his testimony, they may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant in the case, and his interest in the result of the trial, is not rendered erroneous by adding that they "are not to reject his testimony if believed to be true, simply because he is the defendant." State v. Summar, 143 Mo. 220, 45 S. W. 254. The court said: This clause was inserted out of abundant caution, and we can discover nothing harmful in it.

A charge that the jury should not capriciously reject the testimony of the accused simply because he is interested, but that, unless they have good reason to believe, under all the circumstances, that he has sworn falsely, then they should believe his testimony and consider it along with all the other testimony in the case in making up their verdict, should not be given, since it invades the province of the jury in instructing them as to what they should believe. Bodine v. State, 129 Ala. 106, 29 So. 926.

Treating testimony of accused like that of other witnesses.

The court may properly instruct the jury to treat the testimony of the accused like the testimony of any other witness, but that they may consider the great interest which he must feel in the result of the trial. People v. Knapp, 71 Cal. 1, 11 Pac. 793; People v. Faulke, 96 Cal. 20, 30 Pac. 837; People v. Calvin, 60 Mich. 113, 26 N. W. 851; People v. Crowley, 102 N. Y. 234, 6 N. E. 384; Alexis v. United States, 63 C. C. A. 502, 129 Fed. 60.

And an instruction that the jury should weigh the testimony of the accused as they would that of any other witness, and may take into consideration his interest in the result of the trial, is not erroneous. Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 467, 4 N. E. 63, 5 N. E. 711; State v. Weeden, 133 Mo. 70, 34 S. W. 473; State v. Dilts, 191 Mo. 665, 90 S. W. 782; Housh v. State, 43 Neb. 163, 61 N. W. 571; Gatliff v. Territory, 2 Okla. 523, 37 Pac. 809; State v. Tarter, 26 Or. 44, 37 Pac. 53.

The accused is not entitled to have his testimony regarded as the evidence of a disinterested witness.

An instruction that the jury should give the same weight to the defendant's testimony as they would give to any other witness should not be given. People v. Hiltel, 131 Cal. 577, 63 Pac. 919; People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 Pac. 228.

An instruction that the evidence of the accused is to be taken just the same as that of any other witness in the case, and believed by the jury as they would believe any other witness in the case, according as they may regard it credible; that the fact that the defendant is the accused in the case raises no presumption or implication against the credibility of his testimony, should not be 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

given, since it would tend to mislead the jury into the idea that they must lend the same credence to the testimony of the accused as to that of any disinterested witness, notwithstanding his deep interest in the result of the trial. Blanton v. State, 52 Fla. 12, 41 So. 789.

An instruction that the jury are to take into consideration the defendant's appearance, his manner of testifying, the reasonableness of his story, and above all are to take into consideration the fact that he is the accused in the case, is not erroneous in using the words "above all," since the accused is not entitled to have his evidence regarded as the evidence of a disinterested witness. State v. Fiske, 63 Conn. 388, 28 Atl. 572.

An instruction that formerly a man interested in a case, civil or criminal, was not allowed to testify at all; that the experience of the world seemed to demonstrate satisfactorily to the lawmakers that a man who was interested directly, even where money was involved, ought not to be heard, and especially that criminals, persons charged with crime ought not to be heard at all; but the modern opinion is the other way; they have a right to be heard and have their testimony submitted to the consideration of twelve men who are supposed, from their experience in the affairs of mankind, to give it proper weight and no more, but they do not stand in the same position as a witness who is entirely disinterested,—although just on the verge of error, is not erroneous. People v. Ferry, 84 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 33.

A charge that while the defendant and others jointly indicted with him are allowed to testify, their testimony is not given the same effect as witnesses unattended by indictment or men not charged, if not error, is at least on the verge of error. People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802.

An instruction given at the instance of the people, that the jury are not bound to believe the evidence of the defendant in a criminal case and "treat it the same as the evidence of other witnesses," but that the jury may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant, and give his testimony such weight as, under all the circumstances, they think it entitled to, is misleading and erroneous, since the fact that the witness is the defendant charged with the crime, although sometimes requiring his evidence to be treated differently from that of other witnesses whom the jury believe, does not require his evidence to be treated differently from that of other witnesses whom they disbelieve, so that the only difference between this and other evidence is not in the way in which it shall be treated, but, in the credence that shall be given to it. Chambers v. People, 105 Ill. 409.

So, a charge that the jury are not bound to believe the evidence of the accused, "nor are they bound to treat his testimony the same as the testimony of other witnesses," but they may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant, and his interest in the result of the case as such, and give his testimony such weight as, under all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, they may think it entitled to, is calculated to mislead the jury, and is erroneous. Sullivan v. People 114 Ill. 24, 28 N. E. 381.

But an instruction that the jury are not bound to treat the testimony of the defendant the same as the testimony of other witnesses constitutes reversible error. Hellyer v. People, 186 Ill. 550, 58 N. E. 245.

And an instruction telling the jury that while the defendants are competent witnesses in their own behalf, the jury are not bound to believe their evidence and treat it the same as that of other witnesses, is erroneous. Lambert v. People, 34 Ill. App. 637. The holding in the last two cases is based upon the ground that the instructions given are in conflict with Chambers v. People, supra.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to instruct the jury that they should give the defendant's testimony the same impartial consideration that they accord to the testimony of other witnesses. Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299; Henry v. People, 198 Ill. 162, 65 N. E. 120.

An instruction that the jury have the right to take into consideration the interest of the defendant in the result of the case as affecting his credibility does not direct them to test the testimony of the accused by a more rigid rule than that which is applicable to other witnesses. McIntosh v. State, 151 Ind. 251, 51 N. E. 354.

The jury should not be directed to test the credibility of the accused by any different standard than that applied to the testimony of other witnesses. Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145.

An instruction that the jury, in considering the weight of the testimony of the accused have the right to bear in mind his interest in the result of the trial and everything bearing upon his credibility, and then give his evidence such weight as they believe it entitled to receive, should be qualified by a further instruction that considerations of interest, appearance, manner, etc., apply to the accused in common with all other witnesses. Schutz v. State, 125 Wis. 452, 104 N. W. 90.

An instruction that the testimony of the defendant should not be received blindly as true is not erroneous, as directing them to test his credibility by any different standard than that which should be applied to the testimony of the other witnesses, where the jury were previously advised that the accused was a competent witness in his own behalf, that the credibility of his testimony was a matter exclusively for them to determine, and that, in doing so, they had a right to take into account his interest in the result of the case. Porter v. People, 31 Colo. 508, 74 Pac. 879.

A charge that the jury may take into consideration, among other things, the interest of the accused in the case, and that they should consider his testimony and determine whether it was true or not, is not objectionable as not requiring the jury to treat his testimony the same as that of others. Waller v. People, 209 Ill. 284, 70 N. E. 681.

But an instruction that the jury are to treat the accused, who testified as a witness in her own behalf, the same as any other witness, and subject her to the same tests, and only the same tests, "except as far as relates to her interest," as are legally applied to other witnesses, authorizes the jury to apply a different rule to the testimony of the accused from that which they applied to the testimony of other witnesses when they should undertake to consider her interest, and is erroneous. Schultz v. People, 210 Ill. 196, 71 N. E. 405.

Nor should the jury be instructed that the testimony of the accused is to be weighed like the testimony of other witnesses in the case, provided it is corroborated by other unimpeached testimony, since it is a charge as to the weight to be given certain testimony, and is an invasion by the court of the special province of the jury. People v. Piereson, 2 Idaho, 76, 3 Pac. 688.

A charge that the testimony of the defendant should be weighed the same as that of any other witness is not erroneous, although the defendant, who offered to testify, was not permitted to answer the questions propounded to him by his counsel. State v. Ulsemer, 24 Wash. 657, 64 Pac. 800.

Instruction singling out defendant.

In some jurisdictions an instruction as to the interest of the accused in the result of the trial is not objectionable as singling out his testimony, while in others it is regarded as ill-advised, prejudicial, or as invasive of the province of the jury to thus call special attention to the fact of interest.

An instruction that the jury have the right to take into consideration the situation and interest of the accused in the result of their verdict, and all the circumstances which surround him, and give to his testimony only such weight as, in their judgment, it is fairly entitled to, is not prejudicial by thus directing the attention of the jury specially to him. State v. Melvern, 32 Wash. 7, 72 Pac. 489.

An instruction that the jury are the judges of the weight which ought to be attached to the testimony of the defendants, and, in considering what weight should be given it, the jury should take into consideration all the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, as disclosed by the evidence, and give the defendant's testimony such weight as they believe it entitled to in view of all the facts and circumstances proved on the trial, and of his interest in the result, is not objectionable as singling out the accused from the body of the witnesses for comment. Haines v. Territory, 3 Wyo. 167, 13 Pac. 8. The court said: It is conceded that the instruction contains nothing but sound legal propositions, and the only complaint made is that defendants were singled out from the body of the witnesses for comment. We do not think the court erred in giving the instruction as it did.

So, an instruction which informs the jury that the accused testifies as an interested witness and from an interested standpoint, and that they should consider his testimony as such, is not erroneous as singling out the accused, where, in the same connection, they were advised that the accused was a competent witness, and that his evidence was to be considered in connection with the other evidence and circumstances surrounding the case, and given such weight as the jury might think it entitled to. State v. Bursaw, 74 Kan. 473, 87 Pac. 183.

It is not reversible error to instruct the jury that, in determining what weight they will give the testimony of the defendant, they should take into consideration the interest he has in the result of the suit, etc. Helms v. United States, 2 Ind. Terr. 605, 52 S. W. 60. The court said: While we find no reversible error in this charge, we think the better practice, instead of singling out the defendant and giving the jury the rule by which his testimony is to be measured, is to lay down the rule as to the testimony of all the witnesses, including that of the defendant.

It is error for the court, after instructing the jury that, as a witness, the defendant is to be judged as other witnesses are judged and weighed, to modify the instruction by adding that, in determining the credibility of the defendant, his interest in the issue involved is to be considered, since it singles out of the defendant as a witness, and invades the province of the jury. Mueley v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 155, 18 S. W. 411, 19 S. W. 915.

A charge to the jury to take into consideration the interest a witness may have in the result of the trial is erroneous where the accused was the only witness as to the facts of the alleged crime, in his own behalf. Smith v. State, 90 Miss. 111, 122 Am. St. Rep. 313, 43 So. 465. The court remarked: The charge would have been no stronger if it had called his name. His testimony should not be so hampered by such express reference.

A general instruction as to the credibility of witnesses is not objectionable as singling out the defendant.

A charge to the jury that, in considering the weight and effect to be given to the testimony of witnesses, the jurors have the right, among other things, to "consider the consequences resulting to the witness, if any, from the result of the trial," is not open to the criticism that it singles out the defendant. People v. Botkin (Cal. App.) 98 Pac. 801.

So, an instruction that, in passing upon the credibility of a witness, they may consider "the interest he may have in the result of the case." Territory v. Leyba (N. M.) 47 Pac. 718.

An instruction given in a criminal prosecution in which the defendant has testified in his own behalf, that, in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of the different witnesses, the jury are authorized to consider the interest of any of the witnesses in the result of the suit, does not erroneously single out the defendant, and call special attention to his interest in the case. Territory v. Livingston (N. M.) 84 Pac. 1021.

An instruction that, in deciding which of the testimony is entitled to the greater credibility and weight, the jury may consider the interest, apparent bias or prejudice, if any, of the witnesses, as well as their manner of testifying, is not objectionable as calculated to call attention to the interest of the accused, who was a witness on his own behalf. McGrath v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 413, 34 S. W. 127, 941.

A charge which applies to the testimony of the accused the same tests applicable to other witnesses does not improperly single out his evidence.

An instruction that the credibility of the accused is to be tested by and subjected to the same tests as are legally applied to any other witness, and, in determining the degree of credibility that shall be accorded to his testimony, the jury have a right to take into consideration the fact that he is interested in the result of the prosecution, does not give undue prominence to the testimony of the accused. Hirschman v. People, 101 Ill. 568.

Nor is an instruction which tells the jury that the accused is a competent witness in his own behalf, and, in laying down the rule by which evidence is to be weighed, subjects the testimony of the defendant to the same tests, interest, etc., as are applied to the evidence of other witnesses, objectionable, although to single out the defendant and call special attention to his interest in the case would be reversible error. Territory v. Livingston, supra.

A charge that the jury have a right to consider the situation of the accused, his interest in the result of the trial, and everything appearing in the case bearing on his credibility; that his testimony should be considered in connection with all of the other evidence in the case, and the same tests that are applied to his testimony, for the purpose of determining its credibility, should be applied to the testimony of each and every other witness, is not objectionable as discriminating against a single witness. Grabowski v. State, 126 Wis. 447, 105 N. W. 805.

An instruction that the jury may take into account the interest of the accused in determining the weight and credibility to be given to his testimony is not prejudicially erroneous, as singling out the accused from all other witnesses in the case, since no other witness occupies the same position as the accused, and such an instruction does not apply to him a test which could have been applied to others. State v. Wiggins, 50 La. Ann. 330, 23 So. 334.

So, an instruction telling the jury that, in considering the amount of credit or value they will give to the testimony of one of the defendants who testified in the case, they may take into consideration his interest in the case, his desire to avoid punishment for the crime with which he is charged, and all other interests or motives that will likely surround or affect the testimony of a person similarly surrounded or situated, is not erroneous on the ground that it does not treat the defendant, testifying, as other witnesses in the case, but singles him out by name, since it does not apply to him a test of credibility which could have been applied to others. Doyle v. People, 147 Ill. 394, 35 N. E. 372.

The court may properly call the attention of the jury to the fact that the defendant is directly interested in the result of the case, without referring to other witnesses individually, where the accused appears to be the only witness directly interested. State v. Young, 104 Iowa, 730, 74 N. W. 693.

And a charge of general application, which states the law as to the credibility of witnesses, is not erroneous on the theory that the defendant being the only interested witness in the result of the case, the charge must be taken as directly referring to and designating him, especially where a cautionary instruction referring directly to the defendant's interest in the result of the trial as affecting his credibility and the weight to be given to his testimony would have been proper. Savary v. State, 62 Neb. 166, 87 N. W. 34.

VIII. Instructing as to former conviction or other charges against accused.

A charge as to a former conviction of the accused is not erroneous where, by statute, such fact is admissible to affect his credibility.

An instruction that a former conviction of the defendant on trial may be considered by the jury as a matter affecting his credibility as a witness in his own behalf is in conformity with Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 852, and is not erroneous. State v. Reyner, 50 Or. 224, 91 Pac. 301.

A charge that the jury may take into consideration the fact, if the same is proven, that the defendant had been convicted of a felony and confined in the penitentiary of another state, as affecting his credibility as a witness, is not objectionable as disparaging his standing as a witness in his own behalf, where, by statute, conviction of a felony may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of a witness. Kenting v. State, 67 Neb. 500, 93 N. W. 980.

An instruction that, if the accused has testified to the commission of any other or different crime from the one charged in the indictment, the jury must not permit it to prejudice them or bias their judgment against his case, but they may consider it in determining what credibility should be given to the defendant's testimony in the case, is not prejudicial, since, by statute, conviction of an infamous crime may be proved against the credibility of a witness. Boyle v. State, 105 Ind. 469, 55 Am. Rep. 218, 5 N. E. 203.

An instruction as to a former conviction or indictment of the accused or as to other charges against him should not bear on the weight of evidence nor be misleading.

A charge that evidence brought out on cross-examination of defendant with reference to former charges against her can be considered by the jury only as affecting, if they believe the same does affect, her credibility as a witness in the case, and not as showing or tending to show that defendant committed the offense for which she is on trial, is not objectionable as a charge on the weight of evidence. Jasper v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 61 S. W. 392.

But an instruction that the testimony of the defendant as to his having been charged with any other crime than the one for which he is on trial was admitted only for the purpose of going to the credibility of the defendant as a witness, and for no other purpose, is upon the weight of evidence, since it assumes that he had testified that he had been charged with other crimes, and because it tells the jury that it goes to the credibility, which is equivalent to telling them that it affects his credibility. Stull v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 547, 84 S. W. 1059.

So, a charge that the defendant, who was on trial for robbery, admits that he has been convicted of petit larceny, and that as to how much credit such a man is entitled to is for the jury to determine, can be understood in no other way than as a statement that, in the opinion of the court, such a man as the defendant is entitled to but little credit, and invades the province of the jury. People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802.

An instruction which directs the jury wholly to disregard the testimony of the accused, who, on cross-examination, stated that he had theretofore been in the state prison and had served out his term, constitutes reversible error, since the degree of credit to which he is entitled is to be decided by the jury, and not by the court. Newman v. People, 63 Barb. 630.

An instruction that the jury are to look to other charges against the defendant in weighing his evidence as a witness is misleading, since, while such testimony is advisable as going to discredit him as a witness, and causing the jury to disregard his testimony altogether, it is not a factor to be weighed against his evidence. Scott v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 36 S. W. 277.

A charge that testimony regarding former indictments against the accused was admitted for the sole purpose of affecting her credibility as a witness should state that it can be considered for no other purpose. Tardy v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 214, 78 S. W. 1076.

IX. Instructing as to demeanor of accused.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to instruct the jury that, in considering the degree of credit to be given to the testimony of the accused, they may take into consideration his appearance and manner while testifying. Hudson v. State, 77 Ark. 334, 91 S. W. 299; Blair v. State, 69 Ark. 558, 64 S. W. 948; Felker v. State, 54 Ark. 489, 16 S. W. 663; Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4; Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635; Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 32 N. E. 431; Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 467, 4 N. E. 63; State v. Hilsabeck, 132 Mo. 348, 34 S. W. 38; Territory v. Taylor, 11 N. M. 588, 71 Pac. 489; Keating v. State, 67 Neb. 560, 93 N. W. 980.

An instruction that the jury are the sole judges of the credibility of the witness, and that they need not believe anything to be a fact simply because a witness testifies to it positively, if, from all the evidence and circumstances arising in the case, the demeanor of the witness upon the stand, the manner of his testifying, and his apparent candor and fairness, they believe that he has knowingly testified falsely, does not criticize or cast reflections upon the testimony of the accused, and is properly given. Chezem v. State, 56 Neb. 496, 76 N. W. 1056.

A charge that the jury have the right, in determining the credibility to be accorded to the testimony of the defendant, to consider his actions and demeanor on the witness stand, does not improperly disparage his testimony, where a similar instruction, applicable to all the witnesses, was given. Younger v. State, 12 Wyo. 24, 73 Pac. 551.

An instruction that the jury have the right to take into consideration the manner of the accused in testifying does not tend to discredit his testimony, where the jury are further told not to disregard the testimony of any witness, and that the weight to be given to the testimony of any witness is a matter solely within their province. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 24 S. W. 885; Jones v. State, 61 Ark. 88, 32 S. W. 81.

Nor does an instruction that, in weighing the testimony of the defendant, the jury have the right to take into consideration the manner of his testifying, direct them to test the testimony of the accused by a more rigid rule than that which is applicable to other witnesses. McIntosh v. State, 151 Ind. 251, 51 N. E. 354.

An instruction that, if conflicting testimony cannot be reconciled, it is the duty of the jury to decide which of the testimony is entitled to the greater credibility and weight, and that, in so determining, they may consider the witnesses' manner of testifying, is a charge upon the weight of the testimony, and erroneous. Williams v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 40 S. W. 801; Penny v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 42 S. W. 297.

A charge instructing the jury as to how they should weigh the testimony of the defendant—that is, treat him the same as any other witness, judging his appearance, demeanor, etc.—is properly refused. Clark v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 59 S. W. 887.

The giving of an instruction that, in determining the degree of credibility that shall be accorded to the testimony of the accused, the jury have a right to take into consideration the fact that the accused is interested in the result of the prosecution, as well as his demeanor and conduct on the witness stand and "during the trial," is reversible error. Purdy v. People, 140 Ill. 46, 29 N. E. 700; Vale v. People, 161 Ill. 309, 43 N. E. 1091. The court said: The jury were sworn to try the issue submitted to them according to the law and the evidence; and most assuredly the demeanor and conduct of the defendant during the progress of the trial and while he was not a witness upon the stand were no part of the evidence in the case. Evidence may be introduced which was not anticipated; a witness may greatly exaggerate a trifling circumstance, or may deliberately make a misstatement; a witness may fail to testify to a fact which the defendant fully believed was within the knowledge of such witness and would be stated by him, exaggerated denunciation may be indulged in by attorneys; the presiding judge may decide contrary to the expectations of the defendant in respect to the admissibility of certain evidence, or may rule a point of law against him. Under these and other like circumstances a prisoner, and especially in a trial where his life was at stake, might frequently, and especially so if he was not a hardened criminal, demean himself while under the influence of his disappointment, fears, and feelings, in such a manner as that an observer would regard his conduct and demeanor as indicative of guilt. It would be illogical and unjust, under circumstances such as stated, to deduce a conclusion unfavorable to the defendant.

It has very frequently been held that a jury may, in determining the credibility of witnesses, consider their demeanor and conduct while upon the witness stand, and there is reason in such holding. A person charged with crime can be examined as a witness only at his own request; and so, when he voluntarily assumes the character of a witness, it is proper to apply to him the rules which apply to other witnesses. But we are not advised that it has ever been adjudicated or held that the conduct and demeanor of a defendant during his trial for crime, when he is not examined as a witness, or while he is not being examined as a witness, is to be regarded in the light of evidence, or that it can be taken into consideration by the jury in arriving at a verdict. In two instances within the knowledge and recollection of the writer of this opinion, men on trial for grave crimes have made assaults upon witnesses who testified against them, and this during the trials and in the presence of the jury. Assuming that, in such cases, the defendants were examined as witnesses in their own behalf, it would have been unjust, and highly detrimental to the rights of said defendants, if the trial judge had instructed that, in determining the degree of credibility that should be accorded to the testimony of such defendants, the jury had the right to take into consideration the demeanor and conduct of said defendants during their trials. We think that it is improper to authorize a jury to consider, in arriving at a verdict, anything that is other than the law or the evidence in the case.

An instruction similar to that declared erroneous in Purdy v. People, supra, had theretofore been given, without objection, in Hirschman v. People, 101 Ill. 568, and Rider v. People, 110 Ill. 11.

The instruction subsequently given in Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 32 N. E. 431, omits the words "during the trial," but refers approvingly to the two preceding cases, and says that there was no intention in the Purdy Case to change the rule of law laid down in the two earlier cases, and that there was no conflict between them and the Purdy Case.

Mr. Justice Campbell in the opinion written in Boykin v. People, 22 Colo. 496, 45 Pac. 419, remarked: A critical examination of the decision in the Purdy Case shows that the defendant was the only witness in his own behalf; and this fact, and the further fact that the court was in grave doubt as to the sufficiency of the circumstantial evidence to warrant a conviction, led the court to hold that the instruction did not fully and fairly submit to the jury the question of defendant's credibility. We are unable to harmonize the decision in the Purdy Case with the two earlier cases, unless the rule announced in the former is to be confined to the peculiar state of facts of that case, and possibly, as so restricted, it might not be objectionable.

A rule contrary to that expressed in Purdy v. People, supra, is laid down in Boykin v. People, supra, holding that an instruction that the jury may consider the demeanor of the accused during the trial is not erroneous. The court observed: We cannot agree with the argument that the defendant's conduct during the trial of a case and in the presence of the jury is not a proper subject of their observation. Indeed, we know it to be a fact, grounded in human nature, that the conduct of a defendant, or of a party to a suit, during the trial, is more or less potential, and has necessarily more or less influence with the court and jury upon the question of his credibility; and it would be manifestly improper to instruct the jury that they should not accord to a defendant's demeanor at such times due consideration as to affecting his credibility. So we fail to see why it would be improper, or how it could be avoided, for the jury to be favorably or unfavorably impressed with the defendant's conduct during the trial, the impression depending upon the character of the same. If this be so, we fail to perceive the vice in an instruction telling the jury that they may do the very thing which common experience and common observation teach that the human mind inevitably will do.

An instruction that, in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of the defendant on trial for crime, the jury are authorized to consider the demeanor of the witnesses while testifying, is erroneous. El-19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ler v. People, 153 Ill. 443, 38 N. E. 060. The court said: While the jury may properly consider the manner in which a witness testifies, and other like matters, in determining the degree of credit to be given to his evidence, yet the demeanor of other witnesses could not be considered in determining what credit should be given to the defendant.

A jury may properly be told to consider, as a matter affecting the credibility of one accused of murder, the fact that he kept silent respecting the crime, after his arrest and after he had consulted counsel, and up to the time he testified on the trial. R. v. Higgins, 36 N. B. 18, 7 Can. Crim. Cas. 68. The court said: It would be a material and proper matter to comment upon as respecting the credibility of the story then advanced by the prisoner, to the effect that the murder was committed by a companion who had testified against him.

X. Instructing as to statutory statement by accused.

In Alabama, Florida, Georgia, and Michigan enabling acts were heretofore passed, by the provisions of which persons accused of crime were permitted to make statements to the jury in their own behalf. In Florida and Michigan these statements were sworn to, but in Alabama and Georgia they were not required to be made under the sanction of an oath. These statutes were passed to mitigate the severity of the common-law rule which precluded one on trial for crime from testifying in his own behalf. Subsequent legislation enacted in Alabama, Florida, and Michigan has made the accused a competent witness at his own request.

Weight of statement for jury.

The court may properly inform the jury that they may consider the prisoner's statement in considering the evidence, and give it such weight as they think proper. Maher v. People, 10 Mich. 212, 81 Am. Dec. 781.

A charge that the statement of the prisoner is entitled to such weight as the jury should think it is worthy of is correct. Durant v. People, 13 Mich. 355.

A statement of the accused, made under a statute permitting him to make a statement to the jury of the facts, in his own behalf, but not under oath, is entitled only to such weight as the jury may, in good conscience and justice, see fit to give it; and the court may properly instruct them that they may believe such statement or not, at their pleasure, giving it such weight as they may believe it entitled to. Blackburn v. State, 71 Ala. 319, 46 Am. Rep. 323.

It is error for the court to charge that a statement under oath, made by the defendant before the jury, in pursuance of Fla. act of 1865, § 4, is not evidence, and cannot be considered by the jury as such, since, after the court has granted leave to the defendant to make such a statement, it is the jury alone who are entitled to consider it, and, if it be remarked upon at all, it should be to suggest to the jury, in effect, that they are to attach to it such importance, in view of the nature of the offense charged and of the testimony before them, as, in their good judgment, it is entitled to. Barber v. State, 13 Fla. 675.

An instruction given by the court of its own motion, which charges the jury, in substance, that the sworn statement of each of the prisoners is to be considered and weighed as evidence, and compared with the other evidence in the case, and that the jury are authorized to give such weight to the sworn statements as, in their judgment, they were entitled to, in view of all the other evidence in the case, and that they are the exclusive judges of the evidence and of the weight it is entitled to and of the credibility of the witnesses, is proper, and does not trench upon the exclusive province of the jury as to the weight and credibility of the testimony of the witnesses and defendants. Ballard v. State, 31 Fla. 260, 12 So. 865.

A charge that the statement of the prisoner is evidence before the jury, to be allowed such weight, and such only, as they see fit to give it, is not objectionable as tending to cast discredit upon the statement of the accused in using the words "such only," where no unusual or undue stress or emphasis was placed upon the words by the court. Olive v. State, 34 Fla. 203, 15 So. 925. In support of this holding, it is said: The court must not comment on the prisoner's statement, but we see no objection to stating to the jury just what the law authorizes, that the prisoner's statement is evidence before them, and to be allowed such weight and such only as they see fit to give it.

A charge to the jury that the statement of the accused is not evidence, but is entitled only to such weight as the jury choose to give it, is in conformity with, and almost in the words of, Ga. Code, § 4637, and is properly given. Ross v. State, 59 Ga. 248.

In charging the jury in reference to the prisoner's statement, the court should keep the evidence distinct from the statement, and shape the general tenor of the charge alone by the evidence and law applicable to it; but, at some stage of the charge, the statutory provisions touching the statement ought to be known to the jury. The jury are to give the statement such force as they think proper. Its rightful force may be either against the prisoner or for him, or it may be entitled to none whatever. The jury are to deal with it on the plane of statement, not on the plane of evidence, and may derive from it such aid as they can in reaching the truth. The law fixes no value upon it; it is a legal blank. The jury may stamp it with such value as they think belongs to it. Vaughn v. State, 88 Ga. 731, 16 S. E. 64.

A charge which limits and restricts the jury in their consideration of the defendant's statement is erroneous, since the statute provides that the statement shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it. Pease v. State, 63 Ga. 631.

Nor should the court, after instructing the jury that the sworn statement made before the coroner's inquest, by defendant, who is on trial for murder, is evidence before them, and that they can give it such credit as they think it entitled to, charge that the jury should believe it unless contradicted by two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances. Inman v. State, 72 Ga. 209.

Pointing out that statement is not sworn to.

A charge which reminds the jury that the defendant's statement is not made under oath, and that the defendant incurred no penalty for not speaking the truth, is not erroneous. Poppell v. State, 71 Ga. 276. The court said: Surely there can be no wrong in calling the attention of the jury to circumstances which would impair the force of such testimony, or which should enable them to give it the weight to which it is entitled.

A charge that it is the province of the jury to give to the sworn evidence or to the defendant's statement such weight as they may see proper, bearing in mind that the defendant's statement is not under oath and the sworn evidence is under oath, is not erroneous, where the court added that this distinction should not control them, the consideration of the evidence or statement being entirely within their province. Keaton v. State, 99 Ga. 197, 25 S. E. 615.

It is not error on the part of the trial court, after having properly charged the jury in reference to the prisoner's statement, and after instructing the jury that they may believe that statement in whole or in part, to the exclusion of the sworn testimony, to add, "remembering it is not under oath, and does not subject him to the penalty incident to a sworn witness." Teasley v. State, 105 Ga. 842, 32 S. E. 335.

After correctly instructing the jury as to the law in reference to the prisoner's statement, it is not error for the court to add, in connection therewith, "it is not delivered under oath, and he incurs no penalty in not telling the truth." Ryals v. State, 125 Ga. 266, 54 S. E. 168.

A charge to the jury after the prisoner had finished his statement and had announced to the solicitor general, that he was willing to be cross-examined, and had been so cross-examined, that the prisoner's statement was not under oath, nor was he subject to cross-examination without his consent, and that the jury were allowed to give his statement just as such force and weight as they saw proper, is not erroneous. Wilson v. State, 69 Va. 224.

The court may properly charge that the law allows a defendant to make such statement in his own behalf as he may see proper, and that he does not make his statement under oath, and is not subject to be cross-examined, since it is simply a quotation from the statute, and the court had a right to put the jury on notice that the statement was ex parte on the part of the defendant. Murray v. State, 85 Ga. 378, 11 S. E. 655.

Believing statement in preference to sworn testimony.

The court should inform the jury that they may believe the prisoner's statement in preference to the sworn testimony. Burns v. State, 89 Ga. 527, 15 S. E. 748; Doster v. State, 93 Ga. 43, 18 S. E. 997.

And in Hendrix v. State (Ga.) 63 S. E. 939, an instruction upon the defendant's statement to the jury, considered as a whole, was held not erroneous, the jury having been told that they had a right to believe the statement, and the right to believe it even in preference to the sworn testimony.

It is not erroneous to charge that the jury might believe the defendant's statement in preference to the sworn testimony, or might disbelieve it. Poppell v. State, 71 Ga. 276.

After charging the jury that they might give the statement of the accused such force as they think proper, and believe it in preference to the sworn testimony if they think proper, a further charge that what the law means by believing defendant's statement in preference to the sworn testimony is where the latter and the statement conflict; that the statement, to avail the prisoner, must be in those parts that are in conflict with the evidence and in conflict in material matters, is erroneous, since under it the prisoner's statement, to avail him, must be in conflict with the sworn testimony, and only when in conflict could he get any benefit from his statement, whereas, on the contrary, the prisoner's statement should avail him not only where the same is in conflict with the sworn testimony, but where no such conflict exists. Lovejoy v. State, 82 Ga. 87, 8 S. E. 66.
